

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFACE

FIRST EDITION¹.

IN laying before the Public a fourth Work,—not less considerable than any of those in which he has been previously engaged,—the Author feels that the approbation, with which his preceding labours have been received by the Public, may well remove from his mind much of that anxiety, which he would otherwise have felt, as to the reception the present might experience at their hands.

It is obviously proper, in sending forth a new Edition of the GREEK TESTAMENT,—as it would be in editing any other ancient writings,—as well to point out to the reader the principal deficiencies, which such an Edition is intended to supply, as to state the particular purposes, which it is intended to answer.

As far as regards the Text of the New Testament, the present Editor is not disposed to deny, that amongst the various Editions already extant, sufficient evidence is afforded to enable any one, competently furnished with Learning and Critical information, to ascertain in general the true reading of any passage. Yet what are called the Standard Texts differ considerably; especially that of Griesbach, as compared with the textus receptus, and even with that of Matthæi. And it is not to be supposed that Students—or indeed readers of the New Testament in general,—have at command all the principal Critical Editions, or ordinarily possess the ability to decide between their diversities. Hence it seemed desirable that such persons should be supplied with a Text so constructed, that the variations from the textus receptus should be, as far as is practicable, distinctly marked in the Text itself; and not left to be learned from the Notes: and further, that the state of the evidence, in all important cases, should be briefly laid before the reader,—together with the reasons which had induced the Editor either to adopt any variation from the received text, or to retain it, though against the judgment of eminent Scholars;—so that the Student might thence learn to judge for himself, as to any matter in dispute. But a new recension of the Text, formed on such a plan, however desirable, was not to be found in this country; nor, indeed, in any other,—at least based on sound principles of Criticism; the Texts for Academical and general use, on the Continent, being little more than reprints of that of Griesbach; of which the imperfections, as will appear from what is said in the course of the following work, are very considerable.

But if thus great was the want of a Text fitted for such uses, how much greater was that of a suitable body of Annotation! in adverting to which we may previously glance at the origin and progress of Biblical Criticism and Interpretation; by the former of which we ascertain what an author has actually written,—by the latter, what is really his meaning. Now to the primitive Christians neither of these aids were requisite. The text itself of Scripture was then in its greatest purity, and its sense must have been, upon the whole, sufficiently perspicuous to all attentive readers; and for such as needed any explanation, Teachers were at hand, who had been instructed either by the Apostles or their immediate successors. Such a state of things was then sufficient for all ordinary purposes, both as regarded the general sense of Scripture, and the evidences of the truth of Christianity. For at that period, in the controversies of the Jews with the Christians, the authenticity of the Old Testament was alike admitted by both parties; and their differences of opinion, as to the meaning of prophecies, did not turn upon the grammatical signification of this or that particular phrase, and seldom upon any of those points which now form subjects of critical discussion. As respects the interpretation of the New Testament (whose authenticity was then unquestioned), the difficulties now found did not at that period exist; since the Greek language was as yet a living language, and indeed the vernacular one of most of the early Christians. And as regarded the interpretation of a few passages in the New Testament of more than ordinary difficulty and obscurity, that was supplied to the early Christians, for nearly two centuries after the death of Christ, by a kind of Traditio Hermeneutica, to which Irenæus appeals as authority for the interpretation of Scripture. And as that Traditio grew fainter, it was supplied by what was called the Canon, or Rule, of truth or faith; which, however, as Bp. Marsh shows, “is not to be understood to import any authority distinct from Scripture, but Scripture itself interpreted by authority.” After the second century, hermeneutical science became, from the circumstances of the times, in some degree necessary; and this necessity must, from the very nature of things, have become, in the lapse of time, greater and greater. Hence originated the literal and grammatico-historical interpretation, which gradually took place of the allegorical and mystical one of an earlier period. Of this Origen was the founder; and Chrysostom, Basil, and Theodore of Mopsuestia, were the most successful cultivators: though others, as Cyrill, Isidore, Jerome, Cassiodorus, Ambrose, Hilary, and Augustine, more or less distinguished themselves. In a later age, the invaluable, but prolix, labours of those Fathers were either brought together into Catenas,—consisting of collections from various writers, arranged, in the manner of our Variorum Commentaries, under the portions of Scripture to which they belonged; (see Ittig. de Catenis Patrum and Fabricii Bibl. Græc. Harles. vol. viii. pp. 637. 700.)—or the pith of the most important exegetical matter was drawn forth into something like Commentaries by Euthalius, Ambrosiaster, Theodoret, J. Damascenus, Theophylact, Euthymius, Arethas, Andreas, Œcumenius, Photius, Bede, Rabanus Maurus, Alcuin, and Anselm; or still more briefly, by Walafrid Strabo, (who formed a Catena, or collection of short comments on all the Latin Fathers, which, from being subjoined to copies of the Vulgate, came to be called Glossa ordinaria, or, from the place it occupied, marginalis), and by the Scholiasts, and Glossographers; the latter of which are contained in the Lexicographical compilations of Suidas, Hesychius, and Phavorinus, collected by Ernesti. To these succeeded, at a much later period, the Scholastic Interpreters, as Peter Lombardus, Duns Scotus, and Thomas Aquinas,—whose prolix and too artificial comments were moulded somewhat after the form of the old Catenas; and indeed were chiefly founded on Augustine, Jerome, Ambrose, and other Latin Fathers. These were again followed by Nicolaus Lyranus, who flourished in the early part of the fourteenth century, and was the author of a work entitled Postillæ, in which is contained a brief literal comment on the whole of Scripture, and that so excellent, as to pave the way for Luther, Calvin, Melancthon, and the other labourers in the great work of the Reformation. He may, indeed, be called the Father of, or Forerunner to, the modern school of Expositors; to whom he taught the lesson, almost lost since the time of Chrysostom, and Theodoret, to first draw forth the literal, or grammatico-historical sense of Scripture.

This brings us down, after the lapse of another century, to the early modern Commentators themselves, as Valla, Pellicanus, Vatablus, Zwinglius, Erasmus, Flaccius Illyrius, Beza, Melancthon, Bucer, Camerarius, Zanchius, and Strigelius, whose works, however, so far from forming, or being intended to form, what may be called, a regular or perpetual commentary, have the inconvenience of offering only partial explanation, and illustrating only such points as seemed especially to require elucidation, and such as their authors felt themselves most able to explain.

This deficiency continued to a late period, and is observable in almost all the Commentators of the seventeenth century. Exceptions, it is true, did exist; as in Luther, Calvin, Hyperius, Musculus, Marlorati, Hunnius, and Crellius; yet in them, (and also, at a later period, in Lucas Brug. and Cornelius à Lapide, nay, even in the far abler works of Maldonati and Estius,) we have the opposite inconvenience of the commentary being extended to so immoderate a length, as, in a great measure, to preclude its being read. The very same error was committed, throughout a great part of the seventeenth century, by our English Divines of the Puritanical, or Nonconformist school, as Dr. Owen and others, and towards the close of that century, by Cocceius, Lampe, Gerdesius, and Wesselius; in whose hands the Analytical method became as adverse to the discovery of truth, as the Logical and minutely Grammatical had been, in the hands of Crellius, Schlichting, Wolzogen, and others of that School; in whose footsteps certain English Commentators of the Arian sect, as Benson, Pierce, Taylor, and others, unhappily too much trode; nor were Locke and Chandler, great as are their merits in other respects, wholly free from this fault. The best Commentaries of our own countrymen, during the seventeenth, and part of the eighteenth century, as Hammond and Whitby, however valuable in themselves, partake of the same fault as that just adverted to,—in being, like that of their model, GROTIVS, too prolix in some parts, and unsatisfactorily brief in others; no approach being made to any thing like a connected Commentary; except, as in the case of Owen and Benson, on a scale too extended to admit of being read, and on principles little to be approved. This state of things, both here and on the Continent, long continued; and the first attempt at any thing like a regular, or what is called perpetual, Grammatical Commentary, formed to be read through, and not to be used for reference only, was made by the judicious and acute KOPPE, who in 1778 commenced an Edition of the New Testament with a corrected text, short critical, and rather copious philological and exegetical Notes, serving to establish the literal and grammatical sense; all doctrinal discussions being excluded. The learned Editor only lived to publish two Volumes, containing the Epistles to the Romans, Galatians, Ephesians, and Thessalonians; and, after his death, the work was continued by Heinrichs and Pott; who, however, so altered the original plan, which was in many respects excellent, as to unfit it for the purposes first contemplated. To which may be added, the objectionable nature of much of their matter; the views of these latter Editors so largely partaking of that leaven of heterodoxy, from which their predecessor himself was not wholly free, and which has worked so extensively and perniciously in the greater part of the German Commentators, from the time of Semler downwards.

Of several other works, on nearly the same plan, which appeared subsequently to the above, may especially be noticed the Commentaries of Rosenmüller and Kuinoel: of which the latter work is on various accounts preferable to the former; but, from the too frequent introduction of certain highly pernicious dogmas of Semler, Paulus, and others of the anti-supernaturalist school,—though accompanied with refutations by the Editor,—it is quite unfit for the use of Students. And, as respects the Critical and Philological departments, the works of both evince an insufficient acquaintance with the enlightened principles of the great Critics of the School of Bentley and Hemsterhusius, Porson and Hermann. In the later Commentary of the learned Fritzsche, on the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark, this fault, at least, cannot be found. Yet, how can we fail to lament, that while we find the learned Critic acknowledging the sense, which the laws of Verbal Criticism compel the Interpreter to assign to Scripture, we should also see him caught in the toils of that miserable sophistry, which entangles the ordinary and half-learned sciolists and sceptics of his country! Besides, the prolixity, and, still more, the excursiveness of his matter, render it unsuitable for Academical or general use. Indeed, we may well say of this, as of the foregoing works,—and, in a certain degree, of the Annotations of Dindorf, Morus, and Iaspis,—πολλὰ μὲν ἰσθλὰ μεμυγμένα, πολλὰ δὲ λυγρὰ. Finally, even in the exegetical writers of what may be called the orthodox School of Germany,—as J. A. Turretin, Ernesti, Carpzov, Borger, Tittmann, Heydenreich, Laurmann, Tholuck, Emmerling, Bornemann, Pelt, Lücke, Scholz, Steiger, Billroth, Harles, and Olshausen,—we have, more or less, the inconvenience of extreme prolixity, frequent obscurity, or mystification, and, above all, the want of a clear and well-digested arrangement.

Hence an Edition of the New Testament, uniting with sound doctrinal views such enlightened principles of Criticism and Interpretation, as to meet the advanced state of Biblical science at the present day¹, and in other

¹ That Biblical science has greatly advanced, even within the lifetime of those who have mainly contributed to produce that progress, is undeniable. And as it has advanced, so ought it to continue to go forward. "Let no man," in the words of the illustrious CUDWORTH, "imagine that we can go too far, or be too well read in the book of God's words, Divinity, or in the book of God's works, Philosophy; but rather let men awaken themselves, and vigorously pursue an endless progress of proficiency in both." So, in full anticipation of the advances which have actually been made, we find the sagacious ROBERT BOYLE, in his Tract on the Excellency of Theology (Works, vol. iv. 16—19), expressing it as his opinion, that "a further use may yet be made of the Scriptures, than Divines and Philosophers seem to have thought of." Such, indeed, is the depth of sense, which is found in these "lively oracles," that, as the same admirable writer observes, "we shall not do right either to Theology, or to the greatest repository of all its truths, the BIBLE, if we imagine that there are no considerable additions to be made to the theological discoveries we have already made, nor any clearer exposition of many texts of Scripture, than are to be

respects adapted for Academical and general use, especially in our own country, was still a Desideratum. This it has been the endeavour of the present Editor to supply; with what degree of success, he leaves to the learned and candid reader to determine; and he will now proceed to unfold the principles of Criticism and Interpretation by which he has been guided, and the purposes which the present work is especially intended to answer.

The Text has been formed on the basis of the last Edition of R. Stephens, adopted by Dr. Mill, whose text differs very slightly from, but is admitted to be preferable to, the received or common Text, which originated in the Elzevir Edition of 1624. From this there has been no deviation, except on the most preponderating evidence; critical conjecture being wholly excluded¹; and such alterations only introduced, as rest on the united authority of MSS., ancient Versions and Fathers, and the early Editions (especially the invaluable EDITIO PRINCEPS, Complut. 1516), and which had been already adopted in one or more of the Critical Editions of Bengel, Wetstein, Griesbach, Matthæi, and Scholz. And here the Editor must avow his dissent, though not, generally speaking, from the Canons of Criticism professedly acted upon by Griesbach in his Edition of the New Testament, yet altogether from the system of Recensions first promulgated by him, and founded, as the Editor apprehends, upon a misapplication of those canons. The perpetual, and, for the most part, needless cancellings², and alterations of all kinds, introduced by Griesbach from a few ancient, but altered, MSS., and Versions formed on such MSS., evince a temerity that would have been not a little censurable even in editing a profane writer, but which can scarcely be too strongly reprobated when exercised on the sacred Volume.

Further, the present Editor has so constructed his Text, that the reader may be said to possess the advantage of having before him both the Stephanic, and met with in the generality of Commentators." "I meet," continues he, "with much fewer persons than I could wish, who make it their business to search the Scriptures for these things; and who are solicitous to discern and make out, in the way of governing and saving man revealed by God, so excellent an œconomy, and such deep contrivances and wise dispensations, as may bring credit on the religion; not so much as it is Roman Catholic, or Protestant, or Socinian, but as it is CHRISTIAN."

the corrected text, formed on the best Manuscripts, ancient Versions, and early Editions. To advert to the various kinds of alterations of the Stephanic text, as they arise from the omission or the insertion of words, or from a change of one word into another,—nothing whatever has been omitted which has a place in that Text; such words only as are, by the almost universal consent of Editors and Critics, regarded as interpolations, being here placed within brackets, more or less inclusive, according to the degree of suspicion attached to them. Nothing has been inserted but on the same weighty authority; and even the inserted words are pointed out as insertions, by being expressed in a smaller character. All altered readings have asterisks prefixed, the old ones being invariably specified in the Notes. And such readings as, though left untouched, are by eminent Critics thought to need alteration, have a † prefixed. Such words (extremely few in number) as are, on good grounds, supposed to be corrupt readings, though the MSS. supply not the means of emendation, are designated by an obelus †. As to Various Readings, all really important ones are noticed; chiefly those which, though not admitted into the text of the present Edition, have been adopted by one or more of the great Editors, Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, and Scholz. In such cases, the reasons for non-adoption are usually adduced. And this has been done almost universally in the case of deviations from the Stephanic Text, however minute.

The division of the Text into paragraphs, instead of verses (though these are expressed in the inner margin), is agreeable to the custom of the most eminent Editors, from Wetstein to Scholz, and can need no justification. Indeed, scarcely any thing has had a more unfavourable effect on the interpretation of the New Testament, than the breaking up of the whole into verses; thus occasionally dissevering clauses closely connected in sense; and producing, at first sight, a false impression, by interrupting to the eye that continuity which must be obvious to the mind.

The Punctuation has been throughout very carefully adjusted, after a comparison of all the best Editions, from the Editio Princeps to that of Scholz. To each verse is subjoined, in the outer margin, a select body of the most apposite Parallel References, as adopted by Bp. Lloyd from Curcellæus. The citations from the Old Testament are expressed as such by being spaced out; and the words of any speaker are indicated by an appropriate mode of punctuation, and by the use of a Capital letter to designate their commencement.

The CRITICAL NOTES chiefly serve to give reasons for the methods pursued in forming the Text; but are introduced partly to illustrate important principles of Biblical Criticism.

As to the EXEGETICAL NOTES :—These are, for the most part, of the kind found in the best Critical Editions of the Greek Classical writers; being meant to comprise whatever tends to the establishment of the grammatical and literal sense: and, in this department of his labours, the Author has availed himself of every aid that could be derived from all the best Commentators, ancient and modern. And as the meaning of any word is always a simple matter of fact, and, like all such, must require to be established by valid evidence, in showing the *usus loquendi*¹; so that evidence must be adduced, whether direct or indirect. In short, the method systematically adopted by the present Annotator, in order to ascertain the sense of passages of very doubtful or disputed meaning, has been this:—to seek their illustration, 1. From parallel passages of the New Testament either of the writer himself, or of the other writers of the New Testament; thus making Scripture in some measure its own Interpreter. 2. From passages of the Septuagint, Josephus, and Philo. 3. From the Apostolical Fathers. 4. From Apocryphal Ecclesiastical writings of undoubted antiquity; which are of considerable utility, as indicating the Theological opinions of the times when they were written, whether earlier or later than the New Testament: in the former case showing the opinions of the Jews previous to the promulgation of the Gospel; in the latter, often contributing to the interpretation of the New Testament, and sometimes establishing its authenticity and uncorrupted preservation. 5. From the early Rabbinical writers. 6. From the Fathers of the Church in general, Greek and Latin, especially of the first four centuries, together with the Greek Commentators, Catenists, and Scholiasts. 7. From the Greek Classical writers,—especially those who lived after the formation of the Alexandrian and Hellenistic, Common or Popular dialect, so ably discussed formerly by Salmasius and Gataker, and recently by Planck and Winer. The illustrations derived from this last source are in general original, and, when not specifically ascribed to any Commentator or Critic, may usually be considered as such. The above may be denominated DIRECT evidence; to which must be added the INDIRECT, in an examination of the scope, subject-matter, context, nature of the subject, analogy of language or doctrines, and finally *historical circumstances*², &c. In short, the great purpose of the Editor has been to apply the rules of hermeneutical science to the simple object of drawing forth from the words of any passage the sense intended by the sacred writer¹; to ascertain which he has been careful to trace the connexion of the clauses or sentences one with another, to indicate the course of thought or reasoning pursued by the writers, in order to present the general sense of any portion of Scripture. Moreover, in endeavouring to determine the true interpretation, the Editor has always aimed first at settling the grammatical and literal sense of any disputed passage; mindful of the pithy dictum of Scaliger, that all controversies in Theology arise from mistakes in grammar,—meaning thereby, in an extended sense, Philology in general. So it was a customary assertion of LUTHER, “optimum grammaticum, eum etiam optimum theologum esse;” and that “Theology is no other than grammar applied to the words and sentences of the Holy Spirit².” Indeed, as Bp. Middleton well observes,

² And here it may not be out of place to adduce Bp. Marsh's three rules of interpretation: 1. that authors must in general use their words in the sense in which they were generally understood; 2. that the meaning of a word used by any writer is the meaning which was affixed to it by those for whom he immediately wrote; and 3. that the words of an author must not be so explained

On this subject (which is one of no small importance) the reader is also referred to the instructive Lecture (L. i. ch. x. § 1) of Prof. Hey, entitled, ‘Of interpreting expressions of Scripture, by entering into the circumstances of those to whom they were immediately addressed.’ This, he shows, must be done “by endeavouring to put ourselves in the place of those who spoke or heard.” “As (continues he) we are far removed from the circumstances of those for whom they were calculated, we should see what knowledge the persons, rightly circumstanced for understanding them, had, which we have not; and we should analyze those acts of the mind by which they were able, habitually, without being conscious of it, to assign to their words precisely that degree of meaning which they were intended to convey. In short, to give ourselves their ideas and feelings; whereby we may be enabled to limit and apply expressions which, from the imperfection of human language, are too general and extensive to be taken literally. Now in order to bring ourselves into the situation of others, and learn their ideas and feelings, we must acquaint ourselves with their customs and opinions.” Finally, he shows (as does Bp. Marsh) that “it is alone by learning, and the study of various sciences, that we are let into those circumstances, and enabled to put ourselves into the proper position to judge of the sense.”

² Melancthon, too, who composed the Confession of Augsburg, used to affirm, “non posse evadere verum Theologum, qui non antea fuerit bonus Interpret; neque posse Scripturam intelligi theologicè, nisi antea intellecta sit grammaticè.” In fact (as Bp. Marsh observes) “learning, and especially grammatical learning, was the pillar by which the edifice of the Reformation was supported.”

"when we consider how many there are who seek to warp the Scriptures to their own views and prepossessions, Verbal Criticism seems to be the only barrier that can be successfully opposed against heresy and schism."

Again, the Editor has especially kept in view simplicity of sense, in opposition to far-fetched, however erudite, interpretations. On which subject it was well observed by the acute Maldonati, "Verior aliquando vulgi quam sapientum sententia est, quod dum simplicius veritatem quærit, facilius invenit." Words and phrases must not be taken in some recondite sense, such as men of learning and ingenuity, in quest of support for an hypothesis, may devise; but in the ordinary sense, in which the persons addressed, whether in preaching or writing, would be likely to understand them.

Moreover, the too frequent recurrence, in recent Commentators, to the principles of Pleonasm, Hebraism, &c. has been here studiously discountenanced, as well as all other Philological devices to dilute, pare down, or explain away the sense of Scripture¹; since it is ever to be borne in mind, as was well said by Bengel, "altæ sunt cogitationes sermonis sacræ (see Ps. xcii. 5, and 1 Cor. ii. 10); inde verba sunt inexhaustæ virtutis." Above all, care has been taken not to lower the august dignity of certain portions of the New Testament, by ill-judged attempts at explanation, where all explanation must fall short; since it respects "such knowledge as is too wonderful and excellent for us,—we cannot attain unto it." (Ps. cxxxix. 5.) In the words of Milton,

"Heaven is for thee too high
To know what passes there. Be lowly wise;
Contented that thus far hath been revealed."

In short, it has been every where the purpose of the Editor to inculcate the cultivation of that "knowledge within bounds"² (the φρονεῖν εἰς τὸ σωφρονεῖν of the Apostle, Rom. xii. 3.) of which it is well said by the same great Poet,

"Knowledge is as food; and needs no less
Her temp'rance over appetite; to know
In measure what the mind may well contain."

So Tacitus says, to the praise of Agricola, "Retinuit (quod est difficillimum) ex scientia modum." And if he should be thought by any persons to have employed unnecessary pains in ascertaining the antiquity of interpretations, he would recommend to their consideration the weighty remark of Bp. Middleton, that "Theologians would do well to notice the antiquity of the opinions which they defend, because that antiquity is sometimes no inconsiderable evidence of truth." It has, however, been his aim to steer clear of any undue prepossession, whether in favour of antiquity on the one hand, or of novelty on the other¹; and he may truly say, with Strabo, βούλομαι τὸ ἀληθές, ἢν τε παλαιὸν, ἢν τε νέον: or with Seneca, Epist. 33, "Quid ergo? non ibo per priorum vestigia? Ego verò utar viâ veteri: sed si priorem (Lege propriorem) planioremque invenero, hanc muniam. Qui antè nos ista moverunt, non domini nostri, sed duces sunt. Patet omnibus veritas, nondum est occupata, multum ex illa etiam futuris relictum est." In short, the Editor has every where endeavoured to unite the respective advantages of simple and solid old views, and also of ingenious and learned new ones; to which we may well apply what the great Grecian Historian (Thucydides vi. 18), says of the union of youth with age in deliberation and counsel:—νομίσατε νεότητα μὲν καὶ γῆρας ἄνευ ἀλλήλων μηδὲν δύνασθαι· ὁμοῦ δὲ τὸ τε φαῦλον καὶ τὸ μέσον καὶ τὸ πάννυ ἀκριβές ἂν ἐνγκραθὲν μάλιστ' ἂν ἰσχύειν. In certain cases, indeed, he has been enabled to justify and confirm, by the suffrage of antiquity, what had been unjustly rejected, or at least distrusted, as mere novelty; but, far more frequently, to show the solid grounds of interpretations, which it had been too long the fashion to reject, merely from their being old and common; though their antiquity and general reception ought rather to have argued them to be true, since, as Cicero well says, "Opinionum commenta delet dies, Naturæ ac veritatis judicia confirmat." See Bacon's Novum Organum, i. 74, init.

As to the much-controverted subject of the style of the New Testament, the Editor acquiesces in the opinions neither of those who regard the Greek as pure, nor of those who account it barbarous and ungrammatical. To maintain the former position, after the labours of so many eminent writers, from Salmasius, Gataker, and Vorstius downwards, were a vain attempt,—and as needless as vain; since, as Valckenæer observes, "Why should absolute purity of style be

¹ To this purpose may be adduced a profound remark of BACON, Nov. Organ. i. 56, "Reperiuntur ingenia alia in admirationem Antiquitatis, alia in amorem et amplexum Novitatis effusa; pauca vero ejus temperamenti sunt, ut modum tenere possint, quin aut quæ rectè posita sunt ab Antiquis convellant, aut ea contemnunt quæ rectè afferuntur à Novis. Hoc vero magno scientiarum et Philosophiæ detrimento fit, quum studiis potius sint Antiquitatis et Novitatis, quam judicia: Veritas autem non a felicitate temporis allecujus, quæ res varia est; sed a lumine Naturæ et Experientiæ, quod æternum est, petenda est." The folly of an excessive fondness for either is ably pointed out by the same eminent writer, De Augm. Scient. i. ii. Indeed, of extremes in general, into which men are ever too prone to run, (thus Hor. Sat. i. 2. 24, "Dum vitant stulti vitia, in contraria currunt,") it is well said by another very deep thinker (the late Alexander Knox) that "the great Charter of nature and providence has established that temperaments shall survive when extremes are no more."

PREFACE

FIRST EDITION¹.

IN laying before the Public a fourth Work,—not less considerable than any of those in which he has been previously engaged,—the Author feels that the approbation, with which his preceding labours have been received by the Public, may well remove from his mind much of that anxiety, which he would otherwise have felt, as to the reception the present might experience at their hands.

It is obviously proper, in sending forth a new Edition of the GREEK TESTAMENT,—as it would be in editing any other ancient writings,—as well to point out to the reader the principal deficiencies, which such an Edition is intended to supply, as to state the particular purposes, which it is intended to answer.

As far as regards the Text of the New Testament, the present Editor is not disposed to deny, that amongst the various Editions already extant, sufficient evidence is afforded to enable any one, competently furnished with Learning and Critical information, to ascertain in general the true reading of any passage. Yet what are called the Standard Texts differ considerably; especially that of Griesbach, as compared with the textus receptus, and even with that of Matthæi. And it is not to be supposed that Students—or indeed readers of the New Testament in general,—have at command all the principal Critical Editions, or ordinarily possess the ability to decide between their diversities. Hence it seemed desirable that such persons should be supplied with a Text so constructed, that the variations from the textus receptus should be, as far as is practicable, distinctly marked in the Text itself; and not left to be learned from the Notes: and further, that the state of the evidence, in all important cases, should be briefly laid before the reader,—together with the reasons which had induced the Editor either to adopt any variation from the received text, or to retain it, though against the judgment of eminent Scholars ;—so that the Student might thence learn to judge for himself, as to any matter in dispute. But a new recension of the Text, formed on such a plan, however desirable, was not to be found in this country ; nor, indeed, in any other,—at least based on sound principles of Criticism ; the Texts for Academical and general use, on the Continent, being little more than reprints of that of Griesbach ; of which the imperfections, as will appear from what is said in the course of the following work, are very considerable.

But if thus great was the want of a Text fitted for such uses, how much greater was that of a suitable body of Annotation ! in adverting to which we may previously glance at the origin and progress of Biblical Criticism and Interpretation ; by the former of which we ascertain what an author has actually written,—by the latter, what is really his meaning. Now to the primitive Christians neither of these aids were requisite. The text itself of Scripture was then in its greatest purity, and its sense must have been, upon the whole, sufficiently perspicuous to all attentive readers ; and for such as needed any explanation, Teachers were at hand, who had been instructed either by the Apostles or their immediate successors. Such a state of things was then sufficient for all ordinary purposes, both as regarded the general sense of Scripture, and the evidences of the truth of Christianity. For at that period, in the controversies of the Jews with the Christians, the authenticity of the Old Testament was alike admitted by both parties ; and their differences of opinion, as to the meaning of prophecies, did not turn upon the grammatical signification of this or that particular phrase, and seldom upon any of those points which now form subjects of critical discussion. As respects the interpretation of the New Testament (whose authenticity was then unquestioned), the difficulties now found did not at that period exist ; since the Greek language was as yet a living language, and indeed the vernacular one of most of the early Christians. And as regarded the interpretation of a few passages in the New Testament of more than ordinary difficulty and obscurity, that was supplied to the early Christians, for nearly two centuries after the death of Christ, by a kind of Traditio Hermeneutica, to which Irenæus appeals as authority for the interpretation of Scripture. And as that Traditio grew fainter, it was supplied by what was called the Canon, or Rule, of truth or faith ; which, however, as Bp. Marsh shows, “is not to be understood to import any authority distinct from Scripture, but Scripture itself interpreted by authority.” After the second century, hermeneutical science became, from the circumstances of the times, in some degree necessary ; and this necessity must, from the very nature of things, have become, in the lapse of time, greater and greater. Hence originated the literal and grammatico-historical interpretation, which gradually took place of the allegorical and mystical one of an earlier period. Of this Origen was the founder; and Chrysostom, Basil, and Theodore of Mopsuestia, were the most successful cultivators: though others, as Cyrill, Isidore, Jerome, Cassiodorus, Ambrose, Hilary, and Augustine, more or less distinguished themselves. In a later age, the invaluable, but prolix, labours of those Fathers were either brought together into Catenas,—consisting of collections from various writers, arranged, in the manner of our Variorum Commentaries, under the portions of Scripture to which they belonged; (see Ittig. de Catenis Patrum and Fabricii Bibl. Græc. Harles. vol. viii. pp. 637. 700.)—or the pith of the most important exegetical matter was drawn forth into something like Commentaries by Euthalius, Ambrosiaster, Theodoret, J. Damascenus, Theophylact, Euthymius, Arethas, Andreas, Œcumenius, Photius, Bede, Rabanus Maurus, Alcuin, and Anselm; or still more briefly, by Walafrid Strabo, (who formed a Catena, or collection of short comments on all the Latin Fathers, which, from being subjoined to copies of the Vulgate, came to be called Glossa ordinaria, or, from the place it occupied, marginalis), and by the Scholiasts, and Glossographers; the latter of which are contained in the Lexicographical compilations of Suidas, Hesychius, and Phavorinus, collected by Ernesti. To these succeeded, at a much later period, the Scholastic Interpreters, as Peter Lombardus, Duns Scotus, and Thomas Aquinas,—whose prolix and too artificial comments were moulded somewhat after the form of the old Catenas; and indeed were chiefly founded on Augustine, Jerome, Ambrose, and other Latin Fathers. These were again followed by Nicolaus Lyranus, who flourished in the early part of the fourteenth century, and was the author of a work entitled Postillæ, in which is contained a brief literal comment on the whole of Scripture, and that so excellent, as to pave the way for Luther, Calvin, Melancthon, and the other labourers in the great work of the Reformation. He may, indeed, be called the Father of, or Forerunner to, the modern school of Expositors; to whom he taught the lesson, almost lost since the time of Chrysostom, and Theodoret, to first draw forth the literal, or grammatico-historical sense of Scripture.

This brings us down, after the lapse of another century, to the early modern Commentators themselves, as Valla, Pellicanus, Vatablus, Zwinglius, Erasmus, Flaccius Illyrius, Beza, Melancthon, Bucer, Camerarius, Zanchius, and Strigelius, whose works, however, so far from forming, or being intended to form, what may be called, a regular or perpetual commentary, have the inconvenience of offering only partial explanation, and illustrating only such points as seemed especially to require elucidation, and such as their authors felt themselves most able to explain.

This deficiency continued to a late period, and is observable in almost all the Commentators of the seventeenth century. Exceptions, it is true, did exist; as in Luther, Calvin, Hyperius, Musculus, Marlorati, Hunnius, and Crellius; yet in them, (and also, at a later period, in Lucas Brug. and Cornelius à Lapide, nay, even in the far abler works of Maldonati and Estius,) we have the opposite inconvenience of the commentary being extended to so immoderate a length, as, in a great measure, to preclude its being read. The very same error was committed, throughout a great part of the seventeenth century, by our English Divines of the Puritanical, or Nonconformist school, as Dr. Owen and others, and towards the close of that century, by Cocceius, Lampe, Gerdesius, and Wesselius; in whose hands the Analytical method became as adverse to the discovery of truth, as the Logical and minutely Grammatical had been, in the hands of Crellius, Schlichting, Wolzogen, and others of that School; in whose footsteps certain English Commentators of the Arian sect, as Benson, Pierce, Taylor, and others, unhappily too much trode; nor were Locke and Chandler, great as are their merits in other respects, wholly free from this fault. The best Commentaries of our own countrymen, during the seventeenth, and part of the eighteenth century, as Hammond and Whitby, however valuable in themselves, partake of the same fault as that just adverted to,—in being, like that of their model, GROTIUS, too prolix in some parts, and unsatisfactorily brief in others; no approach being made to any thing like a connected Commentary; except, as in the case of Owen and Benson, on a scale too extended to admit of being read, and on principles little to be approved. This state of things, both here and on the Continent, long continued; and the first attempt at any thing like a regular, or what is called perpetual, Grammatical Commentary, formed to be read through, and not to be used for reference only, was made by the judicious and acute KOPPE, who in 1778 commenced an Edition of the New Testament with a corrected text, short critical, and rather copious philological and exegetical Notes, serving to establish the literal and grammatical sense; all doctrinal discussions being excluded. The learned Editor only lived to publish two Volumes, containing the Epistles to the Romans, Galatians, Ephesians, and Thessalonians; and, after his death, the work was continued by Heinrichs and Pott; who, however, so altered the original plan, which was in many respects excellent, as to unfit it for the purposes first contemplated. To which may be added, the objectionable nature of much of their matter; the views of these latter Editors so largely partaking of that leaven of heterodoxy, from which their predecessor himself was not wholly free, and which has worked so extensively and perniciously in the greater part of the German Commentators, from the time of Semler downwards.

Of several other works, on nearly the same plan, which appeared subsequently to the above, may especially be noticed the Commentaries of Rosenmüller and Kuinoel: of which the latter work is on various accounts preferable to the former; but, from the too frequent introduction of certain highly pernicious dogmas of Semler, Paulus, and others of the anti-supernaturalist school,—though accompanied with refutations by the Editor,—it is quite unfit for the use of Students. And, as respects the Critical and Philological departments, the works of both evince an insufficient acquaintance with the enlightened principles of the great Critics of the School of Bentley and Hemsterhusius, Porson and Hermann. In the later Commentary of the learned Fritzche, on the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark, this fault, at least, cannot be found. Yet, how can we fail to lament, that while we find the learned Critic acknowledging the sense, which the laws of Verbal Criticism compel the Interpreter to assign to Scripture, we should also see him caught in the toils of that miserable sophistry, which entangles the ordinary and half-learned sciolists and sceptics of his country! Besides, the prolixity, and, still more, the excursiveness of his matter, render it unsuitable for Academical or general use. Indeed, we may well say of this, as of the foregoing works,—and, in a certain degree, of the Annotations of Dindorf, Morus, and Iaspis,—πολλὰ μὲν ἐσθλὰ μεμιγμένα, πολλὰ δὲ λυγρά. Finally, even in the exegetical writers of what may be called the orthodox School of Germany,—as J. A. Turretin, Ernesti, Carpzov, Borger, Tittmann, Heydenreich, Laurmann, Tholuck, Emmerling, Bornemann, Pelt, Lücke, Scholz, Steiger, Billroth, Harles, and Olshausen,—we have, more or less, the inconvenience of extreme prolixity, frequent obscurity, or mystification, and, above all, the want of a clear and well-digested arrangement.

Hence an Edition of the New Testament, uniting with sound doctrinal views such enlightened principles of Criticism and Interpretation, as to meet the advanced state of Biblical science at the present day¹, and in other

¹ That Biblical science has greatly advanced, even within the lifetime of those who have mainly contributed to produce that progress, is undeniable. And as it has advanced, so ought it to continue to go forward. "Let no man," in the words of the illustrious CUDWORTH, "imagine that we can go too far, or be too well read in the book of God's words, Divinity, or in the book of God's works, Philosophy; but rather let men awaken themselves, and vigorously pursue an endless progress of proficiency in both." So, in full anticipation of the advances which have actually been made, we find the sagacious ROBERT BOYLE, in his Tract on the Excellency of Theology (Works, vol. iv. 16—19), expressing it as his opinion, that "a further use may yet be made of the Scriptures, than Divines and Philosophers seem to have thought of." Such, indeed, is the depth of sense, which is found in these "lively oracles," that, as the same admirable writer observes, "we shall not do right either to Theology, or to the greatest repository of all its truths, the BIBLE, if we imagine that there are no considerable additions to be made to the theological discoveries we have already made, nor any clearer exposition of many texts of Scripture, than are to be

respects adapted for Academical and general use, especially in our own country, was still a Desideratum. This it has been the endeavour of the present Editor to supply; with what degree of success, he leaves to the learned and candid reader to determine; and he will now proceed to unfold the principles of Criticism and Interpretation by which he has been guided, and the purposes which the present work is especially intended to answer.

The Text has been formed on the basis of the last Edition of R. Stephens, adopted by Dr. Mill, whose text differs very slightly from, but is admitted to be preferable to, the received or common Text, which originated in the Elzevir Edition of 1624. From this there has been no deviation, except on the most preponderating evidence; critical conjecture being wholly excluded¹; and such alterations only introduced, as rest on the united authority of MSS., ancient Versions and Fathers, and the early Editions (especially the invaluable EDITIO PRINCEPS, Complut. 1516), and which had been already adopted in one or more of the Critical Editions of Bengel, Wetstein, Griesbach, Matthæi, and Scholz. And here the Editor must avow his dissent, though not, generally speaking, from the Canons of Criticism professedly acted upon by Griesbach in his Edition of the New Testament, yet altogether from the system of Recensions first promulgated by him, and founded, as the Editor apprehends, upon a misapplication of those canons. The perpetual, and, for the most part, needless cancellings², and alterations of all kinds, introduced by Griesbach from a few ancient, but altered, MSS., and Versions formed on such MSS., evince a temerity that would have been not a little censurable even in editing a profane writer, but which can scarcely be too strongly reprobated when exercised on the sacred Volume.

Further, the present Editor has so constructed his Text, that the reader may be said to possess the advantage of having before him both the Stephanic, and

met with in the generality of Commentators." "I meet," continues he, "with much fewer persons than I could wish, who make it their business to search the Scriptures for these things; and who are solicitous to discern and make out, in the way of governing and saving man revealed by God, so excellent an œconomy, and such deep contrivances and wise dispensations, as may bring credit on the religion; not so much as it is Roman Catholic, or Protestant, or Socinian, but as it is CHRISTIAN."

² In justification of these, it has generally been urged, that the words, phrases, or clauses, so thrown out, are glossematical, and therefore spurious. On this point, however, the present Editor is entirely at issue with the Griesbachian School; and he has much pleasure in referring his readers to a masterly Commentatio by C. C. Tittmann de Glossematis N. T. rectè investigandis (at p. 501, sqq. of his Opusc. Theolog. Lips. 1803); as also an able and instructive Dissertation of Bornemann de Glossematis N. T. causè dijudicandis, Lips. 1830, who there completely refutes the rash assertions of Wassenbergh, in a Dissertation de Glossis appended to Valckenaer's Scholia ad Nov. Test.

the corrected text, formed on the best Manuscripts, ancient Versions, and early Editions. To advert to the various kinds of alterations of the Stephanic text, as they arise from the omission or the insertion of words, or from a change of one word into another,—nothing whatever has been omitted which has a place in that Text; such words only as are, by the almost universal consent of Editors and Critics, regarded as interpolations, being here placed within brackets, more or less inclusive, according to the degree of suspicion attached to them. Nothing has been inserted but on the same weighty authority; and even the inserted words are pointed out as insertions, by being expressed in a smaller character. All altered readings have asterisks prefixed, the old ones being invariably specified in the Notes. And such readings as, though left untouched, are by eminent Critics thought to need alteration, have a † prefixed. Such words (extremely few in number) as are, on good grounds, supposed to be corrupt readings, though the MSS. supply not the means of emendation, are designated by an obelus †. As to Various Readings, all really important ones are noticed; chiefly those which, though not admitted into the text of the present Edition, have been adopted by one or more of the great Editors, Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, and Scholz. In such cases, the reasons for non-adoption are usually adduced. And this has been done almost universally in the case of deviations from the Stephanic Text, however minute.

The division of the Text into paragraphs, instead of verses (though these are expressed in the inner margin), is agreeable to the custom of the most eminent Editors, from Wetstein to Scholz, and can need no justification. Indeed, scarcely any thing has had a more unfavourable effect on the interpretation of the New Testament, than the breaking up of the whole into verses; thus occasionally dis severing clauses closely connected in sense; and producing, at first sight, a false impression, by interrupting to the eye that continuity which must be obvious to the mind.

The Punctuation has been throughout very carefully adjusted, after a comparison of all the best Editions, from the Editio Princeps to that of Scholz. To each verse is subjoined, in the outer margin, a select body of the most apposite Parallel References, as adopted by Bp. Lloyd from Curcellæus. The citations from the Old Testament are expressed as such by being spaced out; and the words of any speaker are indicated by an appropriate mode of punctuation, and by the use of a Capital letter to designate their commencement.

The CRITICAL NOTES chiefly serve to give reasons for the methods pursued in forming the Text; but are introduced partly to illustrate important principles of Biblical Criticism.

As to the EXEGETICAL NOTES :—These are, for the most part, of the kind found in the best Critical Editions of the Greek Classical writers ; being meant to comprise whatever tends to the establishment of the grammatical and literal sense : and, in this department of his labours, the Author has availed himself of every aid that could be derived from all the best Commentators, ancient and modern. And as the meaning of any word is always a simple matter of fact, and, like all such, must require to be established by valid evidence, in showing the *usus loquendi*¹ ; so that evidence must be adduced, whether direct or indirect. In short, the method systematically adopted by the present Annotator, in order to ascertain the sense of passages of very doubtful or disputed meaning, has been this :—to seek their illustration, 1. From parallel passages of the New Testament either of the writer himself, or of the other writers of the New Testament ; thus making Scripture in some measure its own Interpreter. 2. From passages of the Septuagint, Josephus, and Philo. 3. From the Apostolical Fathers. 4. From Apocryphal Ecclesiastical writings of undoubted antiquity ; which are of considerable utility, as indicating the Theological opinions of the times when they were written, whether earlier or later than the New Testament : in the former case showing the opinions of the Jews previous to the promulgation of the Gospel ; in the latter, often contributing to the interpretation of the New Testament, and sometimes establishing its authenticity and uncorrupted preservation. 5. From the early Rabbinical writers. 6. From the Fathers of the Church in general, Greek and Latin, especially of the first four centuries, together with the Greek Commentators, Catenists, and Scholiasts. 7. From the Greek Classical writers, —especially those who lived after the formation of the Alexandrian and Hellenistic, Common or Popular dialect, so ably discussed formerly by Salmasius and Gataker, and recently by Planck and Winer. The illustrations derived from this last source are in general original, and, when not specifically ascribed to any Commentator or Critic, may usually be considered as such. The above may be denominated DIRECT evidence ; to which must be added the INDIRECT, in an examination of the scope, subject-matter, context, nature of the subject, analogy of language or doctrines, and finally *historical circumstances*², &c. In short, the great purpose of the Editor has been to apply the rules of hermeneutical science to the simple object of drawing forth from the words of any passage the sense intended by the sacred writer¹; to ascertain which he has been careful to trace the connexion of the clauses or sentences one with another, to indicate the course of thought or reasoning pursued by the writers, in order to present the general sense of any portion of Scripture. Moreover, in endeavouring to determine the true interpretation, the Editor has always aimed first at settling the grammatical and literal sense of any disputed passage; mindful of the pithy dictum of Scaliger, that all controversies in Theology arise from mistakes in grammar,—meaning thereby, in an extended sense, Philology in general. So it was a customary assertion of LUTHER, “optimum grammaticum, eum etiam optimum theologum esse;” and that “Theology is no other than grammar applied to the words and sentences of the Holy Spirit.” Indeed, as Bp. Middleton well observes,

² And here it may not be out of place to adduce Bp. Marsh's three rules of interpretation : 1. that authors must in general use their words in the sense in which they were generally understood ; 2. that the meaning of a word used by any writer is the meaning which was affixed to it by those for whom he immediately wrote ; and 3. that the words of an author must not be so explained

On this subject (which is one of no small importance) the reader is also referred to the instructive Lecture (L. i. ch. x. § 1) of Prof. Hey, entitled, ‘Of interpreting expressions of Scripture, by entering into the circumstances of those to whom they were immediately addressed.’ This, he shows, must be done “by endeavouring to put ourselves in the place of those who spoke or heard.” “As (continues he) we are far removed from the circumstances of those for whom they were calculated, we should see what knowledge the persons, rightly circumstanced for understanding them, had, which we have not; and we should analyze those acts of the mind by which they were able, habitually, without being conscious of it, to assign to their words precisely that degree of meaning which they were intended to convey. In short, to give ourselves their ideas and feelings; whereby we may be enabled to limit and apply expressions which, from the imperfection of human language, are too general and extensive to be taken literally. Now in order to bring ourselves into the situation of others, and learn their ideas and feelings, we must acquaint ourselves with their customs and opinions.” Finally, he shows (as does Bp. Marsh) that “it is alone by learning, and the study of various sciences, that we are let into those circumstances, and enabled to put ourselves into the proper position to judge of the sense.”

² Melancthon, too, who composed the Confession of Augsburg, used to affirm, “non posse evadere bonum Theologum, qui non antea fuerit bonus Interpres; neque posse Scripturam intelligi theologicè, nisi antea intellecta sit grammaticè.” In fact (as Bp. Marsh observes) “learning, and especially grammatical learning, was the pillar by which the edifice of the Reformation was supported.”

Again, the Editor has especially kept in view simplicity of sense, in opposition to far-fetched, however erudite, interpretations. On which subject it was well observed by the acute Maldonati, "Verior aliquando vulgi quam sapientum sententia est, quod dum simplicius veritatem quærit, facilius invenit." Words and phrases must not be taken in some recondite sense, such as men of learning and ingenuity, in quest of support for an hypothesis, may devise; but in the ordinary sense, in which the persons addressed, whether in preaching or writing, would be likely to understand them.

Moreover, the too frequent recurrence, in recent Commentators, to the principles of Pleonasm, Hebraism, &c. has been here studiously discountenanced, as well as all other Philological devices to dilute, pare down, or explain away the sense of Scripture¹; since it is ever to be borne in mind, as was well said by Bengel, "altæ sunt cogitationes sermonis sacræ (see Ps. xcii. 5, and 1 Cor. ii. 10); inde verba sunt inexhaustæ virtutis." Above all, care has been taken not to lower the august dignity of certain portions of the New Testament, by ill-judged attempts at explanation, where all explanation must fall short; since it respects "such knowledge as is too wonderful and excellent for us,—we cannot attain unto it." (Ps. cxxxix. 5.) In the words of Milton,

" Heaven is for thee too high
To know what passes there. Be lowly wise;
Contented that thus far hath been revealed."

In short, it has been every where the purpose of the Editor to inculcate the cultivation of that "knowledge within bounds"² (the φρονεῖν εἰς τὸ σωφρονεῖν of the Apostle, Rom. xii. 3.) of which it is well said by the same great Poet,

" Knowledge is as food; and needs no less
Her temp'rance over appetite; to know

So Tacitus says, to the praise of Agricola, "Retinuit (quod est difficillimum) ex scientia modum." And if he should be thought by any persons to have employed unnecessary pains in ascertaining the antiquity of interpretations, he would recommend to their consideration the weighty remark of Bp. Middleton, that "Theologians would do well to notice the antiquity of the opinions which they defend, because that antiquity is sometimes no inconsiderable evidence of truth." It has, however, been his aim to steer clear of any undue prepossession, whether in favour of antiquity on the one hand, or of novelty on the other¹; and he may truly say, with Strabo, βούλομαι τὸ ἀληθεῖς, ἢν τε παλαιὸν, ἢν τε νέον: or with Seneca, Epist. 33, "Quid ergo? non ibo per priorum vestigia? Ego verò utar viâ veteri: sed si priorem (Lege propriorem) planioremque invenero, hanc muniam. Qui antè nos ista moverunt, non domini nostri, sed duces sunt. Patet omnibus veritas, nondum est occupata, multum ex illa etiam futuris relictum est." In short, the Editor has every where endeavoured to unite the respective advantages of simple and solid old views, and also of ingenious and learned new ones; to which we may well apply what the great Grecian Historian (Thucydides vi. 18), says of the union of youth with age in deliberation and counsel:—νομίσατε νιότητα μὲν καὶ γῆρας ἀνευ ἀλλήλων μηδὲν δύνασθαι· ὁμοῦ δὲ τὸ τε παῦλον καὶ τὸ μέσον καὶ τὸ πᾶν ἀκριβές ἂν ζυγκραθὲν μάλιστα' ἂν ἰσχύειν. In certain cases, indeed, he has been enabled to justify and confirm, by the suffrage of antiquity, what had been unjustly rejected, or at least distrusted, as mere novelty; but, far more frequently, to show the solid grounds of interpretations, which it had been too long the fashion to reject, merely from their being old and common; though their antiquity and general reception ought rather to have argued them to be true, since, as Cicero well says, "Opinionum commenta delet dies, Naturæ ac veritatis judicia confirmat." See Bacon's Novum Organum, i. 74, init.

As to the much-controverted subject of the style of the New Testament, the Editor acquiesces in the opinions neither of those who regard the Greek as pure, nor of those who account it barbarous and ungrammatical. To maintain the former position, after the labours of so many eminent writers, from Salmasius, Gataker, and Vorstius downwards, were a vain attempt,—and as needless as vain; since, as Valckenaer observes, "Why should absolute purity of style be contended for in a book where we look for majesty of things, not dressed out in the trappings of human ornament?" And as to the latter, it surely does not follow, because some words of the New Test. are found no where else, that they originated¹ with the sacred writers, or were *barbarous*²; since there is great reason to suppose, that the Classical authors preserved to us do not contain a tenth part of the Greek language, as it existed at the beginning of the Christian æra. Such words or phrases, then, may have been used by the best writers,—or they may have formed part of the provincial, or popular³, colloquial and domestic phraseology, not preserved in any of the remains of antiquity.

Finally, it has been the uniform practice of the Editor fairly to avow, and courageously to encounter, the various difficulties⁴ which exist in the New

² There are not wanting expressions in the New Testament, which are rejected by some rash Critics, on the score of being formed contrary to analogy. But there are few of the most perfect Classical writers that might not furnish some such instances. As an example of which, it may suffice to adduce a form of expression occurring in one of the most finished compositions of antiquity—the Phœniæ of Euripides, v. 405, καὶ τοῦτο λυπρὸν, ξυνασφάζειν τοῖς μὴ σοφοῖς. Now here ξυνασ. is rejected by many Critics, (even the erudite Valckenaer) on the ground of being formed contrary to all analogy. Porson, however, prudently forbore to make any alteration; "since (says he) Euripides may have violated the usual rules for the sake of a stronger antithesis." Thus, in a similar manner, we may usually account for such so-called violations of analogy in the New Testament: ex. gr. Phil. ii. 30, in the case of the disputed term παράβουλεύεσθαι; where see Note.

Testament writings, especially the Epistles,—difficulties to the production of which numerous causes have concurred : the sources of which, and the extent of the acquirements necessary to the Interpreter of Scripture, are ably pointed out by Bp. Marsh, in his two first Lectures on the Interpretation of the Bible, and justly ascribed to distance of time and place, dissimilarity of laws and customs, language and forms of expression, habits of thought, and characteristics of every kind ; as different, indeed, as east from west. Much, however, of the difficulty is not peculiar to Scripture, but extends, more or less, to all ancient writings. Thus it has been truly said by Goethe, that “times long past are to us a seven-sealed book.” Let it, however, be borne in mind, that if the Scriptures be difficult, they have been permitted by Providence to be so for various wise purposes, ably pointed out by President Edwards, Works, vol. viii. p. 198 ; who there shows that “a Divine wisdom appears in ordering it thus.” And, as Bp. Marsh observes, “instead of complaining about difficulties, we must strive to surmount them, by obtaining the knowledge which God has given us the means of obtaining, and which, from its necessity, we may infer it is our duty to obtain.” But though confessedly difficult, the Scripture is (as the present work will sufficiently evince) far from being, what infidels would represent it, unintelligible, but is capable of a rational and consistent sense, if the same means be taken to ascertain it, as have been bestowed on other ancient writings. This, however, involves a question of no little importance,—whether the same principles must govern the interpretation of the New Testament, as those which are used in explaining other ancient writings. Now PLANCK, in his Introduction to Sacred Philology, says that the very same principles must be acted on ; as also does Bp. Marsh, Lectures, p. 321. But PROF. TURNER, of New York, in his Translation of Planck’s Work, judiciously modifies the rule as follows : “It cannot be denied that the same principles must govern the interpretation of Scripture as are used in explaining other writings : and yet the peculiar character of certain portions of Scripture is such as to allow, and very reasonably too, an interpretation which could not with certainty be elicited without conceding such a view of their character as cannot be pretended to apply to that of any other writings extant. I refer to whatever portions of the Old Testament are really typical of events connected with the New Dispensation, and also of those portions of the prophecies which, while they declare truths and facts in immediate connexion with that religious system under which the authors lived, do also announce other facts of a subsequent age, and identified with doctrines and realities belonging to the Gospel. In such cases the allowed principles by which writings in general are explained are not of themselves sufficient. The comment on the New Testament, which can in no case be proved to be incorrect, must be regarded by the Christian Expositor in the light of a principle beyond the ordinary principles of interpretation, and must become an additional aid to him in eliciting the true meaning. Compare Ps. viii. with Heb. ii. 6—9." Finally, it is well remarked by Servius, in his Catena on Job: "It is fit we should understand names according to the nature of the subject-matter, and not model the truth of things by the abusive signification of words."

To some, indeed, the remarkable diversity of interpretations, in not a few passages of the New Testament, may appear unaccountable. Yet this is no proof that the sense of Scripture is too uncertain to be determined; but merely that Exegetical science, as regards Scripture, was for a long time, and has been until a comparatively late period,—during which rapid strides have been made¹,—in a very imperfect state: a state of things may well be accounted for, from the manifest insufficiency, as Critics and Philologists, of by far the greater part of those who have undertaken to determine the sense of Scripture; few of whom have employed that accurate and scientific mode of interpretation found in the Annotations of the great Critics and Philologists of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries on the Greek Classical writers; "a constellation (as says the learned Mr. Mitchell on Aristophanes) in whose profound researches have been forged the golden keys, which unlock treasures infinitely more precious than any thing which Greece or Rome has left us; and in this sense Philology, though building her nest upon the earth, is found, like the songster, who also builds her nest there, bearing her wings and notes to the very gates of heaven." Another cause of this diversity of interpretations in the sacred Scriptures (and that peculiar to and inseparable from them) may be found in the vast extent of signification of many of the expressions there employed: the cause of which is ably adverted to by Bp. Sanderson, Sermon p. 595: "The necessity (says he) of expressing supernatural and Divine things, by words taken from natural or human affairs,

bath produced another necessity, of enlarging the significations of several of these words to a very great latitude; which is one especial cause of the diversity found in sundry parts of Scripture, and consequently of the difficulty of giving the proper and genuine sense of such places, and, as a consequence of that, of infinite disputes and controversies on points of religion." As instances of this he adduces the words Faith, Grace, and Spirit (to which he might have added Justification, and several other important terms); after which he subjoins the weighty remark, that "if all men could agree in what signification each of those words was to be understood in each of the passages where they are found, full three parts out of four of those unhappy controversies, that have been maintained in the Christian Church, would vanish."

The Editor must not omit to say, that he has given a new literal version of, or close paraphrase on, passages of more than ordinary difficulty, and has drawn up a series of glossarial Notes on all such words and phrases as seemed to require it. In the latter case he has endeavoured, in some instances, to combine and arrange what is scattered in the works of various Lexicographers and Philologists, and in others to supply their deficiencies. In all words and phrases of dubious import, he has endeavoured not only to fix their sense, but (in the words of JOHNSON) "to mark the progress of their meanings, and show by what gradations of intermediate sense, they have passed from their primitive to their remote and accidental signification:" in short, to give a sort of genealogy of the senses.

The Editor cannot conclude without expressing his feelings of devout thankfulness for that Gracious Aid from above, by which, under the pressure of various and formidable difficulties, and with such slender means as an inconsiderable benefice could supply, he has been enabled to complete two such arduous Theological works as his Recensio Synoptica, and the present Edition of the New Testament; works which, as a faithfully attached Son of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, he has the highest satisfaction in reflecting, are so strongly confirmatory of her doctrines, discipline, and principles. May she derive that accession of support from the contents of the present work, which it is well adapted to supply! Then indeed, unsparing as have been the sacrifices of health, fortune, comfort, and whatever is thought to render life desirable, which he has so long made in her service,—he will not, under any circumstances, think that he "has laboured in vain, and spent his strength for nought;" but, looking forward to that final "recompense of reward," which he humbly hopes to receive, at the great day of Account, from the CHIEF SHEPHERD, and LORD OF THE VINEYARD, he will ever say, in the words of the Apostle, Ἐν τοῦτω χαίρω, καὶ χαρήσομαι.

PREFACE

SECOND EDITION.

IN laying before the Public a second Edition of the present work, the Author feels it incumbent on him to briefly state the various points of alteration and, it is hoped, improvement, that he has been enabled to introduce, and which give this Edition a decided superiority over the former. Of these a most important one will be found in the accession of much valuable matter from many works of great rarity and value, which had not hitherto formed part of the writer's collection. And as, in the former Edition, he had especially applied himself to trace the fountain-heads of interpretation, as found in the early Fathers and the ancient Commentators, Scholiasts, and Glossographers, so in the present he has thought it expedient to turn his particular attention to a class of writers hitherto almost wholly neglected by the later Expositors,—the great REFORMERS, both of the continent and of this country. Besides these, he did not fail to extend his examination to those mighty "Masters in Israel," who succeeded our British Reformers, and flourished from the age of Elizabeth down to the middle of the last century. Moreover, together with a diligent use of the works above adverted to, the Editor also applied himself to a complete re-examination of the whole body of criticism and interpretation. With what success he has carried into execution the extensive plans of improvement, which partly occurred to himself on mature deliberation, and partly were suggested by some eminent Biblical Scholars, will appear from an examination of the work itself; and in order that the reader may the better understand the points of difference between the former Edition and the present, it will be proper to specify the nature and extent of the various alterations introduced into the latter.

In the first place, the punctuation of the Text has been every where very carefully revised, and, as the Editor trusts, considerably improved. In adjusting it, it was his aim to steer a due medium between the two extremes—one (that into which the earlier Editors fell) of placing too many stops, and the other (that of the recent Foreign Scholars) of employing too tw. Moreover, the (·), or μέση στίγμη, has here been frequently used, where the earlier Editors had employed the period; thereby, too often, breaking up the continuity of the discourse; which is, above all things, to be avoided,—especially in the Epistles of St. Paul. It is, indeed, a considerable defect in the system of Greek Punctuation, that it is unprovided with a stop answering to our colon; by which the μέση στίγμη has to be employed to express both the semicolon, which it can express, and the colon, which it cannot. To in some degree remedy this evil, the Editor has occasionally employed the period followed by a small, instead of a capital, letter, as answering to our colon. The greatest difficulty, however, connected with the punctuation of the New Testament is in placing the comma; for, as Winer observes, “though it is clear that none but a grammatically perfect proposition ought to be pointed off by a comma (nay, for this very purpose the comma was originally invented), yet to a grammatically perfect proposition belong not only subject, predicate, and copula (which three may be found either expressed, or left to be understood), but likewise the whole construction of a proposition, every particular forming one among several words mutually connected, without which the proposition would yield a defective sense.” It must, of course, be occasionally difficult to decide on the matter. Indeed the learned writer himself admits that it is impossible to form any certain rules applicable to all cases, as regards the placing or not placing of the comma, which must vary according to circumstances too minute to be specified. In the use of the comma the present Editor has (after the example of all the recent foreign Scholars of eminence) deviated still more from the old mode of punctuation; which, while it seems to consult what is called the logical conjunction of the words, yet, in effect, by loading a long sentence with commas, and needlessly breaking it up into minute portions, renders the construction doubtful, and throws an uncertainty and obscurity over the sense of the whole passage. In the use of the Parenthesis, the Editor has observed the greatest care; often removing it where it had been generally employed, and occasionally employing it where it had not before been introduced. He has also sometimes adopted, as very convenient, the Hypo-parenthesis. Moreover he has everywhere been careful that the punctuation in his Text shall not be inconsistent with what, in his Annotations, he has shown to be probably the true interpretation.

Another feature of convenience and utility will be found in the Marginal Parallel References having been, in the first three Gospels, transferred from the outer Margin to the Notes (where they are printed, with the word Comp. prefixed in Italica, within brackets), and the place they formerly occupied assigned to (what was first suggested to the Author by the recent Foreign Edition of the New Testament, for Academical use, by Prof. Vater) a Tabu- lar arrangement of Harmonic Parallels, exhibiting at one view references to all the portions of the other two Gospels common with that under perusal, and accordingly presenting the complete Narration of the Evangelists.

With respect to the TEXT itself, it is, with a few exceptions, the same as in the preceding Edition; and with reason;—since the Editor's opinions as to the origin and character of the Griesbachian text are, after much further research, precisely the same as before. In deference, however, to the opinions of eminent scholars, the Editor has, in the present Edition, more frequently introduced the mark † expressive of doubt, at the same time detailing the proposed readings in the Notes.

Another important feature of improvement in the present Edition is, that regular INTRODUCTIONS are given to all the Books of the New Testament; whereas, in the former, they were prefixed to a few only, in the latter part of the second Volume. These Introductions are, indeed, some of them comparatively brief, but they will, nevertheless, it is hoped, be found to comprehend the discussion of all points of any material importance, and occasionally to contain views that had not occurred to former inquirers, nay such as may contribute not a little to the settling of questions which have been long disputed; as, for instance, on the sources of the first three Gospels,—and on the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

Of the ANNOTATIONS, Critical and Exegetical, the former, discussing the true reading of passages, will be found, in the present Edition, far more numerous; and several of those contained in the preceding are in this enlarged, and, more or less, improved, and not a few re-written. The same may be said of another class of notes closely connected in their nature with those,—namely, Critical discussions on the use of the Greek Article in the New Testament, and on Greek Idioms, especially as regards the Hellenistic dialect found in the Alexandrian and later writers, compared with the phraseology of the earlier and purer authors. But the most extensive and important additions will be found—where they were most needed—in the EXEGETICAL notes. Now these, in the former Edition, were not so much in continuity as seemed desirable; there being too often a want of that connecting thread which binds all together. This, and occasionally the passing over of certain matters, which to some persons required elucidation,—or which seemed too extensive to be treated of in a work of this nature,—had almost entirely arisen from the Annotator's fear of overrunning the narrow limits prescribed to the work. In the present Edition these deficiencies have been carefully supplied, and the connexion and course of argument regularly traced; moreover no topics have been avoided merely from their extensiveness, except such as respect matters of History, Chronology, and the Harmony of the Gospels (on which he begs to refer his readers to the elaborate works of Dr. Hales, Mr. Townsend, and especially Mr. Greswell), or of Biblical Antiquities, on which they will, of course, consult Mr. Horne's invaluable Introduction. The general sense, too, of a whole passage will in this Edition be found far more frequently laid down than in the former: a procedure alike agreeable to good taste and propriety; for since, by his critical examination of the construction of a passage, and the import of words and phrases contained therein, the Commentator has, as it were, to take it to pieces, in order to point out the structure and show the import, so, by a neat paraphrastic version, conveying the full sense, he is enabled to put it together again, and present it as a whole. Moreover, a far greater number of illustrations of phraseology or sentiment from the Classical writers, and likewise from Josephus and Philo Judæus, (for the most part original) are now adduced, as also a still more regular series of glossarial notes on all words or phrases involving any real difficulty.

On the QUOTATIONS FROM THE OLD TESTAMENT much more will be found accomplished in this than in the former Edition; though, at the same time, the Editor is ready to admit, that not a little still remains to be effected, in order to place in a clear point of view the amount of discrepancy between the readings in the New Testament and those of the Septuagint, or of the Hebrew original respectively; and to point out the best mode of removing, or of accounting for it.

To advert to the details of enlargement in the Annotations, considerable additions and improvements will be found, more or less, on all the Books of the New Testament, but especially on the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. John, and the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles to the Romans, 1st and 2d Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, and, above all, on the Epistle to the Hebrews. The Editor is, indeed, not aware of any one passage of real difficulty, which has not received such an ample discussion as may, to most inquirers, appear sufficient to enable them to ascertain the true sense. On certain portions, indeed, far more than ordinary labour has been bestowed, so as to almost entitle the Notes to the name of Exegetical Dissertations.

The Editor has also (agreeably to a very generally expressed wish) introduced far more of original matter than before; and, in all cases which involved any doubt or difficulty, given his own opinion as to the true interpretation. At the same time he has, generally, assigned his reasons for such opinion; not meaning, however, to assume that he has always fixed on the true interpretation: though, in cases where he has missed it, he has, he trusts, materially facilitated the labours of others, and, in the words of a great scholar, "pontem struxerit aliis transituris ad veriora ¹."

Finally, it will be found not the least useful feature of this new Edition, that INDEXES (both of Greek words and phrases explained, and of matters discussed in the Annotations) have been drawn up with the greatest care; and to these the reader is earnestly requested to recur, whenever he is in want of any explanation of a word or phrase, and does not find it in the Notes; since, in order to save room for more important purposes, the Editor has, in general, been content to give an explanation only once, and afterwards to leave it to be recurred to by the reader,—either with a reference in the Notes, or (as such references would have occupied too much room) without it, when it might readily be found by the aid of the Indexes.

Thus much may suffice to point out the nature and extent of the various additions and alterations in the work now again submitted by the Editor to the candour of the Public; and he trusts they will be found such as to render his labours not unworthy of a continuance of that patronage with which they have hitherto been honoured. Nor does he despair of approbation from those who “knowing (as Samuel Johnson observes) the scantiness of human knowledge, the fallibility of memory, and the unsteadiness of attention, can compare the causes of error with the means of avoiding it, and the extent of art with the capacity of man.” In short, although he cannot hope, in a work of such great extent, and so multifarious in the matter of which it consists, to have entirely avoided errors, yet he can with truth say that it has been his anxious study to mislead no one¹.

prelation) he has never dissembled such change, nor hesitated to alter, or even re-write, what he had before written; for he felt (with Professor Hey, Lect. vol. i. p. 4), that “since, from the progressive nature of mental acquirements, nothing is more probable, than that we should, on repeated examination, discern truth where we had before not discovered it; so no one need be ashamed to retract an opinion, or acknowledge an error.” Thus St. Augustine published two books of retractions, and Abp. Tillotson well says, to the praise of Dr. Whichcote, that “he thought it no disparagement to alter his judgment. For he was so wise, as to be willing to learn to the last; knowing that no man can grow wiser without some change of his mind; without gaining some knowledge which he had not, or correcting some error under which he had before laboured.”

¹ Accordingly he has endeavoured to keep his mind free from any party bias, and has aimed at preserving the strictest impartiality in adjusting the interpretation of those passages, which involve doctrines, whereon any difference of opinion exists among the various denominations of professing Christians. At any rate, he has studiously avoided treating on any such passage polemically, or controversially; sensible that there are not a few cases, wherein, as Professor Hey truly remarks (Lect. i. 111) “two men cannot, in reality, be contending about any thing more than the comparative value of two human judgments; in which case they can only weigh fallibility against fallibility.” Indeed, so far from aggravating the bitterness of the odium Theologicum (that party-spirit in Religion), which, in the words of Dr. Hutcheson, “seeks to cantonize men into sects, for trifling causes,” he would rather, with those eminent Prelates of our Church, Bp. Stillingfleet, Bp. Sanderson (in his Pax Ecclesiæ), and Bp. Jeremy Taylor (in his incomparable Discourse, before the University of Dublin, entitled Via Intelligentiæ), sound an Irenicum to his Ministerial brethren of every denomination, and warn them against rending the seamless vest of Christ, their common Lord and Master. Earnestly would he entreat them not to “fall out by the way,” but, agreeably to the

Much, it is true, of what has been accomplished in this second Edition, might, under other circumstances, have been effected in the first. This, however, was rendered impracticable by the various disadvantages, difficulties, and hindrances under which the work was formed; of which a great and principal one was, the highly unfavourable situation in which the present, as well as his preceding labours, had been carried on—an obscure country village, in a remote part of the kingdom, which his old and valued friend, the late Dr. Samuel Parr, not without reason used to term “the very Ultima Thule of civilization.” Here, added to various other disadvantages, was that serious one of great distance from the press, and the many inconveniences and delays attendant thereon. Moreover, the Editor had not only constantly upon him the charge of two parishes (and thus was continually obliged to carry forward his labours in παρέργῳ), but had continually to experience the pressure of those carking cares, (necessarily involved in scanty, precarious, and continually decreasing resources) which may emphatically be said to drag the mind downward, that would fain ascend upward.

The writer is induced (most unwillingly) thus to allude to matters of private and personal concern,—as feeling it due to the purchasers of the work in its first Edition, to give this explanation of the causes (beyond his control) which occasioned what, under other circumstances, would not have occurred. It is true that the same—nay, even greater—difficulties impeded him in his

prayer of their common Lord, to “be all of one mind;” in short, “to agree to differ,” ever remembering the maxim of a great ancient Father, “In rebus necessariis unitas, in dubiis libertas, in omnibus caritas.” “It is (says Bp. Sanderson, Sermon on Rom. xv. 5) a perfect and blessed unity, when all these three meet together,—unity of true doctrine, unity of loving affection, and unity of peaceable conversation. And this perfection ought to be both in our aims and endeavours. But if, through our own weakness, or the waywardness of others, we cannot attain to the full perfection of the whole, it will be some commendation and comfort to us, to have attained as much as we could; see Phil. iii. 1.” Thus it is well said by another of the great ornaments of our Church (Bp. Taylor): “If any man differs from me in opinion, I am not troubled at it; but tell him that truth is in the understanding, and charity is in the will; and is, or ought to be, there before either his or my opinion on those matters can enter; and therefore that we ought to love alike, though we do not understand alike.” Indeed, that much difference of opinion should exist on the most important of all subjects, in common with those of far less moment, is, from various causes, unavoidable. “Men’s understandings (observes Bp. Sanderson, in his Sermon on Rom. xv. 5) are not all of one size and temper; and even they who have the largest and clearest, yet know but in part, and are therefore subject to errors and misapprehensions. Hence it cannot be hoped there should be such a consonancy of judgment among all men,—not even among wise and godly men,—but that in many things, yea, sometimes those of great importance, they may and will dissent one from another to the world’s end. But then good heed should be taken lest difference in judgment should, in process of time, first estrange by little and little, and at length quite alienate our affections one from another. It is one thing to dissent from, another to be at discord with, our brethren. Ita dissensi ab illo (says Tully concerning himself and Cato) ut in disjunctione sententiarum, conjuncti tamen amicitia maneremus.”

exertions on this second Edition : but what may not the labor improbus of several years, under Divine blessing, accomplish ? And, in fact, when literary undertakings beyond the strength of any one man are to be carried forward by a single individual, under signal disadvantages,—whatever is accomplished cannot be done at once ; but only by stages, just as the labourer may, after some breathing-time, gather fresh strength and spirits to work withal ; and, moreover, as the cares necessary to provide for the passing day may give him opportunity to labour with effect. In fact, the Editor was resolved to put forth his whole strength, while he had yet the power, to accomplish what remained still to be done, to make the work what it might and ought to be. He was anxious to “work while it was yet day,”—aware that “the night” could not be far off, “when no man can work.” Should, however, a bright and calm evening be mercifully granted to him after the cloudy and stormy day of his past life, and he be thus enabled to complete what he has further ventured, in subservience to the Divine will, to mark out in mind as the extent of his labours in the service of the Sanctuary,—he shall, he hopes, be ready, under Divine Grace, to deliver up an account of “that which hath been committed to his trust ;” content, under all circumstances, that “his cause is with the Lord, and his work with his God.”

Nor can he conclude without expressing his deeply thankful sense of the Gracious Aid from above, which has been mercifully vouchsafed to him during his long and anxious labours on the present Work. And he desires to offer up his fervent prayers to “the Father of lights,”—without whose help and blessing all labour is ineffectual, and without whose enlightening “Spirit of grace” all wisdom is but folly,—that the present performance may be blessed to the right understanding of those Holy Scriptures, which are alone “able to make us wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus.” Amen.

PREFACE

TO THE

THIRD EDITION.

It is with feelings of no ordinary satisfaction, that the Author proceeds to again address the Public, after so short a time, as that which has elapsed since he laid before them the Second Edition of this work. That an unusually large impression should so soon have been exhausted, is a testimony of the public approbation of which he may justly feel proud; especially when it is considered, that during the same period probably a larger number of copies have been dispersed in AMERICA, in a Stereotype Reprint of the Second Edition, brought out under the care of the celebrated Professor Stuart, and printed at the University Press, Cambridge, Massachusetts. Contemplating the probability that a third Edition would ere long be called for, the Author, after the publication of the Second, lost no time in applying himself to a careful investigation of all the improvements of which the work was still susceptible. And he now proceeds to lay before the Public the results of three years of incessant labour devoted to the carrying into effect the extensive plans of improvement which he had been induced to form.

Having, in the Prefaces to the first and second Editions, sufficiently unfolded the plan and principles on which the present work has been formed, the Author feels that little more is here necessary, than to advert to the various features of improvement in the present Edition, on which he has bestowed all the labour and pains possible;—because it was his determination that the work should remain henceforth as it now is, undergoing no change in any future Editions. Hence he has been careful to introduce all the additions which he deemed necessary in a work of this kind;—additions, it is true, far greater than he had originally contemplated, but which, he can assure his readers, have not been made without mature deliberation. He was, indeed, induced to make them thus considerable, partly from the great quantity of important matter collected by him from various scarce and valuable works, ancient and modern, which had not come into his possession when he formed his second Edition; and partly because, his RECENSIO SYNOPTICA having become out of print and, when complete, scarce,—he was anxious that the purchasers of his Greek Testament should be put into possession of as much of the choicest matter contained in that immense storehouse of Exegetical lore, as the nature of a Manual Edition would permit¹.

But to proceed to a specification of the chief features of improvement, in the order of Text, Margin, and Notes. The Text has been most carefully re-examined throughout, and at length finally settled, so as to form what may be called a new and, the Editor trusts, accurate Recension. In a few important passages, new readings have been, at length, received into the Text, either on later conviction of their truth, or in deference to the united opinions of Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz. And where the Editor could not venture to adopt their readings, he has never failed to prefix to the words the mark expressive of doubt, besides adverting to the state of the evidence for and against in his Notes.

The Punctuation has been again most carefully revised, and, the Editor trusts, not a little improved. The Tabular Harmonic Parallels on the first three Gospels have been carefully compared with the original texts, and occasionally improved, chiefly by reference to the very valuable "Harmonia Evangelica," and "Dissertations" of Mr. Greswell. The Marginal Parallel References have been diligently examined throughout, and very much improved, partly by the removal of inapposite references, but chiefly by the introduction of new and apposite ones, adopted from one or other of the most approved Collections.

The chief improvement, however, will be found in the ANNOTATIONS, the whole of which have undergone a strict examination and revision, including a careful verification of all the citations from, or references to, the Scriptures or the Classical writers,—by which some typographical errors have been discovered and corrected. Of the Annotations, the Critical Notes will be found not a little increased in number, as well as importance, especially by a perpetual reference to the recent elaborate Critical Edition of the New Testa-

ment, with Various Readings, by Dr. Scholz,—the chief results of whose long and laborious researches are here laid before the reader. The Explanatory Notes have received even greater attention than the Critical, and will now be found to form a perpetual Commentary in Epitome, wherein the connexion with the context is every where traced, the course of thought or argument indicated, and the harmony of sentiment or doctrine of one part of Scripture with other parts thereof pointed out. In the course of these Notes is introduced a vast mass of new and valuable matter, derived from a variety of sources,—both from recent and able Foreign works, and valuable and scarce old ones, chiefly those of the great Reformers, or their immediate successors; but also from various early modern Commentators of great merit, though, from their extreme rarity, little known¹, besides a large portion of new original matter every where interspersed. Moreover, in the present Edition far more numerous parallel constructions, or similar sentiments, are adduced from the Septuagint, Philo, and Josephus; and especially from the Classical writers of every age;—interwoven with which will be found some select illustrations from the Rabbinical writers, collected from Lightfoot, Schoettgen, and Meuschen. Farther, the Glossarial Notes, illustrative of words and phrases, have been much increased in number, and improved in substance; insomuch that, by the aid of the new and greatly enlarged and improved INDEXES (constructed purposely for this Edition), the reader will rarely find it necessary to refer to a Greek Lexicon.

Finally, an entirely new Map of Palestine and Syria, formed with the greatest care from the most recent authorities, and beautifully engraven on steel by Hall, is prefixed to the work. Though small, it is sufficiently comprehensive to contain every place mentioned in the New Test. and, in a great measure, Josephus.

The Editor must not omit to notice, that very great pains have been bestowed to secure the utmost typographical accuracy. For this purpose repeated revises of every sheet have been gone through by the Author himself; who has, for that purpose, been constantly resident very near the Press, and in continual communication with his very intelligent and able Printers, Messrs. Gilbert and Rivington. So that, upon the whole, a degree of typographical accuracy has been, he trusts, attained, somewhat rare in this country.

¹ Among these the Editor would particularly specify HYPERIUS, whose Commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul he considers, next to that of Calvin (to which, for profundity of thought, and able investigation of the logic or course of reasoning of the sacred writers,—for spirituality of sentiment, and deep knowledge of the mind of the Spirit, must ever be assigned the first place) the most valuable of all the earlier expository works, and from which, on account of its extreme rarity, he has made frequent extracts of the choicest matter, generally translated into English.

PREFACE

SECOND EDITION.

IN laying before the Public a second Edition of the present work, the Author feels it incumbent on him to briefly state the various points of alteration and, it is hoped, improvement, that he has been enabled to introduce, and which give this Edition a decided superiority over the former. Of these a most important one will be found in the accession of much valuable matter from many works of great rarity and value, which had not hitherto formed part of the writer's collection. And as, in the former Edition, he had especially applied himself to trace the fountain-heads of interpretation, as found in the early Fathers and the ancient Commentators, Scholiasts, and Glossographers, so in the present he has thought it expedient to turn his particular attention to a class of writers hitherto almost wholly neglected by the later Expositors,—the great REFORMERS, both of the continent and of this country. Besides these, he did not fail to extend his examination to those mighty "Masters in Israel," who succeeded our British Reformers, and flourished from the age of Elizabeth down to the middle of the last century. Moreover, together with a diligent use of the works above adverted to, the Editor also applied himself to a complete re-examination of the whole body of criticism and interpretation. With what success he has carried into execution the extensive plans of improvement, which partly occurred to himself on mature deliberation, and partly were suggested by some eminent Biblical Scholars, will appear from an examination of the work itself; and in order that the reader may the better understand the points of difference between the former Edition and the present, it will be proper to specify the nature and extent of the various alterations introduced into the latter.

In the first place, the punctuation of the Text has been every where very carefully revised, and, as the Editor trusts, considerably improved. In adjusting it, it was his aim to steer a due medium between the two extremes—one (that into which the earlier Editors fell) of placing too many stops, and the other (that of the recent Foreign Scholars) of employing too few. Moreover, the (·), or μῆση στίγμη, has here been frequently used, where the earlier Editors had employed the period; thereby, too often, breaking up the continuity of the discourse; which is, above all things, to be avoided,—especially in the Epistles of St. Paul. It is, indeed, a considerable defect in the system of Greek Punctuation, that it is unprovided with a stop answering to our colon; by which the μῆση στίγμη has to be employed to express both the semicolon, which it can express, and the colon, which it cannot. To in some degree remedy this evil, the Editor has occasionally employed the period followed by a small, instead of a capital, letter, as answering to our colon. The greatest difficulty, however, connected with the punctuation of the New Testament is in placing the comma; for, as Winer observes, “though it is clear that none but a grammatically perfect proposition ought to be pointed off by a comma (nay, for this very purpose the comma was originally invented), yet to a grammatically perfect proposition belong not only subject, predicate, and copula (which three may be found either expressed, or left to be understood), but likewise the whole construction of a proposition, every particular forming one among several words mutually connected, without which the proposition would yield a defective sense.” It must, of course, be occasionally difficult to decide on the matter. Indeed the learned writer himself admits that it is impossible to form any certain rules applicable to all cases, as regards the placing or not placing of the comma, which must vary according to circumstances too minute to be specified. In the use of the comma the present Editor has (after the example of all the recent foreign Scholars of eminence) deviated still more from the old mode of punctuation; which, while it seems to consult what is called the logical conjunction of the words, yet, in effect, by loading a long sentence with commas, and needlessly breaking it up into minute portions, renders the construction doubtful, and throws an uncertainty and obscurity over the sense of the whole passage. In the use of the Parenthesis, the Editor has observed the greatest care; often removing it where it had been generally employed, and occasionally employing it where it had not before been introduced. He has also sometimes adopted, as very convenient, the Hypo-parenthesis. Moreover he has everywhere been careful that the punctuation in his Text shall not be inconsistent with what, in his Annotations, he has shown to be probably the true interpretation.

Another feature of convenience and utility will be found in the Marginal Parallel References having been, in the first three Gospels, transferred from the outer Margin to the Notes (where they are printed, with the word Comp. prefixed in Italics, within brackets), and the place they formerly occupied assigned to (what was first suggested to the Author by the recent Foreign Edition of the New Testament, for Academical use, by Prof. Vater) a Tabu- lar arrangement of Harmonic Parallels, exhibiting at one view references to all the portions of the other two Gospels common with that under perusal, and accordingly presenting the complete Narration of the Evangelists.

With respect to the TEXT itself, it is, with a few exceptions, the same as in the preceding Edition; and with reason;—since the Editor's opinions as to the origin and character of the Griesbachian text are, after much further research, precisely the same as before. In deference, however, to the opinions of eminent scholars, the Editor has, in the present Edition, more frequently introduced the mark † expressive of doubt, at the same time detailing the proposed readings in the Notes.

Another important feature of improvement in the present Edition is, that regular INTRODUCTIONS are given to all the Books of the New Testament; whereas, in the former, they were prefixed to a few only, in the latter part of the second Volume. These Introductions are, indeed, some of them comparatively brief, but they will, nevertheless, it is hoped, be found to comprehend the discussion of all points of any material importance, and occasionally to contain views that had not occurred to former inquirers, nay such as may contribute not a little to the settling of questions which have been long disputed; as, for instance, on the sources of the first three Gospels,—and on the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

Of the ANNOTATIONS, Critical and Exegetical, the former, discussing the true reading of passages, will be found, in the present Edition, far more numerous; and several of those contained in the preceding are in this enlarged, and, more or less, improved, and not a few re-written. The same may be said of another class of notes closely connected in their nature with those,—namely, Critical discussions on the use of the Greek Article in the New Testament, and on Greek Idioms, especially as regards the Hellenistic dialect found in the Alexandrian and later writers, compared with the phraseology of the earlier and purer authors. But the most extensive and important additions will be found—where they were most needed—in the EXEGETICAL notes. Now these, in the former Edition, were not so much in continuity as seemed desirable; there being too often a want of that connecting thread which binds all together. This, and occasionally the passing over of certain matters, which to some persons required elucidation,—or which seemed too extensive to be treated of in a work of this nature,—had almost entirely arisen from the Annotator's fear of overrunning the narrow limits prescribed to the work. In the present Edition these deficiencies have been carefully supplied, and the connexion and course of argument regularly traced; moreover no topics have been avoided merely from their extensiveness, except such as respect matters of History, Chronology, and the Harmony of the Gospels (on which he begs to refer his readers to the elaborate works of Dr. Hales, Mr. Townsend, and especially Mr. Greswell, or of Biblical Antiquities, on which they will, of course, consult Mr. Horne's invaluable Introduction. The general sense, too, of a whole passage will in this Edition be found far more frequently laid down than in the former: a procedure alike agreeable to good taste and propriety; for since, by his critical examination of the construction of a passage, and the import of words and phrases contained therein, the Commentator has, as it were, to take it to pieces, in order to point out the structure and show the import, so, by a neat paraphrastic version, conveying the full sense, he is enabled to put it together again, and present it as a whole. Moreover, a far greater number of illustrations of phraseology or sentiment from the Classical writers, and likewise from Josephus and Philo Judæus, (for the most part original) are now adduced, as also a still more regular series of glossarial notes on all words or phrases involving any real difficulty.

On the QUOTATIONS FROM THE OLD TESTAMENT much more will be found accomplished in this than in the former Edition; though, at the same time, the Editor is ready to admit, that not a little still remains to be effected, in order to place in a clear point of view the amount of discrepancy between the readings in the New Testament and those of the Septuagint, or of the Hebrew original respectively; and to point out the best mode of removing, or of accounting for it.

To advert to the details of enlargement in the Annotations, considerable additions and improvements will be found, more or less, on all the Books of the New Testament, but especially on the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. John, and the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles to the Romans, 1st and 2d Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, and, above all, on the Epistle to the Hebrews. The Editor is, indeed, not aware of any one passage of real difficulty, which has not received such an ample discussion as may, to most inquirers, appear sufficient to enable them to ascertain the true sense. On certain portions, indeed, far more than ordinary labour has been bestowed, so as to almost entitle the Notes to the name of Exegetical Dissertations.

The Editor has also (agreeably to a very generally expressed wish) introduced far more of original matter than before; and, in all cases which involved any doubt or difficulty, given his own opinion as to the true interpretation. At the same time he has, generally, assigned his reasons for such opinion; not meaning, however, to assume that he has always fixed on the true interpretation: though, in cases where he has missed it, he has, he trusts, materially facilitated the labours of others, and, in the words of a great scholar, "pontem struxerit aliis transituris ad veriora ¹."

Finally, it will be found not the least useful feature of this new Edition, that INDEXES (both of Greek words and phrases explained, and of matters discussed in the Annotations) have been drawn up with the greatest care; and to these the reader is earnestly requested to recur, whenever he is in want of any explanation of a word or phrase, and does not find it in the Notes; since, in order to save room for more important purposes, the Editor has, in general, been content to give an explanation only once, and afterwards to leave it to be recurred to by the reader,—either with a reference in the Notes, or (as such references would have occupied too much room) without it, when it might readily be found by the aid of the Indexes.

Thus much may suffice to point out the nature and extent of the various additions and alterations in the work now again submitted by the Editor to the candour of the Public; and he trusts they will be found such as to render his labours not unworthy of a continuance of that patronage with which they have hitherto been honoured. Nor does he despair of approbation from those who “knowing (as Samuel Johnson observes) the scantiness of human knowledge, the fallibility of memory, and the unsteadiness of attention, can compare the causes of error with the means of avoiding it, and the extent of art with the capacity of man.” In short, although he cannot hope, in a work of such great extent, and so multifarious in the matter of which it consists, to have entirely avoided errors, yet he can with truth say that it has been his anxious study to mislead no one¹.

pretation) he has never dissembled such change, nor hesitated to alter, or even re-write, what he had before written; for he felt (with Professor Hey, Lect. vol. i. p. 4), that “since, from the progressive nature of mental acquirements, nothing is more probable, than that we should, on repeated examination, discern truth where we had before not discovered it; so no one need be ashamed to retract an opinion, or acknowledge an error.” Thus St. Augustine published two books of retractions, and Abp. Tillotson well says, to the praise of Dr. Whichcote, that “he thought it no disparagement to alter his judgment. For he was so wise, as to be willing to learn to the last; knowing that no man can grow wiser without some change of his mind; without gaining some knowledge which he had not, or correcting some error under which he had before laboured.”

¹ Accordingly he has endeavoured to keep his mind free from any party bias, and has aimed at preserving the strictest impartiality in adjusting the interpretation of those passages, which involve doctrines, whereon any difference of opinion exists among the various denominations of professing Christians. At any rate, he has studiously avoided treating on any such passage polemically, or controversially; sensible that there are not a few cases, wherein, as Professor Hey truly remarks (Lect. i. 111) “two men cannot, in reality, be contending about any thing more than the comparative value of two human judgments; in which case they can only weigh fallibility against fallibility.” Indeed, so far from aggravating the bitterness of the odium Theologicum (that party-spirit in Religion), which, in the words of Dr. Hutcheson, “seeks to cantonize men into sects, for trifling causes,” he would rather, with those eminent Prelates of our Church, Bp. Stillingfleet, Bp. Sanderson (in his Pax Ecclesie), and Bp. Jeremy Taylor (in his incomparable Discourse, before the University of Dublin, entitled Via Intelligentie), sound an Irenicum to his Ministerial brethren of every denomination, and warn them against rending the seamless vest of Christ, their common Lord and Master. Earnestly would he entreat them not to “fall out by the way,” but, agreeably to the

Much, it is true, of what has been accomplished in this second Edition, might, under other circumstances, have been effected in the first. This, however, was rendered impracticable by the various disadvantages, difficulties, and hindrances under which the work was formed; of which a great and principal one was, the highly unfavourable situation in which the present, as well as his preceding labours, had been carried on—an obscure country village, in a remote part of the kingdom, which his old and valued friend, the late Dr. Samuel Parr, not without reason used to term “the very Ultima Thule of civilization.” Here, added to various other disadvantages, was that serious one of great distance from the press, and the many inconveniences and delays attendant thereon. Moreover, the Editor had not only constantly upon him the charge of two parishes (and thus was continually obliged to carry forward his labours in παράρρη), but had continually to experience the pressure of those carking cares, (necessarily involved in scanty, precarious, and continually decreasing resources) which may emphatically be said to drag the mind downward, that would fain ascend upward.

The writer is induced (most unwillingly) thus to allude to matters of private and personal concern,—as feeling it due to the purchasers of the work in its first Edition, to give this explanation of the causes (beyond his control) which occasioned what, under other circumstances, would not have occurred. It is true that the same—nay, even greater—difficulties impeded him in his

prayer of their common Lord, to “be all of one mind;” in short, “to agree to differ,” ever remembering the maxim of a great ancient Father, “In rebus necessariis unitas, in dubiis libertas, in omnibus caritas.” “It is (says Bp. Sanderson, Sermon on Rom. xv. 5) a perfect and blessed unity, when all these threes meet together,—unity of true doctrine, unity of loving affection, and unity of peaceable conversation. And this perfection ought to be both in our aims and endeavours. But if, through our own weakness, or the waywardness of others, we cannot attain to the full perfection of the whole, it will be some commendation and comfort to us, to have attained as much as we could; see Phil. iii. 1.” Thus it is well said by another of the great ornaments of our Church (Bp. Taylor): “If any man differs from me in opinion, I am not troubled at it; but tell him that truth is in the understanding, and charity is in the will; and is, or ought to be, there before either his or my opinion on those matters can enter; and therefore that we ought to love alike, though we do not understand alike.” Indeed, that much difference of opinion should exist on the most important of all subjects, in common with those of far less moment, is, from various causes, unavoidable. “Men’s understandings (observes Bp. Sanderson, in his Sermon on Rom. xv. 5) are not all of one size and temper; and even they who have the largest and clearest, yet know but in part, and are therefore subject to errors and misapprehensions. Hence it cannot be hoped there should be such a consonancy of judgment among all men,—not even among wise and godly men,—but that in many things, yea, sometimes those of great importance, they may and will dissent one from another to the world’s end. But then good heed should be taken lest difference in judgment should, in process of time, first estrange by little and little, and at length quite alienate our affections one from another. It is one thing to dissent from, another to be at discord with, our brethren. Ita dissensui ab illo (says Tully concerning himself and Cato) ut in disjunctione sententiarum, conjuncti tamen amicitia maneremus.”

exertions on this second Edition : but what may not the labor improbus of several years, under Divine blessing, accomplish ? And, in fact, when literary undertakings beyond the strength of any one man are to be carried forward by a single individual, under signal disadvantages,—whatever is accomplished cannot be done at once ; but only by stages, just as the labourer may, after some breathing-time, gather fresh strength and spirits to work withal ; and, moreover, as the cares necessary to provide for the passing day may give him opportunity to labour with effect. In fact, the Editor was resolved to put forth his whole strength, while he had yet the power, to accomplish what remained still to be done, to make the work what it might and ought to be. PREFACE

THIRD EDITION.

It is with feelings of no ordinary satisfaction, that the Author proceeds to again address the Public, after so short a time, as that which has elapsed since he laid before them the Second Edition of this work. That an unusually large impression should so soon have been exhausted, is a testimony of the public approbation of which he may justly feel proud ; especially when it is considered, that during the same period probably a larger number of copies have been dispersed in AMERICA, in a Stereotype Reprint of the Second Edition, brought out under the care of the celebrated Professor Stuart, and printed at the University Press, Cambridge, Massachusetts. Contemplating the probability that a third Edition would ere long be called for, the Author, after the publication of the Second, lost no time in applying himself to a careful investigation of all the improvements of which the work was still susceptible. And he now proceeds to lay before the Public the results of three years of incessant labour devoted to the carrying into effect the extensive plans of improvement which he had been induced to form.

Having, in the Prefaces to the first and second Editions, sufficiently unfolded the plan and principles on which the present work has been formed, the Author feels that little more is here necessary, than to advert to the various features of improvement in the present Edition, on which he has bestowed all the labour and pains possible ;—because it was his determination that the work should remain henceforth as it now is, undergoing no change in any future Editions. Hence he has been careful to introduce all the additions which he deemed necessary in a work of this kind ;—additions, it is true, far greater than he had originally contemplated, but which, he can assure his readers, have not been made without mature deliberation. He was, indeed, induced to make them thus considerable, partly from the great quantity of important matter collected by him from various scarce and valuable works, ancient and modern, which had not come into his possession when he formed his second Edition ; and partly because, his RECENSIO SYNOPTICA having become out of print and, when complete, scarce,—he was anxious that the purchasers of his Greek Testament should be put into possession of as much

But to proceed to a specification of the chief features of improvement, in the order of Text, Margin, and Notes. The TEXT has been most carefully re-examined throughout, and at length finally settled, so as to form what may be called a new and, the Editor trusts, accurate Recension. In a few important passages, new readings have been, at length, received into the Text, either on later conviction of their truth, or in deference to the united opinions of Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz. And where the Editor could not venture to adopt their readings, he has never failed to prefix to the words the mark expressive of doubt, besides adverting to the state of the evidence for and against in his Notes.

The Punctuation has been again most carefully revised, and, the Editor trusts, not a little improved. The Tabular Harmonic Parallels on the first three Gospels have been carefully compared with the original texts, and occasionally improved, chiefly by reference to the very valuable "Harmonia Evangelica," and "Dissertations" of Mr. Greswell. The Marginal Parallel References have been diligently examined throughout, and very much improved, partly by the removal of inapposite references, but chiefly by the introduction of new and apposite ones, adopted from one or other of the most approved Collections.

The chief improvement, however, will be found in the ANNOTATIONS, the whole of which have undergone a strict examination and revision, including a careful verification of all the citations from, or references to, the Scriptures or the Classical writers,—by which some typographical errors have been discovered and corrected. Of the Annotations, the Critical Notes will be found not a little increased in number, as well as importance, especially by a perpetual reference to the recent elaborate Critical Edition of the New Testament, with Various Readings, by Dr. Scholz,—the chief results of whose long and laborious researches are here laid before the reader. The Explanatory Notes have received even greater attention than the Critical, and will now be found to form a perpetual Commentary in Epitome, wherein the connexion with the context is every where traced, the course of thought or argument indicated, and the harmony of sentiment or doctrine of one part of Scripture with other parts thereof pointed out. In the course of these Notes is introduced a vast mass of new and valuable matter, derived from a variety of sources,—both from recent and able Foreign works, and valuable and scarce old ones, chiefly those of the great Reformers, or their immediate successors; but also from various early modern Commentators of great merit, though, from their extreme rarity, little known¹, besides a large portion of new original matter every where interspersed. Moreover, in the present Edition far more numerous parallel constructions, or similar sentiments, are adduced from the Septuagint, Philo, and Josephus; and especially from the Classical writers of every age;—interwoven with which will be found some select illustrations from the Rabbinical writers, collected from Lightfoot, Schoettgen, and Meuschen. Farther, the Glossarial Notes, illustrative of words and phrases, have been much increased in number, and improved in substance; insomuch that, by the aid of the new and greatly enlarged and improved INDEXES (constructed purposely for this Edition), the reader will rarely find it necessary to refer to a Greek Lexicon.

Finally, an entirely new Map of Palestine and Syria, formed with the greatest care from the most recent authorities, and beautifully engraven on steel by Hall, is prefixed to the work. Though small, it is sufficiently comprehensive to contain every place mentioned in the New Test. and, in a great measure, Josephus.

The Editor must not omit to notice, that very great pains have been bestowed to secure the utmost typographical accuracy. For this purpose repeated revises of every sheet have been gone through by the Author himself; who has, for that purpose, been constantly resident very near the Press, and in continual communication with his very intelligent and able Printers, Messrs. Gilbert and Rivington. So that, upon the whole, a degree of typographical accuracy has been, he trusts, attained, somewhat rare in this country.

Thus has the Editor, by the Divine blessing, been enabled, after the incessant labours of little less than nine years, to supply—he hopes and trusts, in some competent degree,—an acknowledged desideratum, namely, an Edition of the Greek Testament containing a pure and accurately pointed Text, formed on such principles of sober, yet enlightened criticism, as should steer clear at once of rash innovation on the one hand, and a blind adherence to what had been received on the other :—and this Text accompanied by a perpetual Commentary, embracing at once both words and things, comprised within such moderate limits, as should make it readable ; of which the Philological Notes should be formed on accurate grammatical views, and the Exegetical ones founded on such enlightened principles of Hermeneutical science, as should make the sense thus drawn forth capable of satisfactory proof ; and wherein the decisions on the sense of controverted passages should be made apart from the bias of any human system ¹, and under the guidance of a truly Catholic spirit, ever ready ἀληθεύειν ἐν ἀγάπῃ. That he has fully accomplished all this, the Editor cannot venture to hope ; but he can, with truth, say, that whatever may be found imperfect, it is not that care has been wanting to make it better, but (in the words of a great writer) “because care will not always be successful, and recollection, or information, may come too late for use.”

If it should be thought necessary to account to the purchasers of the Second Edition for the numerous alterations introduced into the work, to bring it to its present fixed and settled state, the Editor would respectfully refer them to what was said at the close of the Preface to the second Edition, as to the many formidable difficulties and various unfavourable circumstances, which concurred to render it impossible for him, while occupied on that Edition, to accomplish at that time all that he has since been enabled to effect for the improvement of the work. He can, indeed, declare, and attest the Searcher of hearts for the truth of what he asserts,—that he has throughout done his very best under the circumstances in which it pleased Providence he should be placed. To which it may be added, that very many of the points discussed are of a nature so difficult and recondite, as to have perplexed the wisest heads ; and accordingly it is only by repeated exertions, and at different and distant periods of time, that any thing like certainty can be expected to be attained.

Having thus given a detail of the points of difference in this Edition, as compared with the preceding, the Editor begs to offer, with all due deference, a few remarks on the purposes, which the work, in its present improved state, may, he trusts, be adapted to answer, especially to Ministers. It cannot fail to have struck every attentive observer of what is passing in the religious world, that a considerable change has been for some time taking place in the character of Theological works in general, and not least in that of Pulpit compositions, especially such as are of a superior order. Instead of those dry moral essays, or those logical or metaphysical harangues, in which Divines and Preachers had been so long accustomed to clothe the too artificial fruits of their ingenuity, a return has of late been made to the primitive mode, of a simple appeal to what is found written in Scripture; a method consequently requiring a discussion of the sense of Scripture, both as regards the Text and the Context. Nay, what is more, "to put aside (as a recent writer says) every theory of divinity devised by human ingenuity, and to adduce as the very ground of faith and the only rule of duty, the sense of Scripture, is now the aim of every judicious divine." Considering, indeed, the great principle of Protestantism, which recognises SCRIPTURE as the only authoritative source of religious knowledge, it is manifestly of the utmost importance to ascertain what is actually the sense of Scripture. And accordingly, it is indispensably necessary, that the context should be carefully examined and discussed, in order that the sense may thereby be satisfactorily ascertained. Indeed, as Sermons have become more and more founded on Scripture, they have been found more solidly beneficial. There is, indeed, reason to think that great good has, in many places, been effected by ministers reading Expository Lectures on certain books of the New Testament, or even portions of a book; see the Preface to Mr. Scott's Commentary, and to Mr. Simeon's Horæ Homileticæ. Now in the formation of such, and more or less in that of all expository discourses, the Editor trusts that the present work will be found very serviceable, by furnishing at once that correct critical and exegetical view of the sense both of the Text and Context, which would otherwise have to be gathered from a multitude of theological works, such as few ministers could afford to purchase, and certainly not without the sacrifice of time which few could spare; inasmuch as, from a variety of causes (to which it would here be out of place to advert) it is manifest that the pastoral duties are becoming more and more onerous: and since, as society advances in civilization and knowledge, higher degrees of professional qualification are continually, and justly, required in those who discharge the ministerial office, some further aid to forward preparation for the pulpit is required. Now one great advantage of a scientific Commentary on Scripture is, that it supplies the means of correcting those numerous misconceptions and misinterpretations that occur in the ordinary practico-expository works, which ministers are accustomed to consult—as those of Henry, Doddridge, Macknight, Scott, Benson, A. Clarke, and others, who, from the object they have principally in view (practical edification), are more anxious to draw forth a weighty sense from any passage of Scripture, than to investigate the specific sense there intended by the sacred writer. Another and great advantage is, that by the precision thus imparted to our knowledge of the true force of important expressions in the original, we have the foundations of Christian truth, in its simple untrammelled form, apart from Theological systems, far more surely ascertained and firmly settled.

Having in the foregoing pages strongly inculcated the necessity of sound learning and diversified knowledge to the accurate Interpreter or Theologian, the Editor cannot conclude without adverting to other and still more necessary qualifications to form "the scribe fully instructed to the kingdom of heaven." "It is not (as Bp. Taylor observes) by reading multitudes of books, but by deeply studying the truths of God, that we can attain the end of the ministry, either on ourselves or others." Even the most capacious stores of learning, and the most gigantic powers of intellect are of no avail, without that blessing from on High, alone to be attained by humble and hearty prayer for the influences of the Spirit of truth, to guide us into all truth;—otherwise we may indeed gather spoils from every region of science, yet we shall "have no part nor lot in the matter." In short, after having employed the various aids of human learning, to ascertain the sense of Scripture, the Student must be careful to sanctify all of these by an infusion of Divine and saving knowledge; herein (as a great writer says) "doing as the dyers do,—who, having first dipt their silks in colours of less value, then give them the last tincture of crimson in grain;" thus adding to hues of human brightness others of superhuman splendour,—even those (in the words of our great epic Poet) of "colours dipt in heaven."

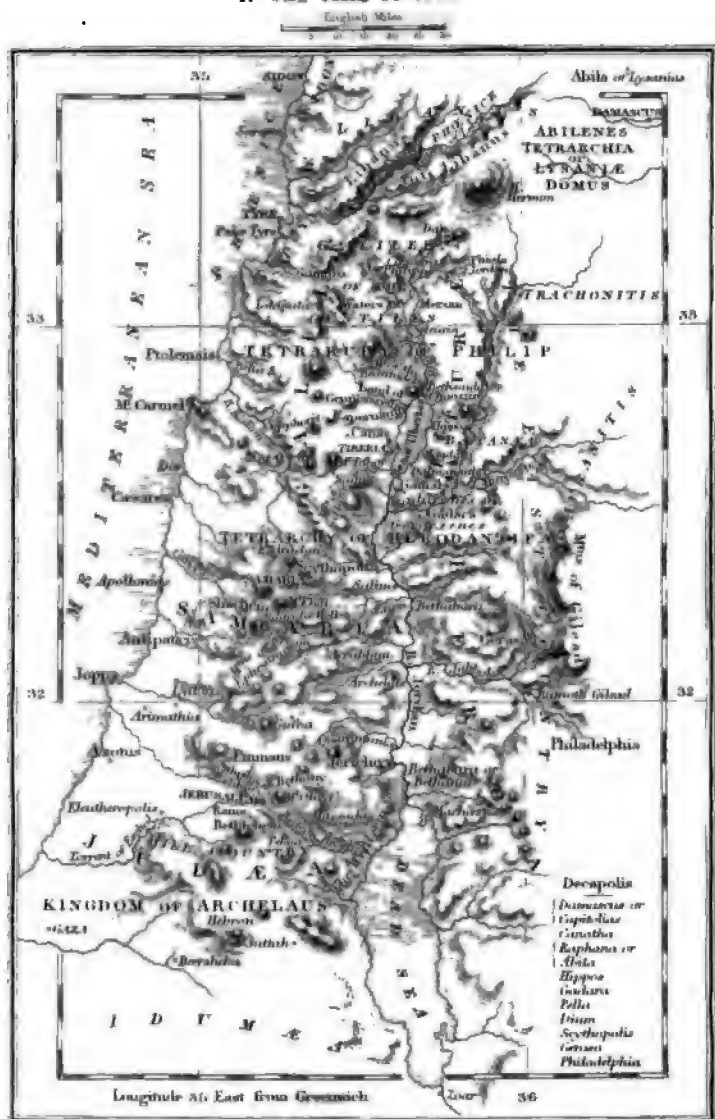

In conclusion, the Editor would earnestly desire the prayers of those to whom the present work may be profitable, that while he is able to labour, his "hands may be strengthened," and "his paths enlarged;" and that when the power to be useful shall be withdrawn, he may, through the supports of Divine grace, be enabled to "finish his course with joy," in the humble hope of being "accepted in the Beloved," and admitted into "the society of just men made perfect,"—some his esteemed fellow-labourers in the vineyard he had so long cultivated,—with them (in the words of a sacred poet)

"To keep an everlasting Sabbath's rest."

PALESTINE IN THE TIME OF CHRIST.

London, Published by Longman & Co. Paternoster Row. 1868.

ΤΟ ΚΑΤΑ ΜΑΤΘΑΙΟΝ ΕΥΑΓΓΕΛΙΟΝ.

I. I. *ΒΙΒΛΟΣ γενέσεως Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, υἱοῦ Δαυὶδ, υἱοῦ Ἀβραάμ. a Luke 3. 23. &c. Acts 13. 23.

C. I. This is almost universally acknowledged to have been the first written of the Gospels; but the exact time when, is a question which has been long agitated, and not yet determined. It has been assigned to various years, from A.D. 37 or 38, to 63 or 64, but the arguments in favour of an early date would seem to preponderate. These are founded, 1. on external testimony; 2. on internal evidence. As to the former, the testimony of antiquity has considerable weight. And that is decidedly in favour of an early date. In fact, the passage of Irenæus Adv. Hæres. iii. 1. (cited by Euseb. Eccl. Hist. v. 8.), is the only testimony of antiquity in favour of a late date; and that is not decisive, since the language is so vague, that the maintainers of the contrary hypothesis understand it in a sense by no means unfavourable to their view. And, considering that we have no certain information as to where Peter abode from A.D. 46 to 63, the arguments depending upon implication must be regarded as altogether inconclusive. At all events, whatever weight may be assigned to that passage, it is overbalanced by the testimony of Eusebius, Eccl. Hist. iii. 24, where it is strongly implied, that Matthew wrote his Gospel very early. Which is confirmed by Eusebius' positive testimony in his Chronicon; where he assigns the 3d year of the reign of Caligula, i. e. A.D. 41. (8 years after Christ's ascension), as the period when Matthew published his Gospel. And this is confirmed by the suffrages of Chrys., Euthym., and Theophylact. Internal evidence, too, would seem to preponderate in favour of an early date; it being not probable that the followers of Christ should have been left, for nearly 30 years after his ascension, without a written history of his ministry.

This question, however, is closely connected with another, and more important one, (which may serve to decide this.)—namely, as to the language in which this Gospel was written; some contending that it was in the Hebrew of St. Matthew's time (i. e. Syro-Chaldee); others, in Greek. Now here, while the internal evidence seems to be equal on both sides, the external, as resting on the testimony of antiquity, is decidedly in favour of a Hebrew original. Besides the passages of Papias and Origen, cited by Eusebius, those of Eusebius and Irenæus, above referred to (as also Euseb. Eccl. Hist. v. 10.), bear the strongest testimony thereto.

Indeed, it is not too much to say, that the existence of a Hebrew original was held by the Fathers almost unanimously. And when Dr. Burton urges that 'no ancient writer can be proved to have seen the document in question,' he demands such a proof of its existence as, from the very nature of the case, it is unreasonable to ask; for as the Hebrew original must, after the dispersion of the Jews, and from the universal prevalence of the Greek language, have soon become almost useless; so, at an early period, it would become obsolete, or be only partially retained, as forming the basis of the very early fabrications (adapted to the taste of the Judaizing Christians), the Gospel of the Ebionites, the Gospel of the Nazarenes, and the Gospel according to the Hebrews, cited by Origen, Epiphanius, and Jerome. It is quite enough to prove the existence of the document as long as it was in use, on the testimony of writers who, though they could not have seen, what was then lost, were well able to weigh the evidence of its former actual existence. But while the existence of the Gospel in Hebrew may be considered as resting on such a strong foundation, that it can scarcely be rejected without impairing the credit of all ancient testimony,—it must not be denied, that arguments scarcely less cogent are adduced in favour of our present Greek Gospel; which has many internal marks of being an original writing; for otherwise how can we account for the interpretation of Hebrew names—the citation of the parallel passages of the O.T. not from the Hebrew, but from the Sept.—and for the versions being all adapted so closely to the Greek? Add to this, that Eusebius, and the other Fathers of his time, evidently consider the Greek Gospel as an original: not to mention numerous instances of verbal agreement between Matthew and the other Evangelists, which, on the supposition of a Hebrew original, are hard to be accounted for. After all, however, the main point (as Dr. Hales observes) is, whether the present Greek Gospel be entitled to the authority of an original, or not. This, I apprehend, can be shown beyond all dispute. But that will not at all invalidate the former existence of a Hebrew original, which is demanded by the evidence of antiquity, and is in itself very probable; for a Hebrew Gospel must, in the first age of Christianity (when almost confined to Judæa), have been as requisite as a Greek one was afterwards. And there is in the book itself, even in its present state, internal evidence of its being written, at first, especially for the use of the Jewish nation; since those circumstances are particularly dwelt on, which were adapted to establish the faith of such as believed, and to sway the minds of those who were disbelievers in the Divine mission of Jesus Christ. And in vain is it to seek to impugn the existence of the Gospel in Hebrew, by urging, as is done, that the Gospel, as we now have it, bears no marks of being a translation, but has every appearance of being an original. For surely it has far more marks of being a translation, and has far less of the air of an original than Josephus's History of the Jewish War, which is confessedly a translation from a Hebrew original. Yet the circumstances under which the Greek both of Josephus and St. Matthew's Gospel were respectively brought out, are such as not to warrant us in regarding either one or the other, as strictly speaking, a translation. There are, indeed, grounds to believe that Josephus made considerable alterations in his work, when he brought it out for the use of the Greeks and Romans. And there is not less reason to suppose that St. Matthew made some alterations; especially in the interpretation of Hebrew names, and in the adaptation of the quotations from the O. T. to the Sept. version. And as to the ancient versions being all formed from the Greek Gospel, that will not at all invalidate the existence of a Hebrew Gospel, for it is admitted by all, that the Hebrew Gospel had become obsolete long before even the earliest of the versions was formed.

In short, all the difficulties which have so long embarrassed this question will vanish, and every thing which seems at first sight strange, be accounted for, by supposing (as Whitby, Benson, and Hales have done), that there were two originals (or, so to speak, editions), one in Hebrew and the other in Greek; but both written by St. Matthew.

But to return to a consideration of the litigated question of the date of this Gospel. On a more mature consideration of the various arguments advanced in favour of an early, and those of a later date, I must confess that the evidence for the latter seems rather to preponderate. That of antiquity, when properly weighed, is stronger for it; and the complete silence of the writers of the Apostolical Epistles as to any written Gospels, tends to the same conclusion. A late period, too, was, as Dr. Hales observes, the fittest of all; for whilst the eye-witnesses and ministers of the word were executing their commission of 'disciplining all nations, by preaching the Gospel every where,' they had scarcely leisure for writing. But when they were 'finishing their course,' in order to supply the place of their oral instructions, after their decease, writing became necessary. See some most important matter on this subject in Euseb. Eccl. Hist. iii. 24. This induced Peter to write his Epistles to the Jewish converts, Paul his Epistle to the Hebrews, James and John their general Epistles, and likewise Matthew and John their Gospels. The marvellous difference of opinion as to the date of Matthew's Gospel, has been chiefly occasioned by the conflicting testimonies of Irenæus, as quoted by Eusebius, Eccl. H. v. 8, and of Eusebius himself, in his Eccl. Hist. iii. 24, and his Chronicon. Yet the discrepancy may be reconciled, by supposing that the time mentioned by Eusebius as the date of Matthew's Gospel, namely, the 3d year of the reign of Caligula (some time in A. D. 40 or 41), is to be understood of the Hebrew, not the Greek Gospel. This, indeed, is plain from that writer's own words; where he says that, having spread the Gospel by word of mouth, the Evangelist, on leaving Judæa to go and preach Christianity to the Gentiles, left his countrymen his Gospel, for their information, written πατρίᾳ γλώττῃ. And as to what is said by Irenæus, cited by Euseb. Eccl. Hist. v. 8, as quoted in English by Mr. Horne, iv. 257, namely, that 'Matthew put forth a Gospel among the Hebrews, while Peter and Paul were preaching Christianity at Rome;' there would seem to be no difficulty in supposing, as Mr. Horne does, in order to reconcile this discrepancy, that the words of Irenæus are to be understood of Matthew's Greek Gospel; and thereby its date will pretty nearly be fixed. But then, in the translation, literal as it professes to be, which Mr. Horne gives of the passage, there is (through inadvertence) a passing over of the important words τῇ ἰδίᾳ αὐτῶν διαλέκτῳ. Now this would seem to put an end to the reconciliation of the discrepancy between Irenæus and Eusebius, and oblige us to suppose that Irenæus was misinformed; which, considering his opportunities of gaining the necessary information, is by no means probable. It may rather be suspected that the words are corrupt (as, indeed, they have long been acknowledged to be); and the best mode, I apprehend, to emend them is simply by reading γραφῇ for γραφῆν, and εὐαγγέλιον for εὐαγγέλιον; and pointing the passage thus: ὁ μὲν δὲ Ματθ. ἐν τοῖς Ἑβραίοις, τῇ ἰδίᾳ αὐτῶν διαλέκτῳ, καὶ γραφῇ. ('in their own tongue, and in writing, as opposed to preaching'). ἔζητεῖεν εὐαγγέλιον, τοῦ Πέτρου καὶ τοῦ Παύλου ἐν Ῥώμῃ εὐαγγελιζομένοις, καὶ Σεμελιούντων τὴν ἐκκλησίαν. These emendations are confirmed by the words of Euseb. E. H. iii. 24. Ματθαῖος μὲν γὰρ πρότερον Ἑβραίοις κηρύξας, ὡς ἔμελλε καὶ ἐφ' ἑτέροις ἵναί, πατρίᾳ γλώττῃ γραφῇ παραδούς τὸ κατ' αὐτὸν εὐαγγέλιον, κ. τ. λ. But if we understand the words, as we must, of Matthew's Hebrew Gospel, we are compelled to assign to it a much later period than probability, or the words of Eusebius himself in his Chronicon, will justify. For which reason I cannot help suspecting that there yet remains some corruption; for Paul was not at Rome till above 20 years afterwards; and Peter was very little at Rome, and certainly not till A. D. 63, a short time before his martyrdom. Instead of ἐν Ῥώμῃ, the true reading, I apprehend, is ἐν Ῥώμῃ, for ἐρρωμένως, strenuously. If this conjecture be not admitted, we may suppose ἐν Ῥώμῃ to have originated in a marginal addition of some sciolist, who thought something was here wanting

to correspond to ἐν Ἑβραίοις in the former part of the sentence; which was readily caught up by those who wished to strengthen the claims of Rome to the Mother of Churches. Thus there will no longer be any discrepancy; for the labours of Peter and Paul in evangelizing and founding the Christian Church were in progress (even in the case of St. Paul) as early as the year 40 or 41. Of course, the passage has no bearing, as it has been supposed, on the date of the publication of the Greek Gospel. Nor do I know of any passage that has, in any writer of sufficient antiquity to deserve credit. It was, however, probably published about A.D. 60, a little before the Epistle of St. James, and meant for the same persons; i. e. Hellenists and Gentile Christians.

With respect to the authenticity of this Gospel, it is established by the most irrefragable evidence, in a long and unbroken chain of Ecclesiastical writers citing or alluding to various parts of it, from St. Barabas down to the time of Theophylact and Photius. And as to the genuineness of the two first chapters, which has been recently called in question by the Unitarians, that too has been established incontrovertibly; these two chapters being cited or alluded to perhaps more than the rest. And, besides the harshness of supposing the Gospel to commence with two words evidently pointing to something that preceded, ἐν δὲ ταῖς ψαλμοῖς ἐκείναις (and which we find at chap. ii.), and the fact, that there are other passages which evidently refer to passages in those chapters; not to say, that the want of a genealogy in a work, written at first especially for Jewish Christians, would be a great deficiency,—we may defy the Unitarians to produce any unmutilated MS. or ancient version (though the Peschito Syriac and the Italic Vulgate carry us back to a period nearly coeval with the formation of the canon of the N.T.) which is without those chapters. As to the separation of the genealogy, i. 1—18. in some Latin MSS., that by no means implies the spuriousness of even the portion in question. And although one, very modern, Greek MS. (the Cod. Ebner.) is without the genealogy, yet that was doubtless owing to the genealogy being, in the archetype, separated from the rest, and negligently passed over by the scribe.

Against this mass of positive evidence for the genuineness of these chapters, Unitarians, indeed, oppose a show of arguments, partly external and partly internal. But these have been triumphantly refuted by Mosheim, Bishop Horsley, Abps. Magee and Laurence, Dr. Pye Smith, and others.

With respect to the title of this Gospel, Εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Ματθαίου, the word εὐαγγέλιον (from εὖ and ἀγγαλία, from εὐάγγελος, and that from εὖ and ἀγγάλλω) in the Classical writers, signifies, in general, good news, sometimes the reward given to the bearer of it. In the Septuagint and the New Testament, however, it is almost confined to the former signification, corresponding to the Heb. בראית. In the latter it especially imports the good tidings of the Messiah's Advent, who should deliver man from sin and death, through his merits and intercession; and of the foundation of that spiritual and eternal kingdom predicted by the Prophets, and fulfilled by the incarnation of Jesus Christ. Hence the term at length became merely a name for the dispensation; or, (as in the Ecclesiastical writers), by metonymy, the History of the circumstances which accompanied the promulgation of that dispensation. Our English word Gospel, from the Saxon god (good), and spel (news), well expresses the force of the Greek εὐαγγέλιον. The κατὰ must not be rendered secundum, according to; for (by an idiom found in the later Greek writers), κατὰ with the Accusative, has simply the force of a Genitive, i. e. τοῦ Ματθαίου.

V. 1. This verse forms a preface to chap. i. and a title to the genealogy contained in the first 16 verses; for βίβλος (like the Hebrew ספר), denotes a roll of writing, whether long or short.

On the following genealogy not a few difficulties exist; 1. as to discrepancies from the Old Testament history in names, which might easily arise from errors in transcription; (especially as some of the names bear great similarity, and it was not unusual for the same person to have more than one name.) 2. as to the reversing of this genealogy with that of Luke; which is best done by supposing that Matthew gives the genealogy of Joseph, and Luke that of Mary. And therefore the former (who wrote principally for the Jews), traces the pedigree from Abraham to David; and so, through Solomon's line, to Joseph, the legal father of Jesus. And it must be remembered that, among the Jews, legal descent was always reckoned in the male line. While Luke, who wrote for the Gentiles, traces the pedigree upwards from Heli, the father of Mary, to David and Abraham, and thence to Adam, the common father of all mankind. Finally, whatever difficulties, even after all the diligence of learned inquirers, shall exist on certain matters connected with this genealogy, we may rest assured, that if these genealogies of Christ (which must be understood to have been derived from the public records in the temple) had not been agreeable thereto, the deception would have been instantly detected. And thus, whether Christ's pedigree be traced through the line of Joseph or that of Mary, it is alike undeniable that Jesus was descended from David and Abraham; agreeably to the ancient promises and prophecies, that the Messiah should be of their seed. On this whole subject the reader is referred to a recent work of extensive research and much interest, entitled, Reflections on the Genealogy of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, by D. Benham, Esq. London, 1836.

— Δαβὶδ.] So Matthæi, Griebb., Vater, Fritz, and Scholz edit here and elsewhere, with the almost universal consent of the MSS. for Δαβὶδ.

— υἱὸς Ἀβραάμ υἱὸς is for ἀπογόνοον, after the custom of the Hebrew, in which the correspondent word signifies any lineal descendant, however far removed: the idiom, however, is also found in Homer. Thus the general sense is 'a descendant of David and Abraham'; which is what the Evangelist now proceeds to prove. That the Jews expected the Messiah to be such, is clear from Matt. xii. 23. xxi. 9. and xxii. 42. David is mentioned first, as being nearer in time to their age.

2. ἐγέννησε.] The repetition of this word throughout the genealogy is said to be Hebrew. But it is common to all languages in genealogies; which, like law writings, must be very explicit, and therefore cannot but deal much in repetition.

— καὶ τοὺς ἀδελφούς αὐτοῦ.] Why these persons should be mentioned, though not the Messiah's progenitors, various reasons have been alleged. See Bp. Kidder. The thing, however, need not be anxiously debated, since there is every reason to regard the genealogy as no more than a transcript from the public registers.

3. τὸν Φαρίε καὶ τ. Ζ.] Both are mentioned as being twin brothers, and striving for primogeniture, and also to identify Phares.

5. Ῥαχάβ.] It has been debated, whether this was the harlot of Jericho, mentioned at Josh. ii. 1. and whose faith is so commended at Heb. xi. 31, or some other person of the same name. Theophyl. of the ancient, and many modern commentators, are of the latter opinion.

6. Σολομῶνα.] So almost all the editions from Wets. downwards, on the authority of the best MSS. The common reading, Σολομώντα, is equally agreeable to propriety (as in Ξενοφών), but it is deficient in MS. authority.

— ἐκ τῆς τοῦ Οὐρίου.] The commentators suppose an ellipse of γυναῖκός and of πατρός. The former may be admitted, but the latter is not, properly speaking, an ellipse at all; but merely an instance of the suppression of something supposed to be well known to the person addressed.

8. Ἰ. ἐγένν. τὸν Ὀζιαν.] Ἐγένν. must here be taken in an extended sense, founded on the Jewish custom, by which children were reputed the children not only of their immediate parents, but of their ancestors; who are said to have begotten those removed several generations from them (see Is. xxxix. 7); for, by an omission not uncommon in Jewish genealogies, three kings are here omitted—Uzziah being the great-grandson of Joram. The most probable reason for this omission is the curse denounced against the idolatry of the house of Ahab, to which those princes belonged.

11. ἐπὶ τῆς μετοικ.] Eni in this use signifies about, i. e. a little over or under, an idiom also found in the Latin circa and sub. Μετοικεσία, transmigration, is an Hellenistic word applied, quasi per meiosis, to denote the removal of the Jews from their own country to Babylonia (see 2 Kings xviii. 32), and correspondent to a Hebrew word which expressed the full force of the thing by captivity.

12. μετὰ τὴν μετοικ.] Some (as Kuinoël) render it 'at the time of the transmigration.' But the common signification after may very well be retained; indeed Fritzsche denies that μετὰ has ever any other. And at Joseph. Ant. i. 12. 2. εὐθὺς μετ' ὀγδόῃ ἡμέρᾳ περιτίμνουσι he translates exactly die octava. Although of the ancestors of Jesus in this and the following verses, no mention is made in the O. T., yet this does not derogate from the authority of what is here recorded.

16. ὁ λεγόμενος] i. e. who is accounted to be

and is Christ. This idiom is not confined to Hellenistic, but is also found in Classical Greek, at least in the kindred term κεκλήσθαι; though almost confined to the Poets.

—Ἰησοῦς] from the Hebrew ישוע, a Saviour; a title applied by the Jews, as σωτήρ was by the Greeks, to any public benefactor, and applied to the Messiah κατ' ἔξοχόν. Χριστός is properly an appellative derived from the Hebrew: מָשִׁיחַ signifying anointed, and employed with allusion to the regal, sacerdotal, and prophetic offices; since kings, priests, and prophets, among the Jews, were inaugurated into their respective offices by anointing. But, at length, by frequent application to one individual only, it came to supply the place of a proper name, and thus needed not the article.

17. γενεαί.] This use of γενεά, to denote a succession of persons one after another, is found not only in the Old Testament, but in the best Classical writers.

—δεκατέσσαρες.] The Jews were accustomed to divide their genealogical reckonings into clases, doubtless to aid the memory. Here, however, the classification is important, since in each class a change is denoted.

—μνηστευθείσης γάρ.] Said to be Genit. absol. for Nomin. with verb. But that principle is here unnecessary; and the force of the Gen. absol. serves to denote time more exactly. This use of γάρ in the sense temp. or scilicet, at the beginning of a narration, is frequent in the Scriptural and the Classical writers, and may be said to be both inchoative and explanatory.

—πρὶν ἢ συνελθεῖν.] On the use of πρὶν ἢ with an Infin., for πρίν (said to be middle Attic,) see Viger and Robinson's Lexicon. It seems to have arisen from πρίν, including a sort of indirect comparison. Συνελθ. is by some taken to mean coming together in one house, Xen. Econ. x. 4; by others, conjugal intercourse, by an ellipsis of εἰς σύνθη, suppressed concordia gratia. The latter is perhaps the better founded view, as being more agreeable to the context, and supported by 1 Cor. vii. 5. and numerous Classical examples adduced by the Philological Commentators. The difference between this and the Classical use is, that in the latter a Duties almost always follows.

—εὐρέθη ἐν γαστρὶ ἔχουσα.] Supply βόλῃ, or ἐμβρυον. Examples both of the elliptical and the complete phrase are adduced by the Philological Commentators. Εὐρ. ἔχ. is almost universally taken for ἦν ἔχουσα, i. e. είχε. And εὐρέσθαι is, indeed, sometimes thus used by the Classical writers. Yet so to take it here would enervate the sense. The ancients (as it appears from Euthymius) took the word, in its full force, for εἶδαν, or εἰφανὲς ἰγίνετο. Nay, there may be (as Harenberg thinks) a reference to that examination by midwives which in such a case was usual with the Jews. But there rather seems an allusion to Joseph's discovery of her pregnancy; probably on her return from her visit of three months to Elizabeth.

—ἐκ Πνεύματος ἁγίου.] Bp. Middleton has here an excellent Note, in which he exposes Wakefield's mistranslation of the phrase, 'by a holy Spirit,' and concludes with giving a detail of the various senses of the important term πνεῦμα, of which the following is the substance. There are six meanings—1. Breath, or wind; in which sense it rarely occurs: Matt. xxvii. 50. John iii. 8. Rev. xiii. 15.—2. The intellectual, or spiritual part of man, as distinguished from σάρξ, his corrupt part.—3. Spirit, as abstracted from body or matter; whence is deduced the idea of immortal agents. Comp. Luke xxiv. 34. John iv. 24. Acts xxiii. 9. The πνεύματα of the demons belong to this head.—4. The Spirit, κατ' ἔξοχόν; i. e. the Third Person in the Trinity; in which acceptation, except in anomalous cases like the present, it is never used without the article. It may be observed, however, that in all the passages where personal acts are attributed to the πνεῦμα ἁγίου, and which are, therefore, adduced to prove the personality of the Holy Spirit, the article is invariably prefixed. See Matt. xxviii. 19. Mark i. 10. Luke iii. 22. John i. 31. Acts i. 16. xx. 28.—5. The influence, not the Person, of the Spirit; in which sense, except in cases of reference, or renewed mention, the article never appears.—6. The effects of the Spirit in the senses disposition, character, faith, virtue, religion, &c.; also to denote evil propensities, arising from the influence of the Evil Spirit. In all these cases, the Article is inserted, or omitted, according to circumstances. Hence it is evident, as a necessary consequence, that the Holy Spirit is not, as some aver, a mere influence, but a Person; also that the Sacred writers clearly distinguish the influence from the person of the Spirit. See more in Bp. Sanderson, Sermon. pp. 594, 595. and Robinson's Lexicon in v.

19. δίκαιος.] This is by some ancients and many moderns explained in the sense merciful, lenient; as we say a worthy good man. And so the Heb. צַדִּיק and the Latin pius, as the Commentators have proved by many examples. It is not, however, necessary to resort to this idiom here; since the usual acceptation is not less apposite, as denoting a lover of justice, and a man of uprightness and integrity. Being such, he determined to put her away by law; and yet, with that mercy which ever accompanies true justice, he wished not to make her a public example, but to do it privately; i. e. with only the two witnesses required to attest the delivery of the bill of divorce; which did not necessarily state the reason for the divorce.

— παραδειγματίζει.] This word, found only in the Sept. and the later Greek writers, properly signifies, 1. to make an example of; 2. to inflict punishment on, as Jer. xiii. 22. and often Polyb., or to expose to ignominy.

— ἐβουλήθη.] This denotes, not will, or counsel, as it is rendered; but inclination of will. See Fritzsche. Ἀπολύσαι, to divorce; as in Matt. v. 31, 32. Mark x. 4. Luke xvi. 18, and the Heb. רצו in Jerem. iii. 8.

20. ἐνθυμηθέντος.] The word is here used in its primitive signification, which is, to turn any thing in mind, to reflect, meditate.

— ἰδού.] This, like the Heb. הנה, and Latin ecce, is often employed, as here, to prepare the reader or hearer for something unexpected and wonderful. It is rare in the Classical writers; but an example occurs in Eurip. Herc. Fur. 1066.

— ἄγγελος Κυρ.] Ἄγγελος is used both as an appellative, denoting office, (then to be rendered messenger,) and as the title of a particular class of beings; when it becomes almost a proper name, and should be rendered Angel.

— κατ' ὄναρ.] Hebr. עֲלֵמָה, a phrase frequent in the later writers. In the times of Patriarchism, as well as the earlier ages of Judaism, God often revealed his will by dreams, or visions, not only to his own people, but to the nations at large. The ancients in general much regarded them; and rules for their interpretation were formed, both among Jews and Gentiles; the former of whom were, however, forbidden to seek their interpretation from any but the Prophets of the Lord, or the High Priest. These significative dreams had long subsisted; while, there is reason to think, prophetic dreams, or (as in the case of Angelic intervention, Gen. xxxi. 11.) visions, had, except in the case of Simon the Just, ceased after the time of the last of the prophets, Malachi. Note, however, this channel of communication between God and man, in addition to that of direct revelation, became re-opened in the prophetic dream of Joseph.

— παραλαβεῖν.] Scil. sis οικίαν, supplied in Lucian, Timon 17. The παρα refers to the parents, from which the bride was received. Τὴν γυν. σου (velut) tuam uxorem. This falls under the head of Apposition.

— τὸ γεινηθῆν.] The neuter is commonly used of the fœtus in utero, since its sex is yet unknown.

21. τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ.] Commonly explained as put for αὐτόν, and usually accounted a Hebraism; but the idiom sometimes occurs in the early Greek writers; nor is it properly put for αὐτόν.

— σώσει—αὐτόν.] Σῶζειν means, '1. To preserve generally, from any evil or danger whatsoever. 2. To preserve from sickness, or any bodily disorder; to heal. 3. To preserve from the temporal anger of the Almighty, such as was manifested in the destruction of Jerusalem. 4. To give future salvation in Heaven. It might have been desirable to have confined the use of the word save to those passages which come under the fourth class. Those in the third might have been interpreted to put in the way, or into a state of salvation.' (Bp. Maltby.) The preservation here meant is, however, I apprehend, a deliverance, both from the punishment of sin, by Christ's atonement, and from the dominion of sin (Rom. vi. 14.) by his procuring for men the grace of the Holy Spirit, to enable them to resist it successfully. Αὐτὸς has here the emphatic use, for ἑαυτοῦ or οὗτος, (on which see Robinson's Lex. 3. a.) q. d. 'for He, and no other, shall save,' &c. And so xi. 14. αὐτὸς γὰρ ἰσχύει ἅλλας.

22. This and the next verse contain not the words of the angel, as some have supposed, but an observation of the Evangelist; and the τοῦτο δὲ ὅλον refers not only to what has been mentioned in the preceding narrative, but also to all other circumstances connected with the transaction there recorded. The ἵνα denotes, as Campbell says, no more than that there was as exact a conformity between the event and the passage quoted, as there could have been if the former had been effected merely for the accomplishment of the latter. The particles ἵνα and ὅπως must therefore not be too rigorously interpreted; since they often express not the cause, or design, but the event only, and the phrase ἵνα πληρωθῇ should then be translated, 'So that thus was fulfilled,' i. e. in a literal sense, that which the Prophet spoke in a wider sense and on a different occasion.

23. ἡ παρθένος.] The earlier Translators seem to have thought the Article pleonastic. But the researches of later Philologists have shown that it is very rarely such, though its sense cannot always be expressed. Here it is used κατ' ἐξοχήν, and denotes, (as Dr. Owen and Bp. Middleton observe,) that particular virgin who was prophesied of from the beginning, and whose seed was to bruise the serpent's head.

—καλέσουσι] scil. ἄνθρωποι, i. e. 'his name shall be called, or be': for the fulfilment of the prophecy depends, not upon Christ's literally having borne the name Emmanuel, but upon his being such; which he clearly was as GOD-MAN. Thus the Evangelist has interpreted both Emmanuel and Jesus, to show that the prophecy was fulfilled, not in the names, but in their signification or application.

24. διεγερθεὶς ἀπὸ τοῦ ὕπνου.] Simil. Herodot. i. 34. ὁ δ' ἐπεὶ τ' ἐξηγύρῃ, καταρρώδισσε τὸν ὄμιρον, &c. and Joseph. Ant. xvii. 12. 3.

25. οὐκ ἐγίνωσκεν.] A common euphemism, like that of conspicere in Latin.

—ἕως οὗ ἔτεκε.] 'This does not necessarily imply his knowledge of her afterwards, though it suggests the affirmative rather than the negative.' (Campb.) The quotations produced on the contrary side are, as Whitby has shown, not quite to the point. The suffrage of antiquity (which speaks in the negative) is indeed not lightly to be set aside. Yet even that was not constant, nor without dissent. The term πρωτότοκος, it is urged, will not determine the case in the affirmative, because it was used, whether there were any more children or not; but the contrary is ably maintained by Fritz, who shows that ἕως οὗ ἔτεκε suggests only the affirmative. The question, however, is one of mere curiosity; and we may safely say, with St. Basil (cited by Bp. Taylor), that 'though it was necessary for the completion of the prophecy, that the mother of Jesus should continue a virgin until she had brought forth her first-born; yet what she was afterwards it is idle to discuss, since that is of no manner of concern to the mystery.'

II. 1. τοῦ δὲ Ἰησοῦ γεννηθέντος.] The full sense is, '[sometime] after the birth of Jesus.' On the chronology of the visit of the Magi, and the nativity, see Benson's Chronology of the Life of Christ, p. 74; and Dr. Hales' Analysis, iii. 55, sq.; the former of whom refutes the arguments of those who fix the visit of the Magi at a considerable distance of time after the nativity; and he offers good reasons for supposing that it took place between the 39th and 42d day after the birth of Jesus, about February 13th, J. P. 4710. This is confirmed by Justin Dial. cum Tryph., (who says, the event was ἄμα τοῦ γεννηθῆναι αὐτοῦ), and is agreeable to the impression naturally suggested by the air of the narrative.

—μάγοι.] The term adopted in our Translation, wise men, is not sufficiently definite, since the persons were a particular caste, as distinguished by their peculiarities as any of the Grecian sects of philosophers. The word is better left untranslated, as in the Syriac, Arabic, Latin, and Italian versions. It is of Persian origin (Mogh), and designated throughout the East (and especially Persia, the original seat of this class of persons), the priests, philosophers, and men of letters in general; who devoted themselves to the study of divine and human science, especially medicine and astronomy, or rather astrology. Their doctrines are said to have been derived from Abraham, or at least purified by him from Zabian idolatry. They again became corrupted, and were again purified by Zoroaster, who is supposed to have been a descendant of the Prophet Daniel; deriving from him that intimate knowledge of the Mosaic writings which his religion evinces. From what quarter the persons in question derived their information, whether, as some suppose, from a prediction of Zoroaster (whom they believed to have been divinely inspired), or (as others think) from a prophecy of the Arabian prophet Balaam, is uncertain. Be that as it may, a general expectation then prevailed in the East, that a most extraordinary personage was about to be born, who should be Sovereign of the world. Vide Menag. ad Diog. Laert. i. 1. Porphyr. de Abstin. iv. 16. Perizon. ad Ælian Var. Hist. ii. 17. Hyde de Relig. Vet. Pers. 31. et Briasson de Princ. Pers. 179. 'Ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν must not be taken with παρεγίνοντο, but with μάγοι. (Comp. Matt. xxvii. 57. ἄνθρωπος πλούσιος ἀπὸ Ἀριμαθαίας.) Nor is the sense Magi Orientales. There is rather an ellipse of ἐλθόντες, or something equivalent.

2. ὁ τεχθεὶς βασιλεὺς] 'who is [recently] born'; or, as others interpret, the true born, i. e. real and true King.

—εἶδομεν γὰρ, &c.] The γὰρ is elliptical; q. d. 'He must be born; FOR we have seen his star.' (Robinson.) Here it would be out of place to detail the various opinions that have been promulgated concerning this star; of which the only one entitled to attention is that of Dr. Hales, Anal. iii. 55, that it was a luminous meteor, at no great distance from the ground, exceedingly brilliant (as we learn from Ignat. ad Ephes. xix.) and called a star from its resemblance thereto, and formed, and its motion regulated preternaturally, so as to descend so low as to mark out a single house. We may compare a similar preternatural appearance in the cloudy pillar which in-dedicated to the Israelites the place for encamping in the Desert, Exod. xxxiii. 9. The course the Magi were to take was possibly suggested to them by revelation; or rather, they had learned it from some old tradition of the Jews, that a new star would appear at the coming of the Messiah. Numerous Classical citations are adduced by Wets., showing the general belief, that new stars appeared at the birth or death of celebrated personages, and otherwise had some undefined connection with the most important events of their lives.

— προσκυνῆσαι αὐτῷ.] This construction with the Dative is almost confined to the later writers; the earlier and purer ones using the Accus. With respect to the sense, it is not possible to define the exact nature of this προσκύνησις; because in the East (though never in the West) the prostration of the body to the very earth (which this word imports) was paid alike to monarchs and to gods. Whether, therefore, it was adoration, or reverential homage, is doubtful; though, if we consider the Divine revelation vouchsafed to them, the Magi could scarcely but view the new-born exalted personage as one far above any earthly monarch; and, if at all acquainted with the Prophecies of the Old Testament (which we cannot doubt), they might very well expect far more in the Messiah than the human nature. Προσκυνῶν properly signifies to kiss one's hand to any one (equivalent to kissing any one's hands); a form of respectful salutation. This, however, has reference wholly to the Greek and Roman customs. In Scripture the expression has probably never that sense, but a much higher. See Robinson's Lex. in v.

3. ἐταράχθη.] The perturbation was occasioned by the prevalent persuasion, that the reign (then supposed to be near at hand) of the Messiah would be ushered in by a long train of national calamities.

4. τοὺς ἀρχιερεῖς καὶ γραμματεῖς.] Meaning all the members of the Sanhedrim, or great Ecclesiastical Council. By ἀρχ., we are to understand not only the ἀρχιερεὺς, and his deputy (the Sagan), but all those who had passed the office, and who still by courtesy enjoyed the title, and probably wore an Archieratical robe; also (some say) the heads of the 24 courses of Priests engaged. The γραμματεῖς were persons employed either in transcribing, or in explaining the Sacred books, and were distributed into two orders, Civil and Ecclesiastical. Among them were the νομικοὶ (or lawyers), mentioned in the New Test., who were, indeed, the only persons occupied in teaching the law and religion to the people at large.

— γεννᾶται.] This is by some taken as Pres. for Fut., for γεννηθήσεται, or μέλλει γενᾶσθαι.

Others say it is the Fut. mid. contract. (Atticè) with the force of Fut. pass. But it is very doubtful whether that idiom has place in the New Test. It is better to regard it as a Present, and, with Elan. and Kuinöel, suppose it put for the Fut.; or rather to take it as used populariter to signify 'is to be born.'

5. οἱ δὲ εἶπον, &c.] On the article thus used in the narrative style, by way of transition to another person or party already mentioned, without a preceding ὁ μὲν, meaning, 'but this one (i. e. he),' see Robinson's Lex. in voc. δ.

— διὰ τοῦ προφήτου.] The words following correspond neither to the Heb. nor to the Sept.; and therefore the priests are supposed to have given the sense rather than the words of the Prophet. And, as it is not professed to be a citation, but only a statement of the sense, literal agreement is not to be required. Several recent interpreters, indeed, take the words of the Prophet in the Hebrew and Sept. interrogatively; which will be equivalent to a strong negation. Yet as this is, with reason, objected to by Fritz. and others, as being too arbitrary, it may be best to allege, that there is only a discrepancy in words, not in reality: the scope of the Prophet and the Evangelist (for I would suppose the passage adduced by Matthew and not by the Sanhedrim,) is the same—namely, to state that 'though Bethlehem be one of the smallest cities of Judah, yet it will not be the smallest (i. e. will be the greatest) in celebrity—since out of it,' &c.

6. γῆ Ἰούδα.] Almost all Commentators regard γῆ as used in the sense πόλις; of which they adduce many examples from the Greek Tragedians. But in them, if γῆ be put for πόλις, it is only by πόλις having the sense a country, or state; for Scidler on Eurip. Troas. 4. and Fritz. in loc. rightly deny that γῆ is ever so used. There is, however, no reason to resort to the conjecture proposed by Fritz., τῆς Ἰουδαίας. It is better to read (as did our English Translators and Lightfoot) γῆ, taking it for ἐν γῆ. Though, indeed, the common reading may be tolerated, if γῆ be taken in the sense district, canton, as in Hesiod Opp. 161. ἐφ' ἐπαπύλῳ θήβῃ, Καδμηίδι γαῖν, where there is the same approximation; in which the Particip. of the verb subet. is to be understood, equivalent to a relative pronoun and a verb.

— οὐδαμῶς ἐλαχίστη.] Said, by a common littol, to denote 'most celebrated.'

— ἐν τοῖς ἡγ.] Sept. χιλίδισιν Heb. שָׁנָה. For as the Jews divided their tribes into thousands, i. e. companies of 1000 families, so the term was sometimes taken to denote the district where they resided. And here τοῖς ἡγεμόσιν is put figuratively, for τοῖς ἡγεμόνισιν, scil. χώρας, the masculine being used dignitatis gratiâ.

— ἐξελεύσεται.] By Hebraism (like γενέσθαι) for 'shall be born.' ἡγούμενος, for ἡγεμὼν, as often in the later Classical writers.

— ποιμανεῖ.] This metaphorical use of ποιμ. to denote governing, is found in Homer and the early Greek writers, and seems to be a vestige of ancient simplicity. It is, moreover, very suitable to the messianic nature of Christ's kingdom, so often dwelt on in St. John's Gospel.

7. ἠκρίβωσε.] for ἀκριβῶς ἀνέμαθεν, 'procured from them exact information.'

— φαινομένου.] This is not put for φανίντος, as Kuin. supposes; but the Participle present is meant either to denote beginning, or continuity. This construction with the Genit. was probably in popular use. The full sense is, 'the time when the star would begin to shine, or be shining.'

8. πορευθέντες δ. ἐξετάσατε.] This use of the Participle is supposed to be pleonastic. But there may be a faint notion of speed intended; or rather it has an intensive force, especially with Imperatives. See Matthæi G. G. § 55. Ἐξετ. from ἐκ intens. and ἐτάζω, to verify by examination, from ἐτάω, true.

— ὅπως καὶ ἐλθὼν προσκ.] Render, 'in order that I too may come,' &c.

9. ἀκούσαντες.] The sense is, 'having received the King's commands.' Ἐν τῇ ἀνατ. should be rendered, 'in its rising.' See Fritz.

— ἰδοὺ.] So almost all the MSS. Versions and Fathers, with the Ed. Princ. and other ancient Eds.; which has been received by Mill, Wett., Oriesb., and Matth. And as it is sanctioned by the most certain of Critical canons, it may be regarded as the true reading. The vulg. αὐτοὺς was first brought forward by Erasmus, in his 5th Ed., and adopted, together with almost the whole of the Text of that Edition, by R. Steph. in his 2d Edition.

10. ἠγάγησαν—σφόδρα.] A stronger expression than this cannot easily be produced. The subjoining of a cognate substantive to any verb is found also in the Classical writers. The addition of σφόδρα to μάγας is a relique of early antiquity, when the superlative was formed (as in the Northern languages), not by a termination, but by the addition of particles, usually put after the adjunct.

11. ἐλθόντες εἰς τ. ο.] This is not for εἰσελθ., as some say; but it signifies, 'having come to the house [which they sought].'

— θησαυροῦς.] Camph. rightly renders caskets; though θησαυρός (as also the Latin thesaurus) signifies, 'any receptacle (as a box or bag) for valuables.'

— προσήνεγκαν—δῶρα.] Agreeably to the Oriental custom (even yet retained), of never appearing before a King, or any great personage, without offering him gifts; usually the choicest productions of the country of the giver. Markland ap. Bowyer, p. 50. observes, that προσφέρειν occurs seven times more in the New Testament, and is constantly used in a religious sense, of offerings to God. Δῶρα, by way of presents. This is put in apposition.

— λίβανον.] A transparent gum from a tree of the same name in Arabia, and used by the ancients as incense. Exod. xxx. 39. See Rob. Lex. From the nature of the presents it has been usually supposed that the Magi came from Arabia. That, however, is doubtful. See Fritz.

12. χρηματισθέντες.] This word, properly, and in the Classical writers, signifies, 1. to 'despatch business'; 2. to 'debate on it'; 3. to 'give audience thereon, and return answers.' Hence the transition is easy to the sense found in the N. T., Sept., and Joseph. Ant. iii. 8, 8, and xi. 8. 4. to 'impart Divine warnings,' and, in the Pass. to receive them; the term being used either absolutely, (as Heb. viii. 5. xi. 7. and xii. 25.) or with the additions ὑπὸ τοῦ Πνεύματος τοῦ ἁγίου, as Luke ii. 26., or ὑπὸ ἀγγέλου ἁγίου, as Acts x. 22. Thus κατ' ὄναρ in the present passage suggests the idea of Divine admonitions, since dreams were believed to be occasionally sent from God.

13. Αἴγυπτον.] A better place of refuge could not be found, from its proximity to Bethlehem, and complete independence on Herod. And as there were many Jews settled there, who enjoyed both civil protection and religious toleration, it would be at once a safe and a comfortable place of residence.

—ἴσθι.] 'continue, remain.' "Ἔως ἂν εἶπω σοί, namely, 'what thou must do further.' Μίλει—τοῦ ἀπολ., &c. 'for the purpose of destroying him.' The τοῦ is not, as some say, pleonastic; but the Genit. denotes purpose, as often in the Classical writers.

14. νυκτός.] By night, to conceal his departure; and the very night of his receiving the vision, to show his ready obedience.

15. τῆς τελευτῆς.] Scil. τοῦ βίου; like finis for finis vitae in Latin. The full phrase occurs in Homer, Herodotus, and others of the more ancient writers.

—ἵνα πληρωθῇ.] 'So that thus was fulfilled.'

—ἔξ Αἰγύπτου—μου.] "These words (from Hos. xi. 1.) are not cited merely by way of accommodation; but, referring primarily to the deliverance of the children of Israel out of Egypt, they were, secondarily and figuratively, fulfilled in the person of Christ. That Israel was indeed a type of Christ, appears from Exod. iv. 22. where he is called by God his son; his first born: whence also Israel is put for Christ, Isa. xlix. 3. Now as a prophetic prediction is then fulfilled, when what was foretold is come to pass, so a type is then fulfilled, when that is done in the antitype which was before done in the type. It is no objection that the remainder of the prophecy does not belong to Christ, as Matthew only notices the resemblance between the type and antitype, in that both were called out of Egypt." (Whitby.) A somewhat different and perhaps juster view is taken by a learned reviewer (of Bp. Wilson's Evidences of Christianity) in the British Critic for 1832, who regards it as an allusion or adaptation. q. d. 'So that the figurative declaration of God in Hosea, ἔξ Αἴγ.—μου, became, in this instance, a literal fact.' Similarly Epiphanius (cited by Heinsius), when combating the opposite error of the Antidicomarcionites, or the Collyridians—says, 'Ὡς κάκεινο τὸ παρὰ τισι τῶν ἑξωθεν φιλοσόφων ἀδόμενον, καὶ ἐναυτοῖς πληρώσασθαι, ἐν τῷ λέγειν Ἀὶ ἀκρότητες ἴστανται. 'So that the current saying of one of the heathen philosophers, extremes meet, was fulfilled in these.'

Dr. P. Smith, Scrip. Test. i. 341. 19. more rightly calls these pre-arranged allusions.

16. ἐνεπαίχθη.] 'was deceived;' literally, 'was trifled with, imposed upon,' as Jer. x. 14. Bar. iii. 17. and sometimes in the Class. writers. So illudere, in Latin.

—ἀποστείλας.] Here it is not necessary to suppose any ellipsis, as of τινας or ἀγγέλους, any more than in the Latin mittere, which is similarly used. When the Accus. is expressed (as sometimes in Herodot. and other early writers), it is of more definite sense than the above. There is no pleonasm in ἀποστείλας, but merely a vestige of primitive verbosity. Τοὺς παῖδας, 'the male children;' for though the masculine is sometimes used with nouns of the common gender, in reference to the whole species, both male and female, yet that is chiefly in the Classical writers, and where the context and the subject suggest the right application.

—ἀπὸ διετούς.] This has been usually regarded as an elliptical expression for ἀπὸ διετούς χρόνου, or, as formed from τὸ διετὲς, biennium. But the latter expression is quite destitute of authority; and the former is very rarely found, and only in plena locutione. And neither of the two is suitable in signification. It is rightly observed by Fischer de Vit. Lexx. N. T. that a masculine sense is required. But when he supposes a neuter form, he takes for granted what does not exist. The word has a masculine form as well as a masculine sense; and no wonder: for it is, in fact, an adjective, with the substantive παιδὸς left to be supplied from the context; as, in the present case, from τοὺς παῖδας preceding. The singular is used for the plural, as being taken in a generic sense. Thus it is the same as if there were written ἀπὸ διετῶν. This view of the phrase is confirmed by similar ones in J. Pollux ii. 2. νήπιος διετῆς. ii. Paral. xxxi. 16. ἀπὸ τριετούς καὶ ἐπάνω. i. Paral. xxvii. 23. ἀπὸ εικοσίτου καὶ κάτω. See also Ezr. iii. 8. Numb. i. 45. As to the opinion of several recent Commentators, that διετῆς may denote 'a year old,' it is wholly unsupported by authority. For as to that of Hezech., διετῆς δι' ἑλὺν ἔχου, it is nothing to the purpose; for we must there read either with the editors, δι' ἔχου, or rather διετῆσιος, from Snid. and Pollux, the gloss being borrowed from the Schol. on Thucyd. ii. 38. ἀγῶσι—διετησίαις νομιζόμεναι, who explains διετ. by δι' ἑλὺν τοῦ ἔχου. But such a sense would be quite inapplicable to the present passage. And that the children were of one year old, is opposed to all Ecclesiastical History.

17. τότε ἐπληρώθη, &c.] The words may be paraphrased, 'Then that happened whereby was more fully completed,' &c.; or rather, as the citation is only an accommodation of Jerem. xxii. 15, 'Such another catastrophe took place as that recorded by Jeremiah;' a manner of speaking familiar to the writers of the New Testament. See Matth. xv. 7, 8. compared with Isaiah xxix. 13. and Matth. xiii. 14. compared with Is. vi. 9. Matth. xiii. 34, 35. compared with Ps. lxxviii. 2. According to this mode, any thing may truly be said to be fulfilled, if it admits of being properly applied.

18. Θρήνος—πολύς.] A most pathetic accumulation of terms, expressing bitter grief, with which Wets. compares a similar one in Plato; ὀδυρμὸς δὲ καὶ στεναγμὸς, καὶ θρήνος καὶ ἀλγῶνας κ. τ. λ. The words (Kuini. observes) are to be understood of the Bethlehemites.

—κλαίουσα.] Sub. ἦν. A fine figure, whereby Rachel is personified, and supposed to be bewailing the slaughter, and weeping for her children, as Ephraim is, in the same chapter, represented as lamenting himself. 'Ὅτι οὐκ εἰσὶ (a common euphemism, for 'they are dead'), must be taken, not with παρακλ., but with κλαίουσα. In the passage of the Prophet, the words must mean, 'are gone (into captivity).'

20. οἱ ζητούντες] meaning Herod only. A use of plural for singular, common both to the Scriptural and the Classical writers, especially in speaking of Kings and Princes. See 1 Kings i. 41. compared with Matth. ix. 8. The expression ζητεῖ τὴν ψυχὴν τινος is said by Vorst. and Lend. to be formed from the Heb. צָרַחַת נַפְשִׁי in 1 Sam. xxiii. 15. Compare a similar passage in Exod. iv. 19. of Moses. The use of ψυχὴν for σῶμα, though, no doubt, derived by the sacred writers from the Hebrew, is likewise found in Herodot. and the other early Greek writers.

22. βασιλεύει.] Taken improperly for ἀρχεῖ, since Archelaus was not a βασιλεὺς, but an ἐθνάρχης. Ἐκεῖ, for ἐκείσε.

—ἐφοβήθη.] Not without reason; for Archelaus was heir to his Father's cruelty, as well as his throne.

23. κατέκησεν εἰς] 'fixed his abode at;' in contradiction to παρέστη. Eis is for ἐν, ut; as 2 Chron. xix. 4. κατέκησεν εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ. A signification common in the later Classical writers, on which see Win. Gr. § 54.

—Ναζ., κλησ.] Κληθήσεται is by some taken to mean 'shall be.' But to that sense it is here unnecessary, nay injudicious, to have recourse; for that Jesus was so called, in contempt, is certain from many passages of the Gospels. Bp. Middleton. renders Ναζ. 'the Nazarene;' since the Art. could not be inserted, the noun being preceded by the nuncupative verb κληθήσεται. Nazareth was proverbially a despised place, as is clear from Nathanael's question, 'Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth.' Thus Ναζωραῖος became, among the Jews, a common term for a despised and rejected character. And accordingly the meaning is, 'that Jesus should be despised and dishonoured.' See more in Hengstenburg ap. Robins. Lex. in voc. Διὰ τῶν προφητῶν is said because (as is rightly observed by Jerome) 'no particular prophet is meant, but the substance of what occurs in all those passages of the O.T. which were supposed to refer to the contempt with which the Messiah should be treated.'

III. 1. After the account of the nativity and infancy of Jesus, comes the second portion of the Gospel, containing a narrative of John the Baptist's proceedings with respect to our Lord, preparatory to his public ministry. Ch. iii. & iv. 1—11.

—ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ἐκ.] This phrase, for ἐν τούτῳ τῷ χρόνῳ, is a customary form of commencing a narrative, both in the Scriptural and Classical writers. The difference is, that the latter use it strictly, when only a brief period is interposed between the occurrence to be narrated and some other event before mentioned; whereas the former employ it with greater latitude, when there is a considerable interval; as here of many years: yet always with a reference to some previously mentioned time. And the time adverted to is that of the residence of Joseph at Nazareth. The transition may, indeed, seem abrupt, but not more so than many things in the Scriptures, or even the Classics, especially Thucyd. The reason why Matthew passes over the period of Christ's infancy is, that he had little certain information; and it was, too, not his purpose to narrate aught but what was connected with the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom. He therefore is silent on the event of Jesus's earlier years, and passes on to the uprise of his great Forerunner. The δὲ before ταῖς ἡμέρ. is omitted in some MSS. of the Alexandrian recension, later Versions, and Fathers: but its omission can far better be accounted for (partly from its commencing an Ecclesiastical Section, and partly from the difficulty of expressing its force in the Oriental versions) than its insertion. It has a transitive sense, like the Latin autem. Παράγινεται κηρύσσω is for παρὰγίνεται καὶ κηρύσσει. Παράγινεσθαι, like παρίναί and παρέχισθαι in Thucyd. and other writers, has the sense accedere, pro-dire; as said properly of those who come forward to deliver an oration. Κηρύσσω properly signifies to proclaim as a herald, and 2dly, to publicly teach evā voce, i. e. to preach. The former sense here is preferable: q. d. 'Make proclamation of the speedy coming of the Messiah.' Mark adds: βάπτισμα μετανόας εἰς ἀφίσιν ἁμαρτιῶν.

—ὁ βαπτιστὴς.] A name of office, equivalent to ὁ βαπτίζων, Mark vi. 14, and employed by the sacred writers to distinguish him from John the Evangelist. Baptism is well known to have been in general use with the Jews, as well as other Oriental nations, as a part of the ceremony for the admission of proselytes. It was believed that the administration of this rite would form part of the office of the Messiah. Nay, the mode in which the word is here introduced by Matthew, without any explanation, shows that the rite in question was familiar to his readers.

—ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ.] By this, however, is to be understood, not an absolutely desert tract, but one comparatively so; as being thinly inhabited, uninclosed by fences, and not in tillage, but pasture; like the steppes of Asia, the llanos of South America, the sheep-walks of Spain, and the extensive commons lately existing in our own country. This, indeed, is alluded to in the Heb. צִדְדִּים, literally, a place to drive cattle upon.

2. μετανοεῖτε.] The word properly signifies to take after-thought, as opposed to προνοεῖν. 2dly, to change one's opinion. 3dly, (in a religious sense) to so change one's views, as to reform one's practice. It implies such a change of mind as to the commission of any previous actions, as shall induce us to forsake the practices, from a conviction that they are opposed to the will of God, and are contrary to our true happiness, both here and hereafter.

—ἡ βασ. τῶν οὐρ.] This formula, and ἡ βασ. τοῦ Θεοῦ, are synonymous, and frequently occur in the N. T. They denote, 1. the abode of eternal felicity in heaven, and the state of things there; 2. (with allusion to the prophecies of the O. T.) they represent the spiritual reign of Christ, the Gospel dispensation (begun on earth, and to be completed in heaven), as here and at Matt. x. 7. Luke x. 9. xvii. 21. and various other passages. In some others it is doubtful which of these two senses is to be adopted. Nor are there wanting those where both seem to be combined.

3. οὗτος.] Some would take this δεικτικῶς. But though that use is not unfrequently found in the Classical writers; yet it very rarely occurs in the Scriptural ones, and would not here be very suitable. It is more natural to regard the words as the Evangelist's, — Ἡσαίου τοῦ προφήτου. The words which follow convey the sense, though they do not follow the exact terms, either of the Hebrew or Sept. [Comp. Isa. xl. 3. John i. 23.]

—φωνή, &c.] '[There heard] the voice of one preaching in the wilderness, and exclaiming, Ἐτοιμάσατε τὴν ὁδόν,' &c. The whole is an exact description of the office of John the Baptist, who prepared the way for the Redeemer by removing difficulties, and counteracting prejudices. A figure derived from the practice of Eastern monarchs, who, on taking a journey, or going on a military expedition, used to send forward persons to level the eminences, smoothen the unevennesses, fill up the hollows, &c., so as to form a road. To this purpose Weta. cites Sueton. Calig. 37. Joseph. B. J. iii. 5, l. 1. and Justin ii. 10. Plut. 837. Ovid Amat. ii. 16, 51. See my note on Thucyd. ii. 97, 100.

4. τὸ ἔνδυμα—καμήλου.] Some take this to mean the camel's skin with the hair on, as sheepskins were worn by the Hebrew prophets. See Zechar. xiii. 4. Others, however, more justly, suppose that it was the shaggier camel's hair, spun into coarse cloth, like our druggut. And we find from the Talmud that camel's hair garments were much worn by the Jews. Josephus more than once speaks of ἱσθῆς ἐκ τριχῶν καμηνιμένη, probably the σάκκος τρίχινος, of Revel. vi. 12. Nor were they unknown to the Heathens. Thus the Schol. on Eurip. Phœn. 329, mentions τὰ τρίχινα ἱνδύματα. Those, however, were probably made of the finer camel's hair, like a manufacture formerly made in this country, and called camlets. Garments similar to the Baptist's are still worn (or rather a manufacture of wool and camel's hair) in the East by the poor, or those who affect austerity. John wore this garment in imitation of the prophets, especially Elijah. See 2 Kings i. 8. whom he also imitated in the austerity of his life. Indeed it was his prophetic habit and mode of life, that was chiefly instrumental (together with the prevailing expectation of the Messiah's advent) in drawing the attention of the Jews to his ministry, whereby the spirit of prophecy, which had been lost to Israel for 400 years, was in some measure restored.

— ζώνην δερμ.] So of Elijah, 2 Kings i. 8. ζώνην δερματίνην περιζωσμένος τὴν ὀσφύν αὐτοῦ. The austerity consisted in the materials; for otherwise these girdles formed a regular part of the dress, and were of linen, silk, or even gold and silver, according to the circumstances.

— ἡ τροφή—ἀκρίδες.] That locusts (of which Bochart reckons ten species) were permitted to be eaten, appears from Levit. xi. 22; that they formed a customary food among the poor in the East, is plain from Agatharch. v. 27. Strabo xvi. p. 1118. Plin. vi. 30, &c. (Wets.) From Aristoph. Ach. 1116. and the Schol., it appears that the Greeks also ate of them, but that they were accounted a mean food. That they are at the present day a common diet among the poor, throughout most of the countries of Asia and Africa, which they infest, we learn from the testimony of modern travellers.

— μέλι ἄγριον.] This is by some taken to denote a sort of succarine matter exuding from the leaves of palm, date, or olive trees, and called honey-dew, which, when collected, becomes hard, and is readily formed into a mass. See Diodor. Sic. xix. 104 (who calls it, by this very name, μέλι ἄγριον) Joseph. B. J. iv. 27. Plin. N. H. xlii. 4. Polyb. 12. 4. 1. Xen. An. i. 2, 7. and the Rabbinical writers, who mention palm honey and fig honey. The more common opinion, however, is, that we are to understand honey procured from hollow trees and clefts of rocks, deposited there by swarms of wild bees. See 1 Sam. xiv. 26. Judg. xiv. 8. and Ps. lxxxi. 16.

5. καὶ πᾶσα.] The καὶ may, with Fritz., be rendered nampe. Πᾶσα, like πάρες in Mark i. 5, is to be taken, with limitation, for very many.

6. ἐβαπτίζοντο.] That baptismal ablutions or lustrations had been, even among the heathens, thought necessary for admission to religious ceremonies, and for the expiation of offences, the Classical citations here adduced by Wets. and others, fully prove. That they were in use, too, among the Jews, we find alike from the Old Testament, the Rabbinical writers, and Josephus. See B. J. ii. 8. 7. But the baptism here meant is one solemn rite, never to be repeated, comprehending the wives and children likewise of the proselytes; and founded partly on the ceremony which (as the Jewish theologians inform us) took place immediately previous to the promulgation of the Law, at Mount Sinai, and partly on the Jewish baptism of proselytes; though essentially differing from it. The one involving an obligation to perform the whole law; the other, an obligation to reformation, and faith in the Messiah about to appear—the one founded on a system of justification by works, the other one on faith in Christ. The custom, however, is believed not to have been introduced until after the return from the Babylonian captivity; and that to provide a less revolting mode of initiation into the Jewish church than circumcision. The Jews must have understood the ceremony as significant of a change of religion, and of introduction into a dispensation different from that of Moses. And that they should have expressed no surprise at this, need not be thought strange; since they were taught by the predictions of the prophets, and the instructions of their most eminent teachers, that at the advent of the Messiah (which was now universally expected), the face of things would be entirely changed, and a new religion be introduced by Baptism. (Wets., Bengel, Kuin. and Rosenm.)

— ἐξομολογούμενοι.] This is not so much put for the simple verb, as it is a stronger expression, (of which examples, chiefly from Joseph. and Philo. are adduced by Elsner and Wets.), and must be understood not of a particular and individual, but a general confession of sins, and renunciation of justification by works.

7. Φαρισαίων καὶ Σαδδουκαίων.] On these Sects see Recensio Synopt., or Horne's Introduction, and Robins. Lex. 'Ερχομένους—αὐτοῦ. The sense is well expressed by the Persian and Syriac versions, 'coming for the purpose of being baptized by him.' So Luke iii. 7, ἐκπορευομένοις βαπτισθῆναι ὑπ' αὐτοῦ. Of this signification of ἐπὶ examples are given by Wets. and Krebs.

— γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν] 'ye brood of vipers!' So they are likewise called by Christ himself, Matt. xii. 34. xxiii. 33. By this was meant to be designated their deadly malignity and wickedness, since the viper is the most poisonous of serpents. So Sophocles says: δεινῆς ἐχιδνῆς ἔρπυμα. Τίς ὑπέδειξαν ὑμῖν, &c. 'who hath shown or taught?' See Robins. The interrogative here does not, as some suppose, imply a strong negation; but the τίς rather imports exclamation (as in Galat. iii. 1), namely, from excessive surprise at seeing persons of such dissimilar opinions and characters (Sadducees and Pharisees, men of the world and votaries of pleasure, mixed with precise formalists, not to say hypocrites), unite in confessing their sins, in making professions of repentance, and vows of reformation. The motives of the generality in coming thither must have been corrupt, and no wonder; for the Jews were then immersed in moral depravity and religious error.

— ὀργῆς.] This is to be taken, by metonymy, for punishment, of which use examples are adduced by the Philologists. [Comp. infr. xii. 34. & xxiii. 31. Rom. v. 9. 1 Thess. i. 10.]

8. ποιήσατε καρπὸν ἄξιον τῆς μετ[ε]. q. d. 'if ye really repent, show forth not merely the leaves of profession, but the fruits of performance.' (Wets.) 'exhibit fruits worthy of,' and, by implication, 'suitable to,' as Acts xxvi. 20. Καρπὸν ἄξιον is the reading of the Ed. Fr. and Steph. 1st ed., and of almost all the MSS.; which is received by Wets., Matth., Griesb., and Scholz. The vulg. καρποὺς ἄξιους was introduced by Erasmi on very slight authority, and received, together with all his other alterations, by Steph. in his 3d edition; and was thus introduced into the textus receptus. The phrase ποιῶν καρπὸν is said to be a Hebraism; but some examples have been adduced from the Classical writers, as Plut. ii. 1117. C. οὐ μόντοι τοῦ Φεράπειμα τοῦτο ἴσχε καρπὸν ἄξιον. Arist. de Plant. i. 4. τῶν φυτῶν τινὰ μὲν ποιοῦσι καρπὸν. Both passages defend the reading adopted in the text.

9. μὴ δόξητε λέγειν.] This is thought to be a pleonasm for μὴ λέγῃτε, but it is, in fact, a stronger expression. As to the Greek Classical idiom concerning δοκεῖν, it is here inapplicable. The phrase seems to be rather a popular expression, founded on a blending of two phrases, μὴ δόξῃ, and μὴ λέγῃτε, q. d. 'ye must not think to say.' Λέγειν ἐν ἑαυτῷ is commonly regarded as a Hellenistic phrase, occurring also in Esth. vi. 6, equivalent to διαβοῶν, secretly think, and answering to the Hebr. חָשַׁב בְּלִבּוֹ. Yet it occurs in a passage of Chrysippus cited by Wets.

— Πατέρα ἔχομεν τὸν Ἀβ.] q. d. 'We have Abraham for our father [and therefore, as his descendants, cannot but be accepted by God;] as if God would, on account of that relation to the father of the faithful, impute not their sins unto them.' Ἐκ τῶν λίθων κ. τ. λ. Here there is by some supposed to be a comparison of the surrounding multitude to stocks and stones, by a common metaphor; q. d. 'God can cause that these stones, now lying in Jordan' (compare Joseph. Ant. 4. 3), i. e. men as unfit for useful purposes as stocks and stones, 'shall become children unto Abraham,' and imitate the virtues of Abraham. According to others, the words are meant to strongly show the omnipotence of God, who can raise up instruments to effect his own wise and benevolent purposes from the meanest subjects. [Comp. John viii. 39. Acts xii. 26.]

10. ἡ ἀξίνη] i. e. the axe of judgment and punishment. Κεῖται, 'is now being directed (Neut. for Passive) at.' Πρὶν hints at utter destruction; since directing the axe at the root of a tree denotes that it is to be cut down, not merely lopped. In the Scriptures men are often compared to trees; and sometimes (as Eccles. x. 15. and Dan. iv. 20 and 23.) their punishment to the felling of trees. [Comp. infr. vii. 19. John xv. 16.]

11. ἐν ὕδατι.] The ἐν is thought redundant; and Commentators adduce examples from the Classical writers. It rather, however, denotes the instrument, as Luke xiv. 34, and often.

— εἰς μετάνοιαν.] A brief phrase (in which the εἰς denotes purpose) adverting to the solemn engagement entered into by the baptized, to 'cease to do evil, and learn to do well.' This, indeed, was so closely associated with baptism, that it is called by Mark, i. 4, the baptism of repentance.

— ὁ ὀπίσω μου ἐρχόμενος, &c.] The Present is here used as at ver. 10, the sense being, 'There is one coming who will be after me in time, but who will be far greater than I.' There may be supposed an allusion to the expression ὁ ἐρχόμενος [he who is coming,] by which the Messiah was then, from the opinion of his speedy appearance, designated; as in John's inquiry, σὺ εἰ ὁ ἐρχόμενος; The expression is a brief one, requiring ἀναθεῖν, or ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, to be supplied, as elsewhere. Ἰκανός is equivalent to the ἄξιος of St. John, as in Herodotus viii. 36, and elsewhere.

— τὰ ὑποδήματα βαστάσαι.] Ὑπόδημα in Hellenistic phraseology is equivalent to σανδάλιον. Βαστάειν is synonymous with κομίζειν in a passage of Plutarch which I have adduced in Rec. Syn. The general sense is to have charge of. From Lucian in Herod. 5, cited by Wets. ὁ δέ τις μάλα δουλικῶς ἀφαιρεῖ τὸ σανδάλιον ἐκ τοῦ ποδός (to which may be added Æsch. Ag. 917. Hor. Epist. i. 13, 15: Soleas portat.) and other passages adduced by the Commentators, it appears that this was by the ancients in general accounted among the most servile of offices. Yet we find from the Rabbinical writers, that it was rendered by the disciple to the master; and from Eusebius, that this descended, with other observances towards the Rabbins, to the first Christian teachers. Thus the general sense is: 'I am not worthy to perform to him the humblest office.'

— βαπτίσει—πυρί.] There has been no little difference of sentiment as to the force of βαπτίζειν and πυρί. The most probable opinion is that of Chrys. and others of the ancients, that βαπτίζειν here, in the sense obstruere aliquem eo, has reference to the exuberant abundance of those extraordinary spiritual gifts soon to be poured forth. With respect to καὶ πυρί, Glass would suppose an Hendiadya, and take it for ignis: Elmsler regards the καὶ as aretistical, (in the sense even)

15 σου βαπτισθῆναι, καὶ σὺ ἔρχῃ πρὸς με; ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ ὁ Ἰη-σοῦς εἶπε πρὸς αὐτόν· Ἄφες ἄρτι· οὕτω γὰρ πρέπον ἐστὶν βαπτισθεὶς ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἀνέβη εὐθὺς ἀπὸ τοῦ ὕδατος· καὶ ἰδοὺ, ἀνεψύχθησαν αὐτῷ οἱ οὐρανοί, καὶ εἶδε τὸ Πνεῦμα τοῦ Θεοῦ 22

as representing the Symbol of the Holy Spirit. In either case there may be an allusion to the miraculous descent of the Holy Ghost in fiery tongues; which view is supported by Chrysost. Others, however, as Wets., Mich., Ros., and Dr. P. Smith, Scr. Test. ii. 36., maintain that by the symbol of fire is meant the severest punishment, or moral purgation. [Comp. John i. 26. Acts i. 5. ii. 4. xi. 16. xix. 4.]

12. οὐ τὸ πτύον—αὐτοῦ.] The οὐ is not redundant, as Grot., Wets., and Kuin. suppose; for, as Fritz. observes, if it were taken away, there would be no connection with the preceding. And he rightly renders, 'cujus (erit) ventilabrum (neipe) in ejus manu.' Πτύον signifies, not fan (which would require λικμὸς, as in Amos ix. 9, and was something like our houling machine, to raise wind by a sort of fan-like sail;) but a winnowing shovel, which, from Hesych., seems to have been, in the lower part of it, shaped like a Δ. The word is derived from πτύειν, to toss away. Διακαθαρίζει is for διακαθαρίζει, Atticō.

—τὴν ἄλωνα.] The word denotes properly that elevated area formed in a field, after harvest, of soil hardened by the use of a cylinder, (see Paulsen ap. Fritz.) where the corn in the sheaf was trodden by oxen, and at the same time winnowed; which latter operation was performed by tossing the rough and broken straw away with a fork; and then by stirring up the compound of grain and chaff with the πτύον; whereby the chaff was delivered to the wind, and the grain left in a heap; after which the rough straw was collected and burnt for manure. Here, however, ἄλων seems to signify (by a metonymy of the thing containing for that contained) the above compound of grain and chaff to be winnowed; a sense often occurring in the Sept. And so Alciph. iii. 26, διακαθαρίζων τὴν ἄλω.

By τὴν ἀποθήκην is meant a repository where any thing (as here corn) ἀποτίθεται; which was chiefly, in the East, subterraneous, or partly so, but covered down and thatched over. By the ἄχυρον is denoted, not the chaff only, but the rough and broken pieces of straw, separated from the corn by the above process. [Comp. infr. xiii. 30.]

13. τότε.] This particle does not mark the exact time when the baptism of Christ took place, but only points to the time when John was baptizing.

—παραγίνεται—τοῦ βαπτισθῆναι ὁ. α.] A Genitive of cause; the expression being equivalent to εἰς τὸ βαπτισθῆναι. Christ was pleased to receive this baptism, as thereby entering upon his ministry on the same principles as those on which the priests under the Law were dedicated to their office (see Exod. xl. 12, and Lev. viii. 6, compared with Heb. ii. 17); and moreover as justifying the counsels of heavenly Wisdom, by thus recognizing the Divine institution of the Law, and sanctioning ordinances originally established for wise and good purposes. And the selection of John to administer the rite would answer many important purposes, and especially tend to the establishment, by a voice from heaven, of the authority both of Christ and his Forerunner.

14. διεκώλυεν] 'was hindering, would have hindered.' A not unfrequent sense of the Imperf., on which see my Note on Thucyd. iv. 44.

—ἐγὼ χρεῖαν, &c.] A refined way of saying, 'I am very far inferior to thee, so as rather to need thy baptism than thou mine; and yet dost thou come to me, as to a superior?' For (as Grot. observes) 'he who binds another by baptism, seems to be superior to him who is bound.'

15. ἄρτι.] Rosenm. and Schleus. explain quæso (conspiring the ἄρτι with δὴ and the Heb. יְהִי.) But the version 'for the present,' is far preferable. Indeed, the former mode would destroy the emphasis, which has been, with reason, supposed to exist in the word. The meaning is, that John must suffer him, for the present, to be baptized with the baptism of water, for that baptism of his with the Spirit was yet to be exhibited. At ἄφες supply, not με, but τοῦτο εἶναι, which is confirmed by Chrys. Δικαιοσύνην is for δικαιώματα, institutions, as often in the Sept. So, at Deut. vi. 24, πληροῦν τὴν δικαιοσύνην is equivalent to ποιεῖν τὰ δικαιώματα.

16. καὶ βαπτισθεὶς.] Luke adds καὶ προσεψύχθησαν.

—εὐθὺς.] There is here a transposition (such as that in Mark i. 29, and xi. 2, found also in the Classical writers), by which εὐθὺς must be taken, not with ἀνέβη, but (as Grot. and others have seen) with ἀνεψύχθ. Fritz. indeed makes objections to εὐθὺς being taken with ἀνεψύχθ.; and would join it, by a similar transposition, with βαπτισθ. But though that method is less harsh, the sense thence arising is somewhat frigid.

—ἀνεψύχθησαν οἱ οὐρανοί.] Here certain recent foreign Commentators (on the same principle by which they elsewhere endeavour to resolve the extraordinary into the merely ordinary) understand lightning of the most vivid kind, 'by which, as it were, the heavens were cleft asunder.' But there is every reason to suppose the light to have been preternatural, and to have accompanied the DIVINE SPIRIT; such a light as accompanied Jesus, on being visibly revealed to St. Paul at his conversion.

The αὐτῷ after ἀναέχθησαν is by some referred to Jesus (as a Datus commodi); by others, to John; according to which it will mean, 'to his view,' namely John's. A sense more suitable, since the heavens were opened as a testimony to John of the Messiahship of Jesus.

— ὡσεὶ περιστεράν.] There is an ambiguity in this circumstance, which has occasioned a variety of interpretation. Some understand by it the descent of a material dove, as a symbol of the Spirit, and with allusion to the innocence and meekness of Christ. Others take ὡσεὶ περ. to refer to the mode in which the Spirit, in some visible form (probably of a flame of fire), descended; namely, with that peculiar hovering motion which distinguishes the descent of a dove, and which is adverted to by Virg. Æn. v. 216, cited by Wets. But the words of St. Luke (σωματικῶς εἶδει ὡσεὶ περιστεράν) seem rather to require the former interpretation. By ἐρχόμενον ἐπ' αὐτόν is meant, coming and resting, or settling upon him; for this expression appears to be of the same force as the καταβαίνουσιν—καὶ μῖνον ἐπ' αὐτόν in the parallel passage of John i. 32, 33, whence we learn how it was that John so readily recognised Jesus as the Christ, since he had been apprised by the Lord what sign was to denote the great Personage, the expectation of Israel. [Comp. John i. 33.]

17. φωνὴ ἐκ τῶν οὐρ.] Wets., Rosenm., Kuin., and Schleus., take this of thunder; which, however, involves absurdity; for (as Mr. Rose on Parkhurst Lex. p. 491, justly observes), 'if articulate words were heard, λέγουσα simply tells us that the very words which follow were used, and the thunder is a gratuitous supposition. If it is meant that no uttered words were heard, only a stroke of thunder, which was to be understood as declaring that Jesus, &c., reasoning is idle; for language could hardly have been used less appropriate to convey this idea.' 'It is, moreover, (as observes Dr. Henderson on Inspiration, p. 88), quite at variance with the usus loquendi of the Scriptures, in which the formula φωνὴ ἐκ Θεοῦ is never employed except in reference to actual verbal declaration.' Compare Dan. iv. 3, 'there fell a voice from heaven (φωνὴ ἐκ οὐρανοῦ), saying,' &c.

We must therefore understand an articulate sound, audible by all present (such as that on the Mount of Transfiguration, and just before the death of Jesus) publicly declaring his Messiahship.

— ἀγαπητός.] For ὁ μονογενής. Applied here, and xii. 18, and Luke ix. 35, xx. 13, to the Messiah. It is taken from the Sept.; as in Gen. xii. 2; Jer. vi. 26; Amos viii. 10; Zach. xii.

10.—This use occurs in Hom. II. vi. 401, and Hesiod, referred to by Pollux, iii. 2. Thus ὁ Υἱὸς μου ὁ ἀγαπητός may be regarded as a title, to denote the nearness of His relation to God, and the love borne by the Father to Him. See John iii. 35, and Dr. Smith's Scrip. Test. i. iii. ch. 3. § 3.

— ἐν ᾧ εὐδόκησα.] The use of the ἐν in this phrase is formed from the Heb. עִי, and occurs also in the Septuagint. The Aorist is not (as some suppose) put for the present, but has the sense of custom, which is frequent in that tense. See Matth. Gr. Gr. § 503. [Comp. infr. xii. 18. xvii. 5; Isa. xlii. 1; Ps. ii. 7; Luke ix. 35; 2 Pet. i. 17; Col. i. 13.]

IV. 1. ἀνέχθη—Διαβόλου.] 'Ανέχ. need not be taken, with some recent Commentators, for ἤχθη, since the ἀνα may refer to the high and mountainous country of which the desert here mentioned (supposed to be what is now called Quaran/anis, a rugged mountain range on the north of the road leading from Jerusalem to Jericho) consisted, as compared with the low ground about Jordan.

— πειρασθῆναι ὑ. τ. Δ.] We are now come to the narrative of a most awful and mysterious transaction, consequently encompassed with difficulties too mighty for the human understanding: to avoid which, several eminent persons, of ancient and modern times, have thought that a visionary scene, not a real event, is here narrated. But there is not the slightest intimation in the narrative, that the temptation was such. The air of the narrative produces an impression quite the contrary; and there are many strong reasons why such a view cannot be admitted. While in favour of the common view, we may safely maintain, that there is nothing in the circumstances, which involves any strong improbability: but rather what is quite agreeable to the analogy of God's methods, in other points, in his dispensations to man. Bp. Porteus, Dr. Townson, and Jones of Nayland, trace several points of similitude to the temptation of Adam and Eve in Paradise. And others have compared the character and design thereof with those of the Crucifixion, and have recognized in both a vicarious transaction. As to the confident assertion of the Unitarians, that the very form of expression, ἀνέχθη ὑπὸ τοῦ Πν. shows that it is only a visionary scene, referring for similar expressions to Rev. i. 10; Acts xi. 5, the latter of these has nothing in common with this of St. Matthew; and the former, though it bears some verbal resemblance to the parallel passage of Luke iv. 1, is really of quite another character. Similar expressions do indeed occur in Matt. xii. 28; Luke ii. 27; Acts viii. 29, and x. 19. But no one ever imagined the actions there described to be merely imaginary. As to those Rationalists who would understand the fasting here spoken of to have been ascetic abstinence, the hypothesis is utterly excluded by the express words of Luke

iv. 2. καὶ οὐκ ἔφαγεν οὐδὲν ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ἐκείναις, where there is a negation of the strongest kind, meaning, 'he ate nothing whatever.'

— τοῦ Διαβόλου.] Διάβολος means properly a slanderer. It is sometimes in the N. T. an appellative; but mostly denotes, with the Art., the great enemy of God and man; thus exactly answering to the Heb. יָצָן. This arises from the close connection between the senses of hater and enemy. And though the noun be not often found used, yet the verb διαβάλλεσθαι occurs in Herodot. and other writers, in the sense to be hated; and διαβάλλεσθαι τι, in Thucyd. iii.
 108, iv. 21, viii. 63, signifies, 'to be set against any one, to hate him.'

3. ὁ πειράζων.] Particip. pres. for substantive verbal; an idiom found both in the Scriptural and the Classical writers.

— Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ.] Not 'a son of God,' as Campb. and Wakef. render. For it has been proved by Bp. Middl. that υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, or υἱὸς Θεοῦ are never taken in a lower sense than ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, which is always to be understood in the highest sense. Thus in Mark i. 1, Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ is spoken by the Evangelist himself of Jesus. In John x. 36, the same phrase is employed by Christ himself of himself: and in Matt.
 xvii. 40, it is used by those who well knew Christ's pretensions. Neither is υἱὸς Θεοῦ, without either of the Articles, to be taken in a lower sense; for, not to examine all the places in which it occurs, we have Matt. xxvii. 43, where the crime laid to Christ is, that he said, 'I am the Son of God.'

— εἰπὲ] 'order.' This is no Hebraism, but occurs in Thucyd. and the best Classical writers, as commonly as dic in Latin.

— ἄρτοι.] Loaves. "Ἀρτος, used indefinitely, is rightly translated bread; but when joined with eis, or any other word limiting the signification in the singular number, ought to be rendered loaf; in the plural it ought always to be rendered loaves.' (Campb.)

4. ἐπ' ἄρτι—ζήσεται.] The quotation agrees with the Heb. and Sept. For, although the Vatican text has τῷ, yet many of the best MSS. and several Fathers omit it. 'O is placed before ἄνθρωπος in several MSS. of the Alex. recension, and has been introduced into the text by Griesb., Knapp, and Fritz; but without sufficient authority. Vater and Scholz have not admitted it. The Pres. is here put for the Fut., or rather may be taken of what is customary. The ἐπὶ signifies upon or by, as the means of support. So Plat. Alcib. ἐπὶ τούτοις μόνοις ζῇ.

— ἐπὶ πτερύγῃ—Θεοῦ.] This, explained allegorically, will signify, like the Heb. עַל, the spiritual life imparted by the Word of God, a mode of interpretation confirmed by the authority of the Fathers. Yet as ῥῆμα (to which, however, there is no word corresponding in the Heb.) may be rendered thing, as well as word; so the modern Commentators are justified in explaining it,
 VOL. I.

 'whatever is ordained by God.' 'The temptation (observes Campb.) is repelled by a quotation from the O. T. (Deut. viii. 3. comp. Ps. civ. 29), purporting that, when the sons of Israel were in the like perilous situation in a desert, without the ordinary means of subsistence, God supplied them with food, by which their lives were preserved, to teach us that no strait, however pressing, ought to shake our confidence in him.' 'The life of man depends on God, and not on food. God can sus-tain life without food; but food cannot sustain life without his blessing.' With this sentiment comp. Wisd. xvi. 26. οὐχ αἰγιάσεις τῶν καρπῶν τρίφουςιν ἄνθρωπον, ἀλλὰ τὸ ῥῆμά σου τοὺς σοὶ πιστεύοντας διατηρεῖ.

5. As to the difference in the order of the temptations recorded by Matthew, as compared with that in Luke (who transposes the last two) the discrepancy (if, indeed, it can be called such) is not to be removed by any 'device for the nonce'; such as supposing the temptation to idolatry to have taken place twice; or the order in Luke to have been disturbed by transcribers. We may best account for such difference in order in the Evangelists by attributing it to a difference of purpose in narrating the temptation; and suppose, that while Matthew intended to fix the order of the circumstances, (which is plain by his having employed the definite terms τότε and τάλιν.) Luke did not mean to be so very exact, but merely to record the transaction in a general way; and thus the ordinary conjunction was sufficient for his purpose.

The Devil, finding Christ immovably confident in his heavenly Father, changes his method of attack. Παραλαμβάνει, &c. An expression which has been variously understood, but generally misunderstood. The term often signifies, both in the Scriptural and Classical writers, 'to take any one along with us' (παρα) [as a companion]. Of course neither this term nor ἵστησιν gives the least countenance to the vulgar notion, that the Devil transported our Lord through the air.
 The latter is admitted to have the sense, 'prevailed upon him to take his station.' So xvii. 2.
 and Gen. xliii. 9. στάσω αὐτὸν ἐναντίον σου.

— δόλιον πόλιν.] Jerusalem was so called κατ' ἐξοχήν, as having the holy Temple and its worship. Thus the inscription on its coins was 'Jerusalem the holy.' Indeed, the Heathens called those cities holy, which were accounted the special residence of any of their deities.

Commentators are not agreed. One thing is clear, that it cannot mean pinnacl; for thus there would have been no Article. And for the sense pinnacl batlement, (assigned by Grot., Hamm., and Dodd.) there is no authority. Unluckily we have no other example of πτερόν as used of a building. But since the primitive πτερόν has been proved by Wets. to denote the roof of a temple, so this is supposed by Krebs, Middlet., Schleus., and Fritz., to denote the pointed roof of some part of the Temple, and as they are inclined to think, the great Eastern porch, called Solomon's porch. The most probable opinion, however, is that of Wets., Michaelis, Rosenm., and Kuin., that it referred to what was called the King's Portico, which overhung the precipice at the S. and E. of the temple (see Joseph. Ant. xv. 11 and 5); and was perhaps so called from the spire-like figure which the end of the building presented from below. [Comp. Psalm xci. 11.]

6. γέγραπται γάρ, ὅτι κ. τ. λ.] The former was a temptation to presumption from trust in himself; this, to distrust in God's Providence. The Scripture quotation with which the Devil subtly tries to effect his purpose, is perverted; for the promise of protection there given is limited to those only, who endure the evils which meet them in the path of duty; not in such as they bring upon themselves by rashly presuming on God's protection. The metaphor in ἐπὶ χειρῶν αρουσί σε, is (as Kuin. remarks) taken from parents, who, in travelling along rough ways, lift up and carry their children over the stones in their path, lest they should trip and stumble upon them.

7. οὐκ ἐκπειράσεις, &c.] From Deut. vi. 16. Ἐκπειράσεις (where the ἐκ is intensive for δια) signifies to make trial of any one's power generally; and here, of any one's power to save life. Interpreters, however, are not agreed whether Christ is warning against presumption or distrust. The former is the more probable.

8—11. Despairing of success by any covert device, the Devil resolves to make one open and final effort, staking success on the vastness of the proposed price of transgression.

8. δείκνυσιν—κόσμον.] Δείκνυσι sometimes imports not absolutely to show to the right, but merely to point out; and here may serve to indicate the several kingdoms. Yet there is a difficulty as concerns τοῦ κόσμου, and the term of Luke iv. 5, τῆς οἰκουμένης. To obviate this, the best modern Commentators are agreed, that the terms must be taken in a restricted sense, to denote Palestine only. And undoubted examples of this signification have been adduced, as Rom. iv. 13. Luke ii. 1. Rom. i. 8. From this lofty mountain (supposed to have been Nebo) a prospect would be afforded (as formerly to Moses) of nearly the whole of Palestine; and its provinces might be styled kingdoms, just as their rulers, whether tetrarchs or ethnarchs, were sometimes called kings. See Matt. ii. 22, and so freq. Josephus.

9. προσκυνήσεις.] The word here implies, not merely homage, but adoration, i. e. religious worship. See Smith's Scrip. Test. i. iii. ch. 3. The manner, indeed, of rendering both was in the East the same, namely, by prostration to the earth; but the latter would necessarily differ in degree.

10. ὅπισω.] Not found in the Vulg., but received from very many MSS., Versions, and Fathers, by all the best Editors.

—λατρεύσεις.] Λατρεύειν signifies properly to render service to any one; but in the Sept. and N. T. it is generally confined to religious service.

11. ἀφήσιν αὐτόν] 'lets him alone.' Luke, ἀπίστη ἐκ' αὐτοῦ.

—διεκόνουν αὐτῷ.] Διακονεῖν properly signifies to be an attendant on any one; but here and at Matt. xxvii. 55, and Mark i. 13 and 31, it signifies (like ministrare in Latin) to wait at table, and, by implication, to supply with food. So Eurip. Cycl. 31, Κόκκωσι διακονῶν διακονοῖ.

12. Though the circumstance of the final frustration of the Tempter, and the retirement of Jesus into the desert, after the death of John, are placed together, yet some not inconsiderable time must have intervened between one and the other event, during which Christ had not only entered on his ministry, but become eminent.

—παρεδόθη.] Sub. εἰς φυλάκην, which is usually expressed, as in Acts viii. and xxii. 4. Or it may be (with Fritz.) regarded as an indefinite form of expression, (left so, in order to avoid mentioning what is unpleasant) signifying 'to be delivered up into any one's power, for harm.' [Comp. Luke iii. 19. John iv. 43.]

13. τὴν παραθαλασσίαν) 'that which is on the coast of the sea,' or lake of Gennesareth. So called to distinguish it from another Capernaum, mentioned by Josephus. [Comp. Luke iv. 16. 30. 31.]

15. Νεφθαλείμ] Drusius would read Νεφθαλί, from the Hebrew. But the present reading seems better to correspond to the Syro-Chaldee, spoken by the Apostles; according to whose peculiarities of termination proper names of the O. T. would be likely to be conformed.

15, 16. The words agree neither with the Sept. nor the Hebrew; yet the discrepancy is by no means so great as would at first sight appear. The Heb., indeed, is, in our Common version, wrongly translated; and the printed text of the Sept. is very corrupt. If the mistakes of the one be rectified, and the corruptions of the other be removed, the discrepancy will almost vanish, especially if we consider the purpose of the Evangelist; who did not mean to cite the whole prophecy contained in Is. ix. 1, 2, but that part of it which sufficed for his purpose. Why he did not cite the whole, was, perhaps, for this reason—that the Sept. was then, as it is now, throughout these verses exceedingly corrupt, and that the Hebrew was very obscure. He, however, perceived that the general scope of the former of the two verses was the same as the latter; and that this latter presented only a fuller statement of what was contained in the former. The sense of both being this, that, 'in the former time, he debased (or permitted to be debased) the land of Zebulon, and the land of Nephthali; the maritime district; the country beyond Jordan, called Galilee of the Gentiles; but, in the latter time, he hath made (or will make) it glorious.' Such being the case, the Evangelist rightly judged, that the substance of the two verses might be blended into one; omitting, in the former verse, the obscure words of the Hebrew, and the corrupt ones of the Greek; and retaining the rest, with the slight change (adopted from the Sept.) of making γῆ Ζαβ. &c. nominative instead of accusative cases, followed by ὁ λαὸς ὁ καθήμενος put in apposition with, as explanatory of, the preceding, and pointing out the nature of the glory to which that country was destined. The country here meant by ὁδὸν Θαλάσσης is that circumjacent to the sea of Galilee; for that is the Sea. here intended. Ὀδὸν Sea. is elliptically expressed for ἡ χώρα καθ' ὁδόν. So Eschyl. Prom. 2. Χθονὶ μὲν εἰς τηλοῦρόν ἔκταν ἴδον, Σκόθην εἰς οἶμον. where the Schol. explains οἶμον by ὁδόν, meaning tract or country. Thus the words will be found a most graphical description of the country afterwards called Galilee, divided into its districts, as it was in the time of the Prophet; in which Γῆ Ζαβ. and γῆ Νεφ. denote the whole of the tribes of Zebulon and Nephthali, except a tract of country bordering on the lake, the same I imagine as that which, in mentioning the divisions of Galilee, the Rabbins call the Vally. The two next designations, (which are in apposition), πέραν Ἰορ., Γαλιλ. τῶν ἰθύνων denote, I apprehend, the same district; the latter being only another appellation of the former. The country meant is that district, between Mount Hermon and the river, which skirts the E. side of Jordan, in its course from Mount Libanus to where it enters the sea of Galilee, and in which are situated Chorazin, and other places frequented by our Lord. As to the discrepancies which seem to subsist between the Sept. and S. Matthew, I apprehend that, in the time of the Evangelist, the text of the Sept. very nearly agreed with that which we now find in his Gospel; and it ran, I conceive, as follows: χώρα Ζαβ., ἡ γῆ Νεφ. ὁδὸν θαλάσσης [καὶ] τὴν παραλίαν [οἰκούντες] καὶ πέραν τοῦ Ἰορ., Γαλ. τῶν ἰθύνων, ὁ λαὸς ὁ πορ. ἐν σκότει, εἶδε τὸ φῶς μέγα· οἱ καθ. ἐν χ. [καὶ] σκ. θαν. φῶς ἔλαμψε ἐπ' αὐτούς. Most of the deviations here found from the present text are, more or less, supported by MSS. The words λοιποὶ οἱ in the common text are evidently from the margin, as also οἰκούντες, which is found in some MSS. As to τὴν παραλίαν, the true reading, I have no doubt, is τῆς παραλίας. But I suspect that even that came originally from the margin; where it was meant to explain ὁδὸν θαλ. In the Alex. and some other MSS. we have both ὁδὸν θαλ. and its gloss; which latter (as is often the case,) by degrees expelled the original reading. Εἶδε τὸ, for the textual εἶδε, or εἶδεν, is found in several of the best MSS. The error is such as often occurs; and here led to the rash alteration of αὐτοὺς into ὑμᾶς. The reading of the Sept., οἱ οἰκούντες, strongly supports that found in the Codex Cant. and several of the best MSS. of the early Italic Version, οἱ καθήμενοι. This is confirmed by the Hebrew, which is well rendered by Rosenm. 'et qui Cimmericas regiones colchant, his sol affulgebit.' However ungrammatical the idiom may seem, it is very agreeable to the character of the Hellenistic Greek, and is not unfrequently found in the Apocalypse.

16. καθήμενος ἐν σκότει.] Καθῆσθαι sometimes signifies, as here, to live or be; of which sense the Commentators adduce examples, as Judith v. 3. 1 Macc. ii. 1, 29. Sir. xxxvii. 18. Herodot. i. 45. ἐν πύθει καθ. and Dionys. Hal. Ant. p. 502. To which may be added Aristoph. Pac. 642. ἡ πόλις γὰρ ἡγχιόσσα κεν φόβῳ καθήμενη. Since, however, the word, in this sense, is almost always connected with terms importing grief or calamity, there may be an allusion to sitting, as being the posture of mourners. Σκότος and φῶς are, in Scripture, used to denote respectively the ignorance of irreligion, and the light of the Gospel. But here φῶς, (abstract for concrete,) signifies an enlightener, or teacher; of which sense Wets. adduces numerous examples, as Hom. Il. π. 39. φῶς Δαναοῖσι γίνωμαι. Eurip. El. 449. Ἑλλάδι φῶς.

* Καὶ περιήγεν ὅλην τὴν Γαλιλαίαν ὁ Ἰησοῦς, διδάσκων ἐν 23

— ἐν χώρᾳ καὶ σκιᾷ θανάτου.] This is to be taken, like the Sept. ἐν χώρᾳ σκιᾷ θανάτου for ἐν χώρᾳ σκοτεινῇ, similar to which is the mortis umbra of Ovid and Virg. Expressions very applicable to Galilee, whose inhabitants were proverbially rude, ignorant, and brutish. [Comp. Isa. xlii. 7.]

— ἀνέτειλεν.] So the Classical writers speak of the coming of some public benefactor as a light sprung up in the midst of darkness, (see Æschyl. Pers. 239, and Agam. 505,) and ἀνατίλλω properly denotes the rising of the sun, and here is used fig., agreeably to the foregoing metaphor. Αὐτοῖς is redundant; not so much by Hebraism, as according to the popular use in almost all languages.

17. ἀπὸ τότε.] Sub. χρόνου, i. e. from the time that Jesus settled at Capernaum. ἤρξατο κηρύσσειν is for ἐκέρυξε; by a redundancy, say the Commentators, common to both the Heb. and Latin. But it may be doubted whether there be any real pleonasm in the expression. The words ὁ Ἰησοῦς are not found in very many MSS., Versions, and Fathers; and it is cancelled by all the Critical Editors from Wets. to Scholz. Yet internal evidence seems in their favour; for no good reason can be imagined why they should have been introduced; but a sufficient one why they should have been thrown out (by the Alexandrian Critics), namely, to remove a tautological repetition of the word. As to the Versions, the framers of most of them followed the Alexandrian recension, (and therefore stand for nothing); and even when they did not, they occasionally took a liberty like this, to which they thought themselves entitled; and here especially, as they perceived ὁ Ἰησοῦς did not occur in the parallel passage of Mark; though considering that Mark systematically abridges Matthew, that may very well be accounted for. Repetitions of proper names, where they would not be admitted in modern style, are of perpetual occurrence in the Scriptural writings. Probably, however, this is not one of those, since a new Section is here commenced, and therefore ὁ Ἰησοῦς seems very properly repeated: though there was no such necessity for it as to cause it to be foisted in by the Critics. [Comp. supr. iii. 2. et infra. x. 7.]

18. ἀμφίβληστρον.] This is properly an adjective with δίκτυον understood. The word is used by Hesiod, Herodot., and other authors, and appears, from its use, (see Herodot. i. 141.) to have denoted a large drag-net; as δίκτυον, from δίκω, usually a small casting net. [Comp. Luke v. 2. John i. 42.]

19. δεῦτε ὅπισθ' ἡμῶν.] Δεῦτε is generally considered as a mere particle of exhortation, like ἀγε or ἀγαγε and the Heb. הָיָה or הָיָה. But it is here and at xi. 28. xxii. 4. Mark i. 17. vi. 31. used in its proper sense, to denote venite or adde. Buttm. rightly derives it from δεῦρ' ἴτε. The ὅπισθ' ἡμῶν has reference to the custom for disciples to follow their master; and the expression is equivalent to 'Be (or become) my disciple.' So, in Diog. Laert. ii. 48, Socrates is said to have called Xenophon with the words ἔπου τοῖνυν καὶ μάνθανε.

— ἀλιεῖς ἀνθρώπων] i. e. 'able to draw men over to the Gospel.' So Plato, in his Sophista, compares the teacher of wisdom to a fisher. And in Stob. Serm. p. 313. (cited by Palairot) Solon says: 'Εγὼ μὴ ἀνασχῶμαι ἵνα ἀνθρώπων ἀλιεύσω; Indeed, terms of hunting and fishing are often used by the Classical writers of conciliating friends, or gaining disciples.

21. ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ.] This is wrongly rendered by some 'in the boat.' Πλοῖον, indeed, is a general term to denote a vessel of any size; but it must here denote the ship, i. e. their ship. About this time occurred the miraculous draught of fishes recorded by Luke, v. 1, 11.

23. περιήγεν] obvi, peragrativ. Act. for mid., by the ellip. of ἑαυτοῦ. The Accus. after περιήγεν depends on the peri in composition. Αὐτῶν, used with reference to the plural implied in the preceding Γαλιλαίαν, is said by the figure πρὸς τὸ σημαίνον, meaning an agreement with what is signified, though not according to grammatical form. Τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τῆς βασιλείας, scil. τοῦ Θεοῦ.

— νόσον καὶ πᾶσαν μαλακίαν.] Kuinoel regards the terms as synonymous, which they sometimes are, but not here. Νόσος rather denotes a thoroughly formed disorder, whether acute or chronic; μαλακία, an incipient indisposition, or temporary malady. See Euthym. and Markland in Bowyer.

24. ἀκοή.] The word means 1. the sense of hearing; 2. the instrument of hearing; 3. the thing heard, or announced; also, as here, a report, or fame, like the Latin auditio for fama. Αὐτοῦ is Genitive of object for περὶ αὐτοῦ; as in Joseph. Ant. p. 786, 45, ἀφίκετο ἀγγελία περὶ αὐτοῦ.

— βασάνοις συνεχομένους.] Βάσανος signifies 1. a touchstone; 2. examination, or trial, by torture; 3. torture itself; 4. any tormenting malady; of which signification examples are adduced by Wets. Συνίχεσθαι is often used with a Dative of some disorder; and has reference to such as confine the sufferers to their bed.

— καὶ δαιμονιζομένους, καὶ σεληνιαζομένους.] Σελην. liter. moon-struck; but fig. denoting epileptic persons, so called from the common notion, that the disorder was aggravated by, and returned upon them with the increasing moon. Notwithstanding the learning and talent which have been so profusely expended in support of the hypothesis of Mede and Farmer, that these δαιμονιζόμενοι were merely persons afflicted with lunacy, it is utterly untenable. The disorders could not be the same: that of those possessed with demons being precisely distinguished, not only from natural diseases of the worst sort, but from lunacy in particular. It is true, that among both Heathens and Jews, lunacy and epilepsy were ascribed to the agency of dæmons (the spirits of dead men, or other evil beings); and it must be granted, that there are some passages of Scripture (as Matt. xvii. 11, 15. John vii. 20. viii. 48, 52. x. 2.) which prove that the terms σελην., ἐπιληπ., and δαιμ. were sometimes used synonymously. But that will not prove that they were not properly distinct from each other. And surely tokens distinguished, their being sometimes used synonymously ought not to affect their proper acceptation. The great preponderance, too, of the latter over the former seems to evince an intention, on the part of the sacred writers, to prevent the false conclusions which might be drawn from the diseases having many symptoms in common, by marking those cases of possession which Jesus relieved, by some circumstances not equivocal, and which could never accompany an imaginary disorder. And when it is urged, that the Evangelists merely adopted the popular phraseology of their countrymen, without any belief in the superstitions connected therewith (as with us the use of the term bewitched implies no belief in witchcraft), that is taking for granted the very thing to be proved, and confounds a distinction, important to be always kept in view, that between popular phraseology and doctrine. Mr. Mede was led into the view adopted by him, from having, he says, 'observed it to be God's gracious method, in the course of his revealed dispensations, to take advantage of men's habitual prejudices, to support his truth, and keep his people attached to his ordinances.' But the learned writer should have known how to distinguish between rites and doctrines. They were rites only, of which the Almighty availed himself, for the benefit of his servants: in matters of doctrine, the like compliance could not be indulged them without violating material truths; and therefore Scripture affords us no example of such a condescension. And surely, to support a false and supposititious opinion concerning diabolic possessions would have been contaminating the purity of the Christian faith. Moreover, when it is urged, that no reason can be given why there should have been demoniacal possessions at the time of our Lord, and not at the present day, we reply that these possessions might then be permitted to be far more frequent than at any other period, in order that the power of Christ over the world of spirits might be more evidently shown, and that He who came to destroy the works of the Devil might obtain a manifest triumph over him. Mede, Farmer, and others, indeed, insist much on the highly figurative character of Oriental style, and compare those passages of Matt. viii. 26. Luke viii. 24. Mark iv. 39, where Jesus, it is said, 'rebuked the winds,' and 'rebuked the fever.' But as to the former expression, it is, in fact, only equivalent to the molto componere fluctus of Virgil: and the expression rebuking the fever is but a strongly figurative one, to denote repressing its violence. And when it is urged, that in the demoniacs no symptoms are recorded, which do not coincide with those of epilepsy or insanity at the present day, we may ask, if an evil spirit were permitted to disturb men's vital functions, have we any conception how this could be done without occasioning some or other of the symptoms which accompany natural disease?

It must, moreover, be borne in mind, that these demoniacal possessions have an intimate relation to the doctrine of redemption, and were, therefore, reasonably to be expected at the promulgation of the Gospel. The doctrines of demoniacal possessions and of a future state were equally supported by the acts and preaching of Jesus and his Disciples, and are equally woven into the substance of the Christian faith; the doctrines of the Full and of the Redemption being the two cardinal hinges on which our holy Religion turns. To form a right judgment of the matter in question, it should be considered what part the Devil bore in the economy of grace. Now, in the history of the Fall, Satan is represented as instigating

the first man to disobedience; for which his punishment by the second Adam (who restored man to his lost inheritance) is, at the time of the Fall, denounced in the terms of 'bruising his head by the seed of the woman.' When, therefore, we find this restoration was procured by the death of Christ, we may reasonably expect to find that punishment on the tempter which was predicted in the history of the Fall, recorded in the history of the Restoration. And so, indeed, we find it. See Luke x. 18. Had the first Adam stood in the rectitude of his creation, he had been immortal, and beyond the reach of natural and moral evil. His fall to mortality brought both into the world. The office of the second Adam was to restore us to that happy state. But as the immortality purchased for us by the Son of God was not, like that forfeited by Adam, to commence in this world, but is reserved for the reward of the next, both physical and moral evil were to endure for a season. Yet to manifest that they were, indeed, to receive their final doom from the Redeemer, it was but fit that, in the course of his ministry, he should give a specimen of his power over them. One part, therefore, of his God-like labours was taken up in curing all kinds of natural diseases. But had he stopped there, in the midst of his victories over physical evil, the proof of his dominion over both worlds had remained defective. He was, therefore, to display his sovereignty over moral evil likewise. And this could not be clearly evinced, as it was over natural evil, but by a sensible victory over Satan, through whose temptation moral evil was brought into the world, and by whose wiles and malice it was sustained and increased. For evil is represented in Scripture as having been introduced by a Being of this description, who, in some manner, not intelligible to us, influenced the immaterial principle of man. The continuance of evil in the world is often ascribed to the continual agency of the same Being. Our ignorance of the manner in which the mind may be controlled by the agency in question ought not to induce us to reject the doctrine itself. 'There was also,' as Dr. Jortin, Eccl. Hist. I. 268, remarks, 'a peculiar propriety in our Lord casting out evil spirits. By this he showed that he came to destroy the empire of Satan, and seemed to foretell that whosoever his doctrine should prevail, idolatry and vice should be put to flight. He foresaw that the great and popular objection to him would be, that he was a magician; and therefore he confuted it beforehand, and ejected evil spirits, to show that he was in no confederacy with them.'

In short, the hypothesis that the dæmoniacks were merely lunatic persons, with the semblance of simplicity, involves far greater difficulties than the common view. Nor can it be shown that Jesus Christ and the Apostles did, in any case, in compliance with the prejudices of their countrymen, teach or even seemingly affirm, any thing which they themselves accounted as false. How otherwise are we to account for the fact, that the dæmoniacks every where address Jesus as the Messiah? which was not the case with those who only laboured under bodily disorders. And when we find mention made of the number of demons in particular possessions, actions ascribed to them, and actions so expressly distinguished from those of the possessed—conversations held by the former in regard to the disposal of them after their expulsion, and accounts given how they were actually disposed of—when we find desires and passions ascribed peculiarly to them, and similitudes taken from the conduct which they usually observe,—it is impossible for us to deny their existence. In acquiescing in which, where we cannot understand, we may and ought to bow our reason to the Giver of reason. On one side, we have the wonderful doctrine, that it pleased the Almighty to permit invisable and evil beings to possess themselves, in some incomprehensible manner, of the bodies and souls of men; and for purposes which we can partly see, and are partly left to conjecture. On the other, we have Christ, the revealer of truth, establishing falsehood, sanctioning error and deception, and consequently being answerable for future and gross impositions, such as have been practised in latter ages! We have the Evangelists inconsistent with themselves; and a narrative acknowledged to be inspired, and intended for the unlearned, unintelligible to the learned, and even involving falsehood! The hands, too, of Infidels are greatly strengthened by any such concession, inasmuch as the admission of such a principle involves the whole of Revelation in uncertainty; and various other awkward consequences arise, which are ably stated by Bp. Warburton, in L. ix. of his Divine Legation, and in his Sermon xxvii. on this text; to both of which I have been much indebted in forming the above article.

V. This and the two following chapters comprehend what is called the Sermon on the Mount (wherein are contained the great outlines of Christian practice); which some have supposed was not delivered all at one time, but is only a collection of sayings at different times delivered by our Lord. Yet (to use the words of Mr. Simeon, Hor. Hom.) 'as our Lord went through all the cities, towns, and villages, of Judæa, instructing the people, it is reasonable to suppose that he should have frequently delivered the same truths in nearly the same expressions, because the same instructions were necessary for all. The repetition of them, therefore, at different times, and at distant places, is no reason why they should not have been delivered all at once, when so great a multitude was attending his ministry, and he had gone up on a mountain for the purpose of addressing them with more advantage, since they could not be accommodated in any house.' Moreover, the words of Ch. vii. 28, 29. show that this was one continued discourse, or rather that these were the chief topics contained in it, together with the principal illustrations of them. The design of our Lord being to make known the nature of that kingdom he had announced as being about to be established, and to rescue the moral law from the false glosses put upon it by the Pharisees.

— ἰδὼν τοὺς ὄχλους. 'Seeing so great a concourse of people.'

— τὸ ὄρος. As the Article does not allude to any before mentioned or definite mountain, it is by many Commentators regarded as indefinite, like the Heb. הַ, or put for הַ. The principle, however, is unsound, both as respects the Greek and the Hebrew. See Fritz. We must leave the Art. its definite force, and, with Bp. Middl., suppose τὸ ὄρος to denote the mountain-district, as distinguished from the other two; as Gen. xix. 17. and Josh. ii. 22. He is of opinion that our Lord would not lead the multitude to Mount Tabor (which has been commonly supposed the scene of the discourse) since part of the ridge lay much nearer to Capernaum.

— καθίσαντες αὐτοῦ] for καθίσαντι αὐτῷ, says Knin. This, however, is unnecessary. The construction here adopted is found in Herodot. and other writers. Καθ. has reference to the position in which the Jewish doctors taught; the master sitting, while the disciples stood.

2. ἀνοίξας τὸ στόμα αὐτοῦ.] This is usually esteemed a Hebrew periphrasis for speaking; but Wets. has adduced similar expressions from the Greek Classics; and the expression may rather be considered as a vestige of the redundancy of primitive phraseology; afterwards retained with verbs of speaking, and employed on occasions of more than ordinary importance. Sometimes it is used instead of a verb of speaking, as in Ps. lxxviii. 2. ἀνοίξω τὸ στόμα μου ἵνα παραβόλαις.

3. μακάριοι οἱ πτωχοὶ τῷ πνεύματι.] The sense here partly depends upon the construction, on which Commentators are not agreed. Many of the moderns join τῷ πνεύματι with μακ.; while the greater number, and nearly all the ancient, construe it with πτωχοί. And this seems preferable; for the former method, though it yields a tolerable sense, is too harsh, and breaks that uniformity of expression which runs through the several μακαρίσμοι. Besides, the latter is confirmed by Is. lvi. 2, which Christ seems to have had in mind. Πτωχοὶ τῷ πν. is well explained by Euthym. οἱ ταπεινοὶ τῇ προαιρέσει, 'those of a humble disposition.' [Comp. Ps. cxvii. 1, 2.]

4. οἱ πεινῶντες.] This is by some explained, 'those who bear afflictions with resignation.' But it is better, with Chrys. and some moderns, as Kuhn. and others, to interpret, 'those who mourn [for their sins by a repentance not to be repented of.]' See Isa. lvi. 16. and James iv. 9.

forted;' namely, with the hope of final acceptance and salvation.

5. οἱ πραεῖς] 'the meek and forgiving.' It is not apathy which is enjoined, but a regulation of passion. See Ephes. iv. 26. The blessing here promised (taken from Ps. xxxvii. 11.) is primarily an earthly, but terminates in a heavenly one; conferring not a temporal, but an eternal inheritance.

6. οἱ πεινῶντες—δικαιοσύνην] i. e. those who ardently pursue, and as naturally seek after it, as men do to satisfy hunger and thirst. By δικαιοσύνην is denoted the knowledge and practice of all the duties we owe to God and man.

— χορτασθήσονται.] The Interpreters variously supply what is wanting to complete the sense. The best method seems to be that of Chrys. and Euthym. who simply supply παντὸς ἀγαθοῦ, 'with every good,' both in this world, and in the next. Χορτάξ. is properly used of animals, but is, in the later writers, applied to men. Here the sense is, '[so] satisfied as to desire nothing more.'

7. ἐλεηθήσονται] 'shall experience mercy and compassion;' namely, always from God, in pardon and acceptance; and (as seems to be also implied) usually from man. See Chrys. and comp. Prov. xi. 25.

8. οἱ καθαροὶ τῇ καρδίᾳ] i. e. 'the pure in heart,' as contradistinguished from those who, like the Pharisees, only aimed at an outward and ceremonial purity. So the Heb. טָהוֹר וְצַדִּיק, at Ps. xxiv. 4. and Gen. xx. 5. Many parallel sentiments are adduced by Wets. from the Classical writers. To which I add Aristoph. Ran. γνώμη καθαρύειν.

— τὸν Θεὸν ὄψονται.] A phrase occurring also at Heb. xii. 14, which is best explained as indicating the furour of God here, and his final acceptance, by salvation, hereafter. In the East, where monarchs were seldom seen, and seldom approached by their subjects, it is no wonder that introduction to them should have been an image of high honour and supreme felicity.

9. εἰρηνοποιοί] i. e. 'peaceably inclined,'—those who study to preserve peace among others. So Joseph. Bell. ii. 8. 6. calls the Essenes εἰρηνικὲς ὑπουργοί. The Jews were remarkable for the qualities opposite to this and the other beatitudes.

— υἱοὶ Θεοῦ] namely, as imitating and bearing resemblance to God, who is styled the God of peace. See Rom. xv. 33. and 2 Cor. xiii. 11. So Philo de Sacr. 2. 26. οἱ δὲ ἀρεστὸν τῇ φύσει καὶ τὸ καλὸν ὁρῶντες υἱοὶ εἰσι τοῦ Θεοῦ. Similar expressions, too, occur in the Pagan Philosophers, who are supposed to have borrowed them from the Scriptures. It is here implied that they will be loved and blessed with a truly paternal affection.

10. διδιωγμένοι ἕνεκεν δικαιοσύνης.] Διῶκειν signifies 1. to follow after; 2. to pursue for apprehension; 3. fig. to pursue with acts of enmity, to persecute, as in the present passage, of which the sentiment is similar to 1 Pet. iii. 14. ἀλλ' αἱ καὶ πάσχετε διὰ δικαιοσύνην, μακάριοι.

11. ἔταν ονειδίσωσιν.] ον. for ονειδίσουσι. Subj. ἀνθρώποι. On this use of ἔταν with Subj. Aor. see Wahl, in voc. A. Καὶ διώξ. Some of the best Commentators are of opinion, that, having in the former verse touched on persecution generally, our Lord here descends to particulars; and notices one special act of it, namely, prosecution before human tribunals, on account of religion. Διῶκειν is a well known forensic term to denote prosecute; and the other expressions in this sentence may have reference to judicial insult and abuse, as well as injustice.

—ψευδόμενοι.] Particip. for adv., as in Joseph. Ant. vii. 11. 1. τοὺς Πουσιωτάτους τῶν Ἰουδαίων ἔλεγε, καταψευδόμενοι, διδασκάλους εἶναι αὐτῷ τοῦ βουλιματου.

—ἕνεκεν ἐμοῦ.] in my cause.

12. χαίrete καὶ ἀγαλλιᾶσθε.] The words are not synonymous; but the latter is a stronger term than the former. The sense of μισθός need not be pressed on, but may signify a reward assigned of mere grace. See Rom. iv. 4.

13. ἐστε] are, or are [to be] 'should consider yourselves as.' Τῆς γῆς is for τῶν ἀνθρώπων.

—τὸ ἅλας τ. γ.] So Livy, cited by Grot. calls Greece the sals gentium; salt being a common symbol of wisdom. The meaning is, 'What salt is to food, by seasoning and preserving it from corruption, so should ye be to the rest of men. Others are to learn from you, and ye are to be examples to others.'

—ἐὰν δὲ—ἀλισθήσεται.] Our Lord has here supported a particular truth on a general principle. The particular truth is, that the loss of the salt, or genuine spirit of Christianity, cannot be supplied by any expedient whatsoever; and it is supported on this general principle, that every thing has its salt, or essential quality, which makes it to be what it is, and without which it is no longer the same; having degenerated into another thing. (Bp. Warburton.)

—μωρανθῇ.] become insipid, ἀναλον γίνε-ται, lose its saline property, as Mark ix. 50. This sense is derived from that signification of μωρός, whereby (like the Latin fatuus, and the Heb. חָרִי, as applied to objects of taste) it denotes insipid. The word is properly cognate with μαυρός, debilis. Thus we use faint in the sense insipid. Rock salt may lose its savour; though not sea salt. But as the allusion is somewhat remote, most recent Commentators have (with Schoettg.) supposed that a bituminous salt is here meant, procured from the lake Asphaltites, and which, having a fragrant odour, was strewn over the sacrifices in the temple, to counteract the smell of the burning flesh. Now as large quantities were laid up in the Temple for this use, it would often spoil by exposure to the sun and atmosphere, and was then, we learn, scattered over the pavement, to prevent the priests from slipping in wet weather. This, then, is thought to be an allusion to the Temple service; there being here only a case supposed which does sometimes, though rarely, occur. But this method is not necessary to be adopted, and seems at variance with the parallel passage at Luke xiv. 35.

—ἐν τίνι ἀλισθήσεται;] q. d. who shall teach the teacher? Εἰ μὴ βληθῆναι ἔξω. A sort of rustic proverb, signifying 'to be good for nothing.'

14. τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου] i. e. 'the means by which God is pleased to enlighten the minds of men with true religion,' as the globe is enlightened by the rays of the sun; which is, in the proper sense, τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου. The term was applied by the Jews to their Rabbins, as among the Greeks and Romans celebrated persons were called lights of the world.

—οὐ δύναται πόλις κρυβῆναι, &c.] It is commonly supposed that as this is connected with ver. 16, which contains the application of the similitude (namely, οὕτω λαμψάτω, &c.) there is an ellipse of καθώς; as in Is. lv. 9. Jer. iii. 20. But it is better to suppose that in these words is implied the corresponding clause, 'So neither can you remain in secret; the eyes of all being turned upon you.' Then ver. 16. will supply an admonition founded on what is said in the two preceding verses.

—πόλις—ἐπάνω ὄρου.] This part of the simile may, as some suppose, have been suggested to Jesus by the city Bethulia, a little N. of Mount Tabor; and clearly visible from the place where the discourse was pronounced. But the thing is uncertain.

15. καίουσιν] for the more Classical ἀπτοῦσι,

- μίδιον, ἀλλ' ἐπὶ τὴν λυχνίαν· καὶ λάμπει πᾶσι τοῖς ἐν τῇ which is used by Lu. viii. 16. xi. 33. Yet examples of it have been adduced, though chiefly from the later writers, and in the passive. The sentence contains a proverbial saying, to express depriving any thing of its utility, by putting it to a purpose the farthest from what it was intended for. The words λύσῃ and μίδιον have Articles, because they are nomadic nouns, as denoting things of which there is usually one only in a house.

16. τὸ φῶς ὑ· i. e. 'the light of your example.'
 — ἰδῶσιν—καὶ δοξάσωσι.] For ἰδόντες δοξ.
 Δοξάζειν in the sense to praise, glorify, is Hellenistic. In Classical Greek it signifies to surpass.

17. καταλῦσαι] 'to abrogate, to annul.' A sense, as applied to laws or institutions of any kind, of frequent occurrence. Our Lord here anticipates an objection; namely, that his doctrines differed, in many respects, from the Mosaic; and that therefore his system could not but destroy that promulgated by God to Moses, and borne testimony to by the Prophets. And yet it was not to be imagined, that the all-wise Being would lay down a law, as a rule of life, under one dispensation, which should be at variance with what he had promulgated under another. By τὸν νόμον must, however, be meant, in some sense, the law of Moses; that being the invariable sense of the word in the Gospels and Acts: though some understand the ceremonial, others the moral law. Each may be said to be meant. For the ceremonial law was completed by our Lord, in his answering the types and fulfilling the prophecies,—after which it was to cease, the shadow being supplied by the substance; the moral, by his exalting its precepts to a spirituality before unknown, and purifying it from the corruptions of the Jewish teachers: for it is plain from the whole of Scripture, that the ceremonial law alone was abrogated, while the moral law was left, as being of perpetual obligation. And thus, in either case, the law was meant to be, as St. Paul terms it, our παιδαγωγὸς, or usher unto, and preparer for, the Gospel, and to cease when it had answered the purpose for which it was originally designed, as a part of the great plan of Divine wisdom and mercy, for the salvation of man. This assurance of our Lord was made to correct the false opinion of the Jews,—that the Mosaic would raise the Mosaic law to the greatest perfection, and literally fulfil the happy predictions of the Prophets.

18. ἵωτα.] A word derived from the Heb. יוה, and used either at the beginning, or the end of a sentence. In the former case it has the affirmative sense, verily, and is equivalent to καὶ, or ἀλλήως; in the latter, it is put for γίνονται, 'so be it!' 'Ο οὐρανὸς καὶ ἡ γῆ form a periphrasis for the universe, which the Jews supposed would never utterly perish, but be constantly renewed. See Baruch iii. 32. i. 11. "Ἔως ἂν παρέλθῃ ὁ οὐρ. is a proverbial phrase, often occurring in Scripture, and sometimes in the Classics, to denote that a thing can never happen. (Compare Ps. cii. 26. Luke xvi. 17. Matt. xxiv. 35. Is. li. 6. Jer. xxxiii. 20, 21. Job xiv. 12.) So Dionys. Hal. vi. 95, where it is agreed in a treaty, that there shall be peace μέχρις ἂν οὐρανὸς τε καὶ γῆ τὴν αὐτὴν στάσιν ἔχωσι, and Philo Jud. 656, says, that the laws of Moses may be expected to remain ἕως ἂν ἥλιος καὶ σελήνη, καὶ ὁ σύμπας οὐρανὸς τε καὶ κόσμος ᾗ.

— ἵωτα—κεραία.] Ἰῶτα denoted properly the letter Jod (י) (the smallest of the letters in the Hebrew alphabet,) and hence, figuratively, any thing very small; κεραία, the points, or corners, which distinguished similar letters of the Hebrew alphabet, but were used figuratively to denote the minutest parts of any thing. Similar sentiments are cited from the Rabbinical writers. Thus our Lord means to express, in addition to the eternal obligation, the boundless extent of the moral law, as demanding the utmost purity of thought, as well as innocence of action.

— ἕως ἂν πάντα γένηται.] 'Until all shall come to pass,' i. e. be accomplished, namely, by the fulfilment of the legal types and prophecies, and the complete establishment of the moral law.

19. οὐ ἐάν οὖν λύσῃ.] 'Shall neglect, or transgress.' A sense common in the Classical writers, and here required by the antithetical term ποιεῖν. The οὖν seems to have reference not to the verse immediately preceding, but to v. 17.

— μίαν τῶν ἐλαχίστων.] Render 'One even of the least of these commandments.' Here there is an allusion to the practice of the Pharisees, who, agreeably to their own lax notions of morality, divided the injunctions of the law into the weightier and the lighter. Any transgression of the latter they held to be very venial. And by their own arbitrary classification of the former, they evaded the spirit, while they pretended to fulfil the letter of the law. See Bp. Bull's Harm. p. 105.

— ἐλαχίστος κληθήσεται.] Said per meiosis for, 'he shall be the farthest from attaining heaven,' i. e. 'he shall not attain it at all.' By the antithesis, μέγας must as often be taken for μέγιστος, of which the Commentators adduce examples. Here only a high degree of the positive can be meant. Μέγας κληθήσεται, 'he shall be great; i. e. in high favour; on which sense see my note on Thucyd. i. 188. By τῇ βασιλ. τ. οὐρ. is meant the kingdom of Christ on earth, the Gospel dispensation.

20. περισσεύσῃ, &c.] 'shall excel,' lit. shall abound beyond. Here our Lord fully declares his meaning; openly naming those whom he had before only hinted at. The sentence is, as it were, an answer to a question; q. d. 'What, will not the righteousness of the law, as exhibited in the lives of such holy persons as the Pharisees, save us? No such thing—for I plainly tell you, that unless,' &c. Δικαιοσύνη must here denote like the Heb. ḥēṣed, piety and virtue, as evinced in a life spent agreeably to the Divine commands.

— οὐ μὴ εἰσέλθῃ.] 'Ye shall by no means enter.' On this syntax see Robins. Lex. in οὐ μὴ. 21. τοῖς ἀρχαίοις.] It is matter of dispute whether this should be rendered 'by, or to them of old time.' The former is adopted by most of the Commentators from Beza downward; the latter, by the Fathers and the ancient translators, and a few modern Commentators, as Dodd. Campb., Bp. Jebb, and Rosenm. So Josephus, Antiq. viii. 2. 4. 'God gave to Solomon wisdom, ὥστε τοὺς ἀρχαίους ὑπερβάλλειν ἀνθρώπων.' Upon the whole, the former seems to deserve the preference; as being most suitable to the context, and confirmed by the usage of the later writers, especially the Sept. and the N. T. And the words will thus be akin to a Talmudic saying, which may be rendered elphakasin ol arkhaisi hemwn. By ol arkhaisi Kuin. understands the Jewish teachers not long before the age of the Gospel; the notion of archaios being, says Fritz., relative. Be that as it may, certain it is that in that age the moral law had been utterly perverted; and that our Lord meant to allude to that corruption, is plain from what follows.

— ἔνοχος ἔσται τῇ κρίσει.] 'will be liable to the judgment.' So Plato, cited by Wets., ἔνοχος ἔσται νόμοις ὁ τοῦτο δράσας. By τῇ κρίσει is meant an inferior Court of Judicature, consisting, as the Rabbins say, of 23, or according to Josephus, of 7 judges.

22. τῷ ἀδελφῷ] ἐν ἰτίῳ, any one. An idiom arising from the Jews being accustomed to regard all Israelites as brethren.

— εἰκῇ] 'without sufficient cause;' implying also above measure. For such a person (to use the words of Aristot. cited by Wets.) is angry, οἷς οὐ δεῖ, καὶ ἐφ' οἷς οὐ δεῖ, καὶ μάλλον ἢ δεῖ. Critics, however, are divided in opinion as to the genuineness of the word; which is rejected by Erasm., Bengel, Mill, and Fritz., but received by Grot., Wets., Griesb., Matthæi, Tittm., Vater, and Scholz. The authority of MSS. for its omission is next to nothing; and that of versions slender. And although that of the Fathers be considerable, yet far inferior to that for the word—Not to say that the universal consent of Fathers would not counterbalance such strong external evidence as that in favour of the word. Internal evidence, too, for the word far preponderates.

— ἔνοχος ἔσται τῇ κρίσει.] i. e. is liable to such a punishment in the other world as may be paralleled with that which the Court of Seven inflicts. Ρακά. A term of strong reproach, equivalent to 'a vile, worthless fellow.' Mispl. A term expressive of the greatest abhorrence, equivalent to 'thou impious wretch,' for, in the language of the Hebrews, fully is equivalent to 'impiously.'

— ἔνοχος ἔσται εἰς τ. γ. τ. π.] for ἔνοχος βάλλεσθαι, &c. as Num. xxxv. 31. ἔνοχος ἀναίρεσθαι. Γέεννα is formed from the Hebr. עֵינַן (the valley of Hinnom) a place S. E. of Jerusalem, called Gaienna at Josh. xviii. 16. (and probably a deep dell; φάραγξ as it is rendered at Josh. xv. 8.) where formerly children had been sacrificed by fire to Moloch; and which long afterwards was held in such abomination, that the carcases of animals, and dead bodies of malefactors, were thrown into it; which, in so hot a climate, needing to be consumed by fire, (which was constantly kept up,) it obtained the name γέεννα τοῦ πυρός. Both from its former and its present use, it was no unfit emblem of the place of torment reserved for the wicked, and might well supply the term to denote it. Of course, the sense is, that 'the latter offence would incur as much greater a punishment than the former, as burning alive was more dreadful than stoning,' &c.

23. As the former verse forbids ill timed and excessive anger and hated, so this and the following enjoin love to our neighbour, and a placable spirit. And since the Pharisees reckoned anger, hatred, and reviling among the slighter offences; and thought that they would not incur the wrath of God, if sacrifices and other external rites were accurately observed; so here we are taught, that external worship is not pleasing in the sight of God, unless it be accompanied by a meek and charitable spirit.

23. ἔχει τί κατὰ σοῦ.] Scil. ἔγκλημα, cause of complaint; which is implied by the context. The same expression occurs at Mark xi. 25. Rev. ii. 4.

24. ὕπαγε.] So Arrian Epict. 3. 21. 6. ὕπαγε ἵσταται, &c.

— διαλλάγηθι.] i. e. [do thy endeavour to] be reconciled with; namely, by offering every satisfaction in your power for the injury done. Thus Philo de sacrificiis, p. 841, says, that 'when a man has injured his brother, and, repenting of his fault, voluntarily acknowledged it, he must first make restitution, and then come into the temple, presenting his sacrifice, and asking pardon.' Thus we are taught that vain is all external worship of the Deity, if the duties towards our fellow-creatures be neglected. Προσφ. is a sacrificial term.

25. Our Lord having explained the 6th commandment, inculcates the duties contained in it, particularly that of seeking reconciliation with an offended brother. This he does 1. (in the preceding verses) from the consideration of the offence which a want of a conciliatory spirit gives to God; and 2., in this and the next verse, from a prudential consideration of the danger to which it exposes ourselves. (Simeon.) The rule of the preceding verses naturally introduced the case of those who were exposed to lawsuits, as having injured their neighbours. (Scott.)

Here, then, is inculcated the general maxim of speedy reconciliation with an adversary. And this is illustrated by an example derived ἐκ τοῦ προκειμένου. ἴσθι εὐνοῶν, 'be friends with.' So Luke xix. 17. ἴσθι εἰρηνιστὴν ἔχων. It is not a periphrasis, but a stronger expression.

— τῷ ἀντιδίκῳ.] The word signifies properly an opponent in a suit at law; but here a creditor, who is about to become a plaintiff, by suing his debtor in a court of justice.

— ἐν τῇ ὁδῷ] 'in the way,' namely to the Judge. For from Heinecc. Antiq. Rom. iv. 16, 18, we find that sometimes the plaintiff and defendant used to settle their affair by the way; and then the latter, who had been summoned to trial, was dismissed.

— ὑπηρέτης] 'the person who carried into execution the sentence of the Judge,' whether corporal punishment or fine, and called by Luke xii. 58. πράκτωρ, probably the more exact term.

27. τοῖς ἀρχαίοις.] These words have been rejected by all the later Editors, and rightly; since they are found in few of the MSS., and are sanctioned by scarcely any Versions or Fathers; and we can far better account for their insertion than their omission.

28. γυναῖκα] i. e. a married woman; which sense is required by the context and the almost general use of μοιχεύω and μοιχεία in the Scriptures. Βλέπων is for ἐπιβλέπων, passionately 'gazing upon,' for ἱστοφθαλμῶν. Our Lord means to say, that it is not the act only, but the unchaste desire also (what is called at 2 Pet. ii. 14. the 'adulterous eye') which is included in the commandment. Ἐπιθυμία may (with Whitby) be defined 'such a desire as gains the full consent of the will, and would certainly terminate in action, did not impediments from other causes arise;' thus making the essence of the vice to be in the intention. So also thought many of the sages of Greece and Rome; ex. gr. Juven. Sat. xiii. 208, 'Scelus intra se tacitum qui cogitat ullum Facti crimen habet.' Indeed, the ancient philosophers admitted that there was a moral delilement adhering to lascivious thoughts. So Eurip. Hippol. 317, makes Phædra exclaim, χεῖρες μὲν ἀγνὰι, φρὴν δ' ἔχει υἱασμὰ τι.

— αὐτήν] So for vulg. αὐτῆς. Very many MSS. with the Edit. Pr. and Steph. the Const. Apost. and several Fathers have αὐτήν, which was approved by Mill, Wetst. and Griesb., and received by Matthæi, Vat. and Scholz,—rightly; since the reading is as strong in internal as in external evidence, it being the more difficult reading, and quite Hellenistic in character; the construction, with the Accus., being not unfrequently found in the Sept.

29. εἰ δὲ ὁ ὀφθαλμός σου—σκανδαλίζει σε.] 'If thy right eye prove a stumbling block to thee,' 'occasion thee to stumble,' 'lead thee into sin.' The Hebrews were accustomed to compare lusts and evil passions with members of the body; for example, an evil eye denoted envy. Thus to pluck out the eye, and cut off the hand, is equivalent to 'crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts,' Gal. v. 24, and mortify your members, Col. iii. 5. The sense therefore is: 'deny thyself what is even the most necessary or desirable, what is as dear to thee as thy right eye, or as necessary as thy right hand, when the sacrifice is demanded by the good of thy soul.' Why the right eye is mentioned, may be that that was essentially necessary to the purposes of war, as it was then carried on. The sentiments contained in this passage are illustrated by Wets. from various passages of the Classical writers; ex. gr. Phil. Jud. vol. i. 241, 19. Διόπερ ἐλίσθαι ἀν μὲν δοκοῦσιν οἱ μὴ τελείως εὐπαιδευτοὶ πατηρῶσθαι μᾶλλον ἢ τὰ μὴ προσήκοντ' ὀρᾶν κικωφῶσθαι μᾶλλον ἢ βλαβερῶν ἀκούειν λόγων· καὶ ἐκτετμησθαι γλῶτταν ὑπὲρ τοῦ μηδὲν τῶν ἀρρήτων ἐκκαλῆσαι. Seneca Ep. 51. 'Propterea quæcumque cor tuum laniat; quæ si aliter extrahi nequirent, cor cum illis excellendum erat.' In this, and numerous other such like passages, scattered up and down in the Philosophers who lived after the promulgation of the Gospel, we may see a far higher tone of morals than had been before maintained; and which can be ascribed to nothing but the silent effect of the Gospel (as is the case in every age), even on those who refused to receive it.

30. καὶ εἰ ἡ δεξιὰ, &c.] E visu res abit ad actum. (Bengel.)

31. Having before adverted to the 7th commandment, our Lord takes occasion to allude to that abuse of the Judicial law, which, though intended to regulate and repress divorces, had rendered them more frequent, and become almost as pestilent to good morals as adultery itself.

— ὁς ἂν ἀπολύσῃ, &c.] We are to bear in mind, 1. that the Jews were permitted to divorce their wives without assigning any cause; 2. that our Lord, neither here nor at Matt. xix. 3. meant to give political directions; 3. that he, moreover, did not contradict Moses, who even himself never approved of the arbitrary divorces of his times (see xix. 8.); and, 4. that the Jewish Doctors in the age of Christ were not agreed on the sense of the passage of Deut. xxiv. 1, which treats of divorce. Those of the school of Hillel maintained that the wife might not only be divorced for some great offence, but ὅτι ἢ ὅτι κατὰ πᾶσαν αἰτίαν, for any cause, however slight, so that a writing of divorcement, in due form, was given to her. On the other hand, that of Shammai contended that ὅτι ἢ ὅτι, the term in Deut. xxiv. 1, which was the subject of the dispute, and which the school of Hillel understood of any defect of person, or of disposition, could only mean something criminal, as adultery. See Selden de Ux. Heb. iii. 18. Lightf. Hor. Heb. in loc. infra. From the words of Christ, xix. 3, compared with x. 2. seq. it is clear that Moses meant the words to be taken as those of the school of Hillel interpreted them; and yet it is plain from Matt. xix. 8. and Gen. ii. 24. that Moses did not approve of arbitrary divorces. The Jewish Doctors, however, had presumed to change a moral precept into a civil institution. [To speak in plainer terms, many things which Moses had tolerated in civil life, in order to avoid a greater evil (see Matt. xix. 8. and note), the Pharisees determined to be morally right; as in the case of retaliation. Ed.] Jesus, therefore, who did not intend to give political directions, here teaches in what case, salvæ religionis et conscientiæ, a wife might be divorced. (Kuin.) The word ἀποστάσιον (equivalent to βιβλίον ἀποστάσιον at xix. 7.) is very rare in the Classical writers. It is of the same form as διστάσιον.

32. πορνείας.] Commentators and Jurists are much divided in opinion as to the exact sense of this term. It is generally interpreted adultery. That, however, would seem to require μοιχείας; and as adultery was a capital offence, it would appear unnecessary to denounce divorce against such as were guilty of it. Some understand by it fornication before marriage: others, incest, or vice generally; and Mr. Morgan, in his work on Marriage, Adultery, and Divorce, religious apostasy, or idolatry. It is strange that so diligent an inquirer should have profited so little by his deep research and laborious examination of 'all the passages in which the word occurs in the Scriptures, the Sept., and Josephus,' as to assert, that 'it is derived from πόρνη νεύειν, and that its primitive signification is religious apostasy! The truth is, πόρνη is from πείρωμα, pret. mid. of περᾶν, which is derived from περάω, which signifies primarily to transfer or give up. And although πορνεία sometimes signifies idolatry, or religious apostasy, both in the Sept. and the N. T., yet it is only in the Prophets and the Apocalypses. Indeed, to suppose so highly figurative a signification to be employed in a passage intended to give a most important regulation for all future ages, is like supposing a law to be couched in a riddle. The very same objection lies equally against all the other new interpretations. On such an occasion as the present (and that when the words of Matt. xix. 9. were pronounced), the term must be taken in its ordinary signification. Πόρνη (like the corresponding term in our own language), denotes one who yields up the person, whether for hire, or for the purposes of sensuality; and, by implication, unlawfully. And consequently, the term πορνεία, as applied to females, denotes unlawful commerce with the other sex. But that, in a married woman, will involve adultery; and therefore the term may well be used in that sense. Thus, at Rom. i. 29, πορνεία must include adultery; as also at Amos vii. 17, ἡ γυνὴ σου ἐν τῇ πόλει πορνύσῃ. The corresponding term in our own language is used in this very μοιχᾶσθαι· καὶ ὅς ἐάν ἀπολελυμένην γαμήσῃ, μοιχᾶται.

 33· Πάλιν ἠκούσατε ὅτι ἐρρήθη τοῖς ἀρχαίοις· Οὐκ ἐπιорκήσεις, 34 ἀποδώσεις δὲ τῷ Κυρίῳ τοὺς ὅρκους σου. Ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω ὑμῖν μὴ ὁμόσαι ὅλως· μήτε ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ, ὅτι θρόνος ἐστὶ 35 τοῦ Θεοῦ· μήτε ἐν τῇ γῇ, ὅτι ὑποπόδιόν ἐστι τῶν ποδῶν αὐτοῦ· μήτε εἰς Ἱεροσόλυμα, ὅτι πόλις ἐστὶ τοῦ μεγάλου 36 βασιλέως. μήτε ἐν τῇ κεφαλῇ σου ὁμόσῃς, ὅτι οὐ δύνασαι 37 μίαν τρίχα λευκὴν ἢ μέλαιναν ποιῆσαι. Ἔστω δὲ ὁ λόγος
 ὑμῶν· ναὶ ναὶ, οὐ οὐ· τὸ δὲ περισσὸν τούτων ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ

sense. See Todd's Johnson. In short, the very use of the word to denote apostasy or idolatry could only have arisen from this sense of πορν. And as to the objection which has to many seemed so formidable as to set them upon devising new interpretations, namely, that adultery was punished by the Jewish law with death,—that involves no real difficulty at all; for our Lord, in pronouncing on this deeply important matter, was legislating for all future ages, and therefore could have no reference to the Mosaic law, especially as it was now on the point of being abolished. It was sufficient for us to be informed, that adultery may authorize the divorce of the offending party. Whether and how far the offence should be punishable by the Mosaic law, was a question of policy, with which our Lord did not interfere, and with which Religion has nothing to do.

33. The Pharisees distributed oaths into the weightier and the lighter; and forbade perjury only when the name of God was contained in the oath; but if that was omitted, they held it none, or a very slight offence; as also mental prevarication, by swearing with the lips, and disavowing the oath with the heart. A standard of morality even below that of the heathens. See Hom. II. i. 312. Now it is this use of vain oaths, which directly led to perjury, that Jesus here means to prohibit. He is, therefore, not to be understood as forbidding judicial oaths; but (as appears from the examples he subjoins) such oaths as are introduced in common conversation, and on ordinary occasions. See Joseph. B. J. v. 12.

— οὐκ ἐπιорκήσεις.] Ἐπιорκεῖν may mean either to swear falsely, and not ex animo; or, to violate one's oath. Both however are here to be understood. The words ἀποδώσεις δι...σου are to be taken (like δὲ δ' ἀν φωνήσῃ, &c. at ver. 19.) as an interpretation of the Jewish Doctors. Thus there will be an easier connexion between the doctrine of the Pharisees, expressed in these words, and the opposite one of Christ. (Kuin.)

34. seq.] Here are instanced the oaths most frequently used by the Jews. From the examples adduced by Wets. it appears that the heathens used oaths very similar to those of the Hebrews.

— ναὶ.] Heb. 2 per. by. The difference between the Classical and the Hellenistic construction of δυνامي is, that in the former it takes an Accus. or Genit. with κατὰ; the latter, a Dat. with ἐν, and sometimes, though very rarely, ἐκ with an Accus., as at ver. 35, where it literally means looking towards; this posture usual in swearing by any thing.

35. τοῦ μεγάλου βασιλέως] i. e. Dei Optimi Maximi; as Ps. xlviii. 2. xlviii. 2, 3. xcv. 3. 'The ancient Arabs (says Schulz.), called God simply THE KING.'

36. ἐν τῇ κεφ. σου.] This was a practice common to both Greeks and Romans. The hand, it should seem, was placed on the head during swearing; implying imprecation in case of perjury, since the head was peculiarly spoken of in such imprecations. See Herodot. ii. 30.

— οὐ δύνασαι· ποιῆσαι.] There is something here at which many Interpreters have stumbled; and some would read, from conjecture, μίαν τρίχα λευκὴν ποιῆσαι μέλαιναν, 'even one single,' the μίαν being emphatic. Others attempt to remove the difficulty by interpretation, thus: 'thou canst not produce, or bring forth, one hair, white or black.' This, however, is doing violence to the position of the words, and yields somewhat a juvenile sense. I see no reason to abandon the interpretation of the ancient, and most of the modern Interpreters, who understand it of change of colour. There is an ellipsis of εἶναι, and the sense is, 'thou hast no power even over the colour of thy hair; to make one hair, whether white or black, otherwise than what it is.'

37. ὁ λόγος ὑμῶν] 'your ordinary manner of speaking.'

— ναὶ ναὶ, οὐ οὐ.] Most Commentators regard this passage as a kindred one to that in James v. 12, and take the first ναὶ and οὐ to signify the promise, or assertion, the second ναὶ and οὐ its fulfilment; construing: ὁ λόγος ὑμῶν ὁ ναὶ, ἔστω ναὶ! ὁ λόγος δ' οὐ, ἔστω οὐ, comparing Rev. i. 7. and 2 Cor. i. 18, 19. and Maimonid. Thus the adverb will be converted into a noun; which is frequent both in the Scriptural and Classical writers. This method, however, does violence to the construction; and the passages cited are of another kind. It is therefore better (with Chrysostom, Kuin. and Fritz.) to suppose that the ναὶ and οὐ are repeated, by way of expressing seriousness and gravity; q. d. 'be content with a solemn and serious affirmation or negation.'

— τὸ περισσὸν τούτων] lit. 'what exceeds or goes beyond these.' Τοῦ πονηροῦ. It is debated whether the sense be, 'the Evil one,' or 'evil.' The Article will here (as Bp. Middleton observes) determine nothing, because the neuter adjunct. may be used as a substantive; and so τὸ πονηρὸν at Rom. xii. 9. The former sense is thought to be supported by the words of Christ himself at John viii. 44, and in the Lord's Prayer; and there is every reason to think it was adopted by the ancients. Thus we may render 'springs from the temptation of the Evil one.' See, however, my Note on vi. 13.

ἔστιν. Ἱ 'Ηκούσατε ὅτι ἐρρέθη· “Ὁφθαλμὸν ἀντὶ ὀφθαλμοῦ, 38

σεις τὸν πλησίον σου, καὶ μισήσεις τὸν ἐχθρόν σου.

38. There is here a reference to the practice of the Jews as to retaliation in kind for an injury done to any one. Now the Law (Exod. xxi. 24. Lev. xxiv. 20.) had sanctioned this principle; but only, we may imagine, as exercised by the civil magistrates for the satisfaction of the injured party. The Scribes, however, extended it to authorise private vengeance; against which our Lord protests, as being mere vengeance.

39. μὴ ἀντιστῆναι τῷ πονηρῷ.] As ἀντίστασθαι, like the Syr. and Arab. ἔστη, not only signifies to withstand, but (from the adjunct) to retaliate upon; we may, with Kuin. and Schleus. adopt that sense here. But I prefer, with others, to explain ἀντιστῆναι 'to set oneself in a posture of hostile opposition,' [in order to retaliate.]
Τῷ πονηρῷ means the injurious person, the injurer, as the Sept. render πονηρὸν by ἀδικῶν as well as πονηρός. Moral maxims similar to the
phers. That the commands in this and the following verses are not to be taken literally, as enjoining the particular actions here specified, but the disposition of forgiveness,—is apparent, not only from its being usual in the East to put the action for the disposition, but from the manner in which the precepts are introduced. See Horne's Introd. II. 452, seq.

—ραπίσει.] The word corresponds to our rap or slap; and was chiefly, as here, used of striking on the face; which was regarded as an affront of the worst sort; and was severely punished both by the Jewish and Roman laws.
The expression here used was, no doubt, a proverbial one; and, like most such, must be understood cum grano salis; as a similar expression which occurs in the Latin writers, ora præbere contumeliis.

40. Θέλοντί σοι κριθῆναι.] Kuin. and others think that κρίν. is here to be taken in a figurative sense, of quarrelling, disputing, &c. And they cite Hesych. κρινόμεθα· ἀντὶ τοῦ μαχόμεθα καὶ διαλεγόμεθα, where I would read μαχό-μεθα· καὶ διαλεγόμεθα. So Thucyd. I. 145.
δικήν ἵτοιμοι εἶναι διαλύσθαι περὶ τῶν ἐγκλημάτων. But this amounts to no positive proof. And the use of κρίνειςθαι in the Sept. for γν and γν is but a weak one. It is better, with almost all Interpreters, ancient and modern, to take κριθῆναι in its proper sense, as a forensic term signifying 'to be impleaded at law;' as in a similar expression of Thucyd. I. 39, δικήν ἱστασθαι κρίνειςθαι (where see my note), and probably Hesych. ubi supra. Θέλοντι is said by the Commentators to be redundant; but the word is scarcely ever such, and here means 'should wish.' By χιτῶνα is denoted the under garment; and by ἱμάτιον the upper: usually of greater value than the former. Indeed from the circumstances of its being used as a blanket, to wrap the person in by night, it was not allowed by the Law to be taken by the creditor, though the χιτῶν might. See Exod. xxii. 26. sq.

Λαβῆναι is said to be for αἶρεν. But if κριθῆναι be taken in a forensic sense, that will be unnecessary.

41. ἀγγαρεύσει, &c.] Meaning, 'Rather than resist any public authority requiring such service for a certain distance, go with the ἀγγαρος (or King's Courier) voluntarily twice the distance.' The King's Courier had authority to press horses and carriages, either for the post, or for the public service generally; and, when necessary, could compel the personal attendance of the owners. See Herodot. viii. 98. Xen. Cyr.
viii. 6, 17. Joseph. Antiq. xiii. 8. The term was derived from the Persians, who first introduced the use of regular Couriers, to transmit intelligence, a custom which was adopted among the Romans (who exacted this service from the provincials), and is yet retained by the Turks.

42. Not a few Commentators, closely connecting this injunction with the directions that precede it, suppose the meaning to be, that 'we must not be content with a patient submission to injuries; but must exert ourselves to repay good for evil, and render our enemies any service in our power.' But as this is expressed in the words following, it is better to take the verse as an independent sentence, expressing in general terms the duty of liberality, without confining it to any particular persons. (Siméon Hor. Hom.) Here, indeed, we have an injunction engrafted on the foregoing, by the association of ideas; a yielding spirit extending to both. Τῷ αἰτοῦντί, &c. So Joseph. Bell. ii. 8, 4, says of the Essenes.
τῷ χρῆσθαι δίδόν· ἕκαστος τὰ παρ' αὐτοῦ.
The word δανείσασθαι generally signifies to borrow, with or without usury. Here the latter must be meant, because usury was forbidden by the Jewish law. It does not, however (as Kuin. supposes), imply the non-payment of the sum borrowed; for, in that case, it would have been said, not lend, but give.

43. τὸν πλησίον.] This use of ὁ πλησίον (scil. ὅν) is founded on that of the Hebr. γר, and denotes, in a general way, alterum, 'any one with whom we have to do,' in any way; but especially relations or friends, and neighbours, and sometimes merely those of the same nation or even religion; as in Gen. xxvi. 31. Joel II. 8.; in which sense the Jewish doctors generally interpreted the word. See Joseph. Ant. II. 6, 8.

Although, in the passage of Scripture here alluded to, (Levit. xix. 18.) it is not expressly added, 'thou shalt hate thine enemy,' yet the Jews thought it deducible from the words ἀγαπήσεις τὸν πλησίον, and countenanced by various precepts in Scripture concerning the idolatrous nations around them; which precepts they extended to all heathens; whom, it seems, they emphatically termed their enemies.

44. ἀγαπάτε τοὺς ἐχθροὺς ὑμῶν.] Implying such a sincere disposition to do them good as shall show itself in actions; done to them not indeed as enemies, but as fellow creatures. See Chrys. and Tittm. de Syn. N. T. III. p. 5. The words following are meant to explain and exemplify what is meant by ἀγαπάτε.

—εὐλογεῖτε.] This is generally interpreted 'wish them all manner of good.' But that sense cannot well be extracted from the word. It is better explained by others 'bene precamini' &c. But the simplest interpretation is that of Kuin., 'bene iis dicite,' 'give them good words.' Καταρασθῆναι may very well be understood of reviling in general, equivalent to λοιδορία, 1 Pet. iii. 9. So at 1 Cor. iv. 12. λοιδορεῖν καὶ εὐλογεῖν are similarly opposed. There seems, indeed, to be a dimas in the clauses of this verse.

—τοῖς μισοῦσιν.] This, for the vulg. τοὺς μισοῦντας, all the Editors from Mill downwards are agreed is the true reading. It is found in almost all the MSS., and has been received into the text by Griesb., Matth., Fritz., Vater, and Scholz.; and rightly. It is one of the Hellenistic idioms to use the dative after καλῶς ποιῶν for the accus., which is the Classical usage. See Robins. Lex. The same difference subsists with respect to ἐπιηρέειν.

—ἐπιηρεάζοντων.] The old Commentators say, that ἐπιηρέειν here signifies to injure any one, either by words or deeds; while the recent expositors are almost universally of opinion, that it denotes injury by deeds, as passing from injury by words. It should seem to denote ill treatment generally, whether by words or deeds.

45. υἱοὶ τοῦ πατρὸς] i. e. 'assimilated to him by conformity of disposition,' as children usually are to their parents. See John viii. 44. 1 John iii. 10.

—ἀνταλλάξαι] 'counsel to rise.' An idiom not unfrequent in the Classical writers. Many parallel sentiments are adduced by Wets. and others from the Classical writers.

—βρέχει.] It is agreeable to the Classical usage to join ὁ Θεὸς or Ζεὺς to βρεῖ, and sometimes other words of similar signification, as those denoting to thunder or lighten, rain or freeze.

46. ἀγαπήσῃτε τοὺς ἀγ.] Here there is the very frequent ellipsis of μόνον.

—ἔχετε.] This is not put for ἔξετε, as Kuin. and others say; but the sense is, 'have ye [laid up] in the word of God?' See v. 12. vi. 1. And so Thucyd. i. 129. καὶταί σοι εὐεργεσία.

47. ἀσπάσῃτε.] This includes (species for genus) the exercise of all the offices of kindness and affection.

—ἀδελφοὺς] i. e. your countrymen. Almost all the MSS., with the Edit. Princ. and other early Eds. together with many ancient Versions and Fathers, have φίλους, which was preferred by Wets., and received into the text by Matth. The vulg. was adopted, from the Erasmus Edn., by Steph., on slender MS. authority. Yet it is so strongly supported by Critical probability, that it requires little; φίλους being, as Grot. and others have seen, evidently a gloss. However, ἄδ. has since been found in many ancient and good MSS., and all the best Versions, and is adopted by Griesb., Vat., and Scholz.

—τί περισσόν] literally 'what that is superior,' or excellent. Comp. ver. 20. So Diod. Sic. xii. 15. ὁ νόμος οὐδὲν ὀράται περιεχῶν σοφὸν ἢ περιττόν. And Eschin. Socr. Dial. iii. 6. ὁρῶσιν τὰ περιττά τοῖς τὰ κοινά; and Thucyd. iii. 55. οὐδὲν ἱκερπείστικον ὑπὸ ἡμῶν—ἐπάσεται, καὶ ἔξω τοῦ κρίνοντος.

For τελῶναι some MSS. Versions, and Fathers have ἰδνικοί, which is edited by Knapp, Griesb., Fritz., and Tittm. And indeed the antithesis favours it; and that this was a maxim among the publicans appears from Wetstein's citations, to which I have in Rec. Syn. added an interesting passage from Themist.; which shows that Socrates almost anticipated the doctrine of Christ, on bearing goodwill to our enemies. However, ἰδνικοί might arise from a wish to strengthen the antithesis; and probably did; as the few MSS. which have it are full of such emendations. I have, therefore, with Wets., Matth., and Scholz. retained the common reading.

48. ἴσατε.] Fut. for Imperat., according to the Commentators. Nay, Ahrsch. affirms that ἴσατε is equally imperative with ἴσατε. But it is more correct to say, that it bears an affinity to the Imperat., and (as Fritz. has suggested) is a delicate way of signifying what is directed to be done. Nor is this a Hebraism; but it is found both in Greek, Latin, and English. See Win. Gr. § 44. 3. The sense is, 'you are required to be τίλαιοι;' 'fully and completely righteous.' So Ecclesi. xlv. 17. Isocr. p. 239. τελείους ἀνδρας εἶναι, καὶ πάσας ἔχειν ἀρετάς. Comp. also 1 Pet. i. 15. It is obvious that the precept must be taken with limitation, as at Job i. 1.; the meaning being, that 'we are to aim at that perfection, especially in acts of benevolence to our fellow creatures, (here especially had in view, as appears from the parallel passage at Luke vi. 36.) which pre-eminently characterizes the Deity.' Nor is this limitation arbitrary; but is suggested by ὥσπερ; which, like some other adverbs of comparison, does not denote equality in the things compared; (so Matth. xix. 19. ἀγαπήσεις τὸν πλησίον σου ὡς σεαυτὸν.) but consimilarity; q. d. 'in the same manner, though not in the same degree.'

VI. The religion of the Pharisees was distinguished from that of Christ as much by its motives as by its rule. Our Lord, therefore, next proceeds to warn his disciples against hypocrisy and ostentation in external duties, as he had done against their neglect. This he does by reference to the three principal modes of evincing regard to religion—almsgiving (1—4.), prayer (4—9.), and fasting (5. seq.). He warns them that those who were influenced by so unworthy a motive as ostentation, must expect no other reward for such performances than the applause of the world, which has actuated them thereto.

1. προσέχετε.] Suppl. τὸν νοῦν; as we say, 'mind that,' &c. At μὴ ποιεῖν supply ὥστε. On the force of the μὴ see Robinson's Lex. in v. I. f. β.

—ἐλεημοσύνην.] All the critical Editors, except Wets., Matth., and Scholz, are agreed in reading δικαιοσύνην, instead of ἐλεημ., which has indeed the appearance of a gloss. Our Lord, it is urged, first lays down a general precept; and then specifies the particulars. But strong reasons are urged by Wets. and Matth. why this reading cannot be admitted; and it is very deficient in authority, being found in only three or four MSS. It were strange that a gloss should creep into almost every MS. Besides, the quarter from whence we receive this reading is one fruitful in corruption under the guise of emendation. May we not, then, suspect that an alteration was made to introduce the very regularity above adverted to? though it is little agreeable to the unstudied style which so generally prevails in the N. T. The phrase ἐλεημοσύνην ποιεῖν occurs in Sirach

vii. 10. Tob. xii. 8. and Sapient. xxxv. 2. The Classical use is ἐλ. δίδόναι.

—εἰ δὲ μήγε.] Scil. προσέχετε μὴ ποιεῖν. See Matth. ix. 17. 2 Cor. xi. 16. Though there can scarcely be said to be an ellipsis, since, in use, writers seem to have had in mind otherwise. "Ἐχετε is not put for the Fut., but is to be taken as at v. 46, where see Note.

2. μὴ σαλπίσκς, &c.] The common notion, that this has reference to the Pharisees having a trumpet sounded before them, when they distributed their alms, is now justly exploded; since there is no vestige of such a custom in the Rabbinical writings. We may (with Chrys., Euthym., and Theophyl.), simply take the verb in a metaphorical sense, and, by a proverbial manner of speaking, of ostentation in giving (so Cicero says buccinacolor existimationis); with allusion to the custom, common to all the ancient nations, of making proclamations, &c. by sound of trumpet. q. d. Be not as the hypocrites, who, devoid of all benevolence, and actuated either by superstition, self-interest, or vain-glory, seek only the praise of men, and therefore, as it were, sound a trumpet before them, to proclaim their alms-giving.

—οἱ ὑποκριταί.] The word denotes, 1. an actor; and, 2. one who uses (as actors did) a mask; 3. a dissembler.

—συναγωγαῖς.] Grot., Wolf, Elsn., Kuim., and others take the word of places of public course, to the exclusion of synagogues. But those must surely be included, as being the places where alms were especially distributed.

—ἀπέχουσι.] This is by many explained as put for ἀφίξουσι. But the expression is rather used of what is customary, for ἀπολαβοῦσι; the ἀπὸ being very significant, to denote, 'they receive out' (or, in full) 'their reward,' i. e. have already received it, have had all that they will have. So Luke vi. 24. ἀπέχετε τὴν παράκλησιν ὑμῶν. Joseph. Bell. i. 30, 6. ἀπέχεσθαι τῆς εὐσεβείας τὸ ἐπιτίμιον. Barnab. Ep. xiii. ἀπέχομεν τὸ τέλος τῆς γνώσεως ἡμῶν. Arrian. Epict. iii. 2, where, stigmatizing one who does nothing but out of regard to the public view, he adds ἀπέχεις ἅπαντα.

3. μὴ γνῶτω—σου.] A proverbial saying frequent in the Classics and Rabbins, importing such secrecy, as to escape, if possible, the observation even of ourselves.

4. ὁ πατὴρ σου—φανερῶς.] Meaning, that however secret, it will be fully known to the Searcher of hearts, will be well pleasing to Him and be openly rewarded by Him. Ἀναθήσει, vil. μισθόν, the reward of God's favour and blessing here, and life everlasting hereafter. 'Εν τῷ φανερωῖ. Supply τόπω, for φανερώς, namely, in the presence of saints and angels, at the resurrection of the just. The words are not found in a few MSS., Versions, and Fathers, here and at verse 6. And they are, in one or other of the passages, cancelled by some Critics, but defended by others. There is, I conceive, far too little external evidence to authorize cancelling them in either of the first two passages: and internal evidence is very strong for them in the former. And, as to the latter, it is surely less probable that they were inserted by those who wished to complete the antithesis, than that they were cancelled by those who stumbled at the repetition. In removing which, some cancelled the words at v. 4, others at v. 6, and others at v. 18; and as the point was a doubtful one, and the marks of doubt probably left in all the passages, some bold or blundering scribes omitted them in all three; which was better than to cancel, as Griesb. has done, the first and third, and leave the second. However, as external evidence (both in MSS., Versions, and Fathers) is decidedly against the words at v. 18, and as internal evidence is unfavourable to them, I have, for critical consistency, felt bound, while I defend them here and at v. 6, to bracket them at v. 18; though I am far from being certain that they are not genuine even there. May not the repetition have been purposely adopted (as often) by our Lord, in order that what he had to say might be impressed more deeply on the minds of his hearers? I need only refer to Mark ix. 44, 46, 48, where the words ὅπου ὁ σκῆληξ αὐτῶν οὐ ταλιαντᾶ, καὶ τὸ πῦρ οὐ ἀβάνονται, occurring in all three verses, are omitted in the first and second by certain MSS. (mostly those which omit the words at v. 4. and 6. here.) And yet no Critic has been bold enough to cancel them there.

5. οὐκ ἔσῃ 'must not be.' On the prohibitory force of the Future, see Robinson's Lex. in οὐ α. β. φιλοῦσι, solent; according to the usage of the best Greek writers. See Robinson's Lex. in v.

— ἐστῶτες.] Many take this for ὄντες: but it appears from Scripture and the Rabbinical writers, that the Jews used to pray standing. See Horne, iii. 327. There is, however, no stress to be laid upon the word. Γωνίαι τῶν πλατειῶν, i. e. the place where several streets meet at angles; where there is a broader space, and greater concourse of passengers. So the Jerusalem Talmud: 'I observed Rabbi Jannai standing and praying in the street of Tripnor; and repeating an additional prayer at each of the four corners.'

6. ταμιεῖον.] This is explained by Kuin. 'an upper chamber,' sometimes called ὑπερώϊον, corresponding to Hebr. תנאי, appropriated to retirement and prayer. Fritz., however, with reason, thinks the two should not be confounded, and that by ταμιεῖον is denoted a yet more retired and secret place, well expressed by our word closet. See Vitringa de Synag. Jud. p. 150 sq.

7. βαττολογήσητε.] The word does not occur in the Classical writers; but from what follows, and from the cognate term βαττολογία, (occurring in Suid., Hesych., Eustath., and explained by them πολυλογία,) we ascertain it to be the using of prolix useless speech, a dealing in vain repetition. The term is said to be derived from one Battus, a poet, whose writings abounded in vain repetitions.

— ἐν τῇ πολυλογίᾳ.] We have very few examples of the Heathen prayers. But if we may judge by their hymns (as we find those of Homer, Orpheus, and Callimachus), we may suppose they were so stuffed up with synonyms, epithets, amplifications, and prerogatives of the Deity, as to justify our Lord's expressions. 'Εν, for διὰ ὁ ἔνεκα, &c.; a use not confined to the Hellenistic style, but sometimes occurring in the Classical writers.

9. οὕτως] 'in this manner, after this model.' This prayer being, as Euthym. says, the fountain of prayer, whence we may draw precatory thoughts. Surely due reverence for a prayer, which contains in brief all things that can be asked of God, together with an acknowledgment of his Divine majesty and power and our subjection, requires that we should always include it in our prayers; especially as the words of Luke xi. 2. seem to contain an express command. Comp. also Numb. vi. 23. (Sept.) and v. 16. Indeed there is every reason to think it always formed a part of the devotions of the first Christians. See Acts i. 24. ii. 42. iv. 24. It consists of a preface, six petitions, and a doxology. The whole of it, with the exception of the clause 'as we forgive our debtors,' is, in substance, found in the nineteen prayers of the Jewish Liturgy. See Church Quart. Rev. No. 2. On the whole prayer itself, see Horne's Introd. II. 568.

Scholz. have rejected it. It is, indeed, supported by almost all the MSS., by both the Syriac, and some other Oriental Versions, and by some Greek Fathers. But, on the other hand, it is not found in at least 8 MSS., all of very high antiquity, and in others is marked as doubtful; nor has it any place in the Italic, Vulgate, and some other Versions, in many of the Greek and all the Latin Fathers. And as doxologies of this kind were much in use among the Jews (see 1 Chron. xxix. 11.) and early Christians, there is great reason to suppose that it was interpolated from the ancient liturgies, in which we know it formed the response of the people, the prayer alone being pronounced by the priest. It is surely far more likely to have been introduced from the Liturgies, than to have been removed from the passage because of its not being contained in the parallel one of St. Luke. It is, indeed, argued, that the Greek Church would never have presumed to add, from their liturgies, to a form of prayer by Christ himself. But it may be replied, that they never did formally, or at once, add it; the doxology being probably introduced gradually, and, no doubt, at first written in a different character, or in red ink, and in the margin, as found in several MSS. And when it is alleged, that the Latin Fathers purposely omitted the clause, to remove a discrepancy between Matthew and Luke; that is taking for granted what cannot be proved; and what should not be credited except on the strongest proof, as impeaching the credit of those venerable persons. Besides, there was a far more serious discrepancy involved in the clause immediately preceding; that too not being found in the Vulgate and Italic Versions, nor in the Fathers in question. But they did not attempt to remove that discrepancy. Why then this? Moreover, this doxology materially interrupts the connexion between the ὡς καὶ ἡμεῖς ἀφίμεν and the admonition founded on it at v. 14, and therefore was likely to be thrown out. And although the omission of the clause does not entirely remove, yet it greatly lessens the harshness of the interruption. As to the argument founded on the sublimity, beauty, and appropriateness of the clause in question, it is very inconclusive; for the ancient Liturgies, both Greek and Latin, being chiefly founded on Scripture, abound in passages of great sublimity and beauty. And as to the appropriateness, that is quite consistent with the clause being imitations: for such alone could cause it to be introduced here. And a spurious passage may be fitted to any context, as well as a genuine one. Its being found, too, in the Peshito-Syriac Version will not absolutely prove its genuineness. And especially it will not prove that it was not introduced from the liturgies above mentioned; for those liturgies, ascending to the time of Barnabas and Clement, were far more ancient than the highest antiquity ever claimed for the Peshito-Syriac Version. Not to say that there are passages where that Version is admitted to be interpolated, probably from the later Syriac Versions. And where should we sooner expect it than in a passage like the present, of which the interpolation (if such there be) was confined to the East? for the MSS. which support it are almost wholly of the Constantinopolitan or Eastern class. And as to what Matthæi says, that 'if we reject this clause, then we must receive that at 1 John v. 5, with both hands,' since 'utriusque loci eadem est crisis,' that by no means follows. For although it be true, as he says, that 'the external evidence for the latter passage is almost entirely of the Latin Church, and that it is supported chiefly by internal evidence,' yet the two cases are by no means the same; internal evidence here being more against the clause than it is there in its favour. And surely it does not follow that we must receive the passage of 1 John, if we reject this; since there may be equal consistency in rejecting both. At all events, if we reject this, we must reject it on the ground that, as Bp. Marsh observes (Lect. part vi. p. 27), 'internal evidence may show that a passage is spurious, though external evidence is in its favour.' And if we reject that, we must reject it on the ground that (in the words of the same learned Prelate), 'no external evidence can prove a passage to be spurious, when internal evidence is decidedly against it.'

14, 15. Ἐὰν γὰρ ἀφήτε, &c.] In order to more impressively recommend the virtue mentioned in v. 12, our Lord, in the Hebrew manner, (see Is. iii. 9. xxxviii. 1. Jer. xxix. 11. Deut. ix. 7.) propounds the same sentiment, both affirmatively and negatively. And this and the verse following are illustrative of the preceding. (Kuini.) We are not, however, to understand hereby, that the practice of this, or of any other single duty, can obtain God's favour, where other Christian virtues are neglected; for, Bp. Taylor says, 'though negative precepts are absolute, yet affirmative promises admit of this limitation, if no other condition of salvation be wanting.'

16. Ὅταν δὲ νηστεύητε.] This is meant, not of public and enjoined, but of private and voluntary fasting. On which see Horne's Introd.

—μὴ γίνεσθε—σκυθρωποὶ] 'do not put on a morose countenance.' Σκυθρωπός properly signifies scowling, as opposed to λαγρός, and here denotes the grim-visagedness of hypocrisy. So the words ὑποκριταὶ and σκυθρωποὶ are conjoined in some passages cited by Wets. and others.

—ἀφανίζουσι] 'they disfigure.' Ἀφανίζειν signifies 1. to cause to disappear; 2. to change the appearance of, to deform, or disfigure. The term has reference, partly, to the squalid appearance which the Pharisees affected, by the sprinkling of ashes or earth on their heads, and letting their beards and hair grow; and partly to the sour countenance into which their faces were scrowed up by a semblance of penitence.

ἀνθρώποις νηστεύοντες. ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, ὅτι ἀπέχουσι τὸν μισθὸν αὐτῶν. Σὺ δὲ, νηστεύων, ἀλειφαί σου τὴν κεφαλὴν, 17 καὶ τὸ πρόσωπόν σου νίψαι· ὅπως μὴ φανῇς τοῖς ἀνθρώποις 18 νηστεύων, ἀλλὰ τῷ Πατρὶ σου τῷ ἐν τῷ κρυπτῷ· καὶ ὁ Πατὴρ σου, ὁ βλέπων ἐν τῷ κρυπτῷ, ἀποδώσει σοι [ἐν τῷ φανερῷ].

— ὅπως φανῶσι—νηστ.] for φανῶνται, 'that they may appear unto men to fast.' Similarly Aristoph. Ran. 1063, cited by Wets., ράκι' ἀμπισχών, ἵν' ἱλεῖσιν τοῖς ἀνδράποισι φαίνωνται είναι.

17. ἀλειφαί—νίψαι] i. e. appear as usual; for the Jews, like the Greeks, regularly washed and anointed, except at times of mourning and public humiliation. See Dan. x. 3.

18. ἐν τῷ φανερῷ.] See note supra, v. 4. From hypocritis our Lord proceeds to avarice, as being the motive that prompted the practice thereof.

19. μὴ θησαυρίζετε, &c.] Θησαυροὶ properly signifies a repository for valuables; but sometimes, as here, the treasure itself so deposited, i. e. such precious moveables as are usually treasured up; e. gr. gold, silver, &c. (either in the mass, or worked up into plate), and costly apparel, in which the riches of the ancients chiefly consisted. So Thucyd. ii. 98. χωρὶς δὲ ὅσα ὑφαντά τε καὶ λαΐα, καὶ ἡ ἄλλη κατασκευὴ, where see my note. To these two last the words following chiefly allude; for βρώσις (commonly understood of rust and canker, but by Rosenm. and Kuin. of the curculio or cornworm, thus making it refer to grain stored up) may be best taken in its most extensive sense (with Chrys., Euthym., and Fritz.), to denote that corruption to which moveables of every kind are subject. With the sentiment I would compare Philostr. Vit. Apoll. v. 36. πλοῦτον ἡγοῦ μὴ τὸν ἀπόβειον· τί γὰρ αὖ βελτίων οὗτος τῆς ὀκθύν συναχθείσης ψάμμου; See also Philo, p. 116, cited by me in Rec. Syn. 'Αφανίζει is for διαφθείρει.

— διορύσσουσι scil. τὸν τοῖχον, which word, or οἰκίαν, is generally supplied. The walls in the East being chiefly of hardened clay, the houses are very liable to be thus broken into.

22. The preceding truths are now illustrated by an apt similitude.

has been thought to be required by the preceding and following words. And several phrases in the Sept., the N. T., and the Rabbinical writers are adduced, to countenance this mode of interpretation. Yet it involves some confusion; and the words ἐὰν οὖν—φῶς may be better taken (with Chrysost., Theophyl., Euthym., and others among the ancients, and most of the recent Commentators) in their proper sense; so that ἀπλοῦς be interpreted sanus, integer, clear, and πονηρὸς, depraved, picky, dim; of which signification many examples are adduced by Kypke and Elsner.—By τὸ φῶς τὸ ἐν σοὶ is meant the light of conscience. So, among the passages cited by the Commentators, Philo, borrowing from Aristot. Top. i. 14., says, ὅπερ οὖν ἐν ψυχῇ, τοῦτο ὀφθαλμὸς ἐν σώματι. Here, then, is an apt comparison, in which the duty of fixing the attention on heavenly things is illustrated by reference to the case of the eye in the body, by regulating its motions; q. d. 'As the natural eye, when healthy, regulates the motions of the body, so does the mental eye direct the soul.' It has been well observed by Olearius, that the whole passage is adagial; of which the first part forms the adage itself: 'The eye is the light of the body.' The 2d supplies the deduction, by consequence; 'If then thine eye be healthy and clear,' &c. The 3d the application: 'If therefore the light (or what should be so) within thee be darkness, how great must be that darkness.'

24. οὐδαὶς—δουλεύειν.] It may be implied by the context, that the two masters are of contrary dispositions, and give contrary orders; though in point of fact it is impossible to be devoted to two masters; though a man may render some service to both. The words μισεῖν and ἀγαπᾶν are to be taken in a qualified sense, as denoting to love less, or love more; of which there are many examples both in the Sept. and the N. T. 'Αντίχριστος is a stronger term than ἀγαπᾶν, as denoting close connection and strong attachment. The difference here between the Classical and Scriptural use is, that in the former ἀντίχριστος is used with a Genit. of thing, not as here of per- son. The reason assigned by Bp. Middleton for the omission of the Article at ἐνός is inadmissible. It seems to have been omitted simply because, having been employed in the other clause of the antithesis, it might be omitted without occasioning mistake. This could not have been done at τοῦ ἑτέρου, for a reason which will apply to the English as well as the Greek.

— οὐ δύνασθε Θεῷ δουλεύειν, &c.] So it is finely remarked by Pausanias, iii. 23, 2, ἀνθρώπων γὰρ ἀφορώντι ἐς κέρδος τὰ θεῖα ὑστέρᾳ λημμάτων.

— μαμωνᾷ.] This reading, for vulg. μαμμ., is found in most of the MSS. and many Greek Fathers; the Edit. Prin. and several early Editions; and is confirmed by the parallel passage of Luke, and by its derivation from the Chaldee and Syriac ממונא. It has been received by Wets., Griesb., Matthæi, Vater, Fritz., and Scholz. The word in Chaldee and Syriac signifies riches; but like the Greek πλοῦτος, it is here personified. As to its being a god of the Chaldees, corresponding to the Greek Plutus, that has been rather asserted than proved.

25—34. In this portion our Lord warns them against covetousness, and excessive anxiety about the supply of their bodily wants, by four arguments for trusting in God's Providence.

25. μὴ μεριμνᾶτε] 'take no anxious thought,' 'be not anxiously solicitous;' as Phil. iv. 6. μηδὲν μεριμνᾶτε. And so in the parallel passage of Luke, μὴ μεριμνᾶτε, 'be not tossed with anxious cares.' Ψυχῇ καὶ σώματι are datives of onus. This first argument is: 'If God has given us life and bodies fitted for enjoyment, surely he will not deny us the lesser blessings of food and clothing.'

26. Here we have the second argument. Ἐμβλέψατε, 'survey, contemplate.'

— τὰ πετεινὰ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, &c.] τινὲς τῶν ζώων. This is supposed to be a Hebraism; since to the names of animals the Hebrews were accustomed to subjoin the places in which they usually lived. It was not, however, confined to the Hebrew, but occurs in the earliest Greek phraseology. So Hom. II. P. 675. ὑπὸ νηυσὶν πετεινῶν, and Eurip. Elect. 897. ἢ σκύλας οἰνοῖσιν ἐν ἑσέροις τράποις.

— καὶ, and yet, is called a Hebraism; but is also a Grecism. Μᾶλλον is not redundant, but an emphatic addition, meaning beyond. So Thucyd. iv. 3. χωρίον διάφορον (excellent) μᾶλλον ἰστέον.

27. ἡλικίαν.] The ancient Commentators, and most modern ones, assign to this term the sense stature; others, however, more properly (I think) interpret it status mensuram; a sense surely far more suitable; the admonition being directed against excessive anxiety as to food and clothing; which, while they have a necessary connection with the preservation of life, can have nothing in common with duration. According to the latter interpretation, then, the argument is most forcible and conclusive, to show the uselessness of man's care, by the helplessness of his condition; because no care of man, however anxious, can materially add to the age of man. See Calvin. πῆχυς, like other measures of extent, is not unfrequently applied to duration of time. See Ps. xxxix. 4, 5. Those, however, who support this interpretation are not agreed as to the nature of the metaphor. Most think there is an allusion to the allegorical fable of the Parcm; while Wets. imagines it alludes to a stadium or race-course, of which, as consisting of several hundred cubits, one cubit might not unaptly be termed ἐλάχιστον.

28. καταμάθετε] 'attentively consider.' The κατὰ is intensive, as in κατανόησατε, Luke xii. 27. Κοπιᾷ and νήθει refers to the occupations of males and of females respectively.

29. δόξῃ] 'splendour.' A sense frequent in the Sept. and New Testament; but very rare in the Classical writers.

30. εἰ δὲ] 'if then,' for since then, εἰ for ἵνα. See Robinson's Lex. in εἰ l. i. g. β.

— χόρτον.] The Hebrews divided all vegetables into two sorts, ὄρεα and ὄρεα, trees, and plants or herbs; the former of which were by the Hellenists called ἔρλον; the latter, χόρτος; comprehending both grass and corn, and likewise flowers, including the lilies just mentioned, supposed to be the plant called the Crown Imperial. From scarcity of fuel, all the withered stalks, even of the herbage, are in the East employed for that purpose. (Grot. and A. Clarke.)

εἰς κλίβανον βαλλόμενοι, ὁ Θεὸς οὕτως ἀμείνυνται, οὐ πολλὰ μᾶλλον ὑμᾶς, ὀλιγόπιστοι; * Μὴ οὖν μεριμνήσῃτε λέγοντες· 31 τί φάγωμεν, ἢ τί πίωμεν, ἢ τί περιβαλώμεθα; πάντα γὰρ 32 ταῦτα τὰ ἔθνη ἐπιζητεῖ· οἶδε γὰρ ὁ πατήρ ὑμῶν ὁ οὐράνιος ὅτι χρῄζετε τούτων ἀπάντων. * Ζητεῖτε δὲ πρῶτον τὴν 33 βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ τὴν δικαιοσύνην αὐτοῦ, καὶ ταῦτα πάντα προστεθήσεται ὑμῖν. Μὴ οὖν μεριμνήσῃτε εἰς τὴν 34 αὔριον· ἡ γὰρ αὔριον μεριμνήσει τὰ ἑαυτῆς. ἀρκετὸν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἡ κακία αὐτῆς.

VII. * ΜΗ κρίνετε, ἵνα μὴ κριθῇτε. ἐν ᾧ γὰρ κρίματι, 2 κρίνετε, κριθήσεσθε· καὶ ἐν ᾧ μέτρῳ μετρεῖτε, [ἀντί]μετρηθήσεται ὑμῖν. * Τί δὲ βλέπετε τὸ κάρφος τὸ ἐν τῷ ὀφθαλμῷ 3 τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ σου, τὴν δὲ ἐν τῷ σῷ ὀφθαλμῷ δοκὸν οὐ κατανοεῖς; * Ἡ πῶς ἐρεῖς τῷ ἀδελφῷ σου· Ἀφες ἐκβάλω τὸ κάρφος 4 ἀπὸ τοῦ ὀφθαλμοῦ σου· καὶ ἰδού, ἡ δοκὸς ἐν τῷ ὀφθαλμῷ σου;

31. τὰ ἔθνη ἐπιζητεῖ.] A kind of argument often made use of in the O. T., in order, as it were, to shame the Israelites into virtue, by showing them that they lived no better than the unenlightened heathens. That they should have eagerly sought after such things, was not wonderful; since they had no belief in, or dependence on the Providence of God; and in their labours, or their prayers to the gods, solely regarded temporal blessings; as we find from Juvenal, Sat. x. — οἶδε γὰρ ἀπάντων.] 'Your heavenly Father knoweth, and therefore will graciously bestow them;' i. e. on the supposition that ye ask for them, and are not otherwise wisit to receive them. (Markland.)

33. πρῶτον.] In a superlative sense, 'first of all, in the first place,' and as the first object.

— τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ.] i. e. the religion promulgated by God, its promises and blessedness. See Gresswell on the Parables, i. 120. seqq. and Robinson's Lex. in βασιλεία.

— τὴν δικαιοσύνην α.] i. e. 'that mode of justification which he hath revealed, and the righteousness and holiness which it requires;' (see James i. 20.) not that righteousness, or system of morality which the Jews had devised, consisting chiefly of ceremonies and mere externals. Προσθεθήσεται, 'shall be superadded' to more estimable blessings.

34. εἰς τὴν αὔριον.] Sub. ἡμέραν. Most Commentators take εἰς τὴν αὔριον for τὰ εἰς τὴν αὔριον. But that is unnecessary. The εἰς may very well denote object. Αὔριον is used for time to come in general.

— ἀρκετόν αὐτῆς.] These, like the words immediately preceding, have the air of an adage, similar to some aduced by the Commentators; e. g. Eurip. Hel. 338. μὴ πρόμαντις ἀλγύνω Προλάμβαν', ὦ φίλα, γόον. The neuter in ἀρκετόν is put, with a subst. fem., by an idiom common both to the Greek and Latin. And χρῆμα or πράγμα is understood. See Matth. Gr. Gr. § 439. Render: 'The morrow will take (i. e. let it take) thought for its own matters.'

— τῇ ἡμέρᾳ.] Some Commentators supply ἰκάσθαι. But it is better to suppose the Article used with reference to παρούση, 'the (present) day.' Κακία is well explained by Chrys. κάκωσις, ταλαιπωρία; a sense found in the Sept., (see Eccles. vii. 15. Eccles. xix. 6. 1 Macc. x. 46.) but not in the Classical writers.

VII. 1. μὴ κρίνετε—κριθῇτε.] q. d. As every man is not qualified, nor authorized to be a reprobator, so every offender is not the proper subject of reproof. (Scott.) Almost all Commentators take κρίνετε for κατακρίνετε, chiefly because in the parallel passage of Luke vi. 37. μὴ καταδικάζετε καὶ οὐ μὴ καταδικασθῇτε is added. But Fritz. (perhaps with reason) prefers the interpretation of Chrysost., by which κρίνετε is taken of sitting in judgment over others, acting as severe censors of their faults. And καταδικάζω may be understood in the same way, but only in a stronger sense. One thing is certain, that forensic judgment cannot here be included.

2. ἐν ᾧ γὰρ κρίματι.] The ἐν is thought to be redundant. But it rather answers to the Heb. 2, or, as Fritz. thinks, is to be taken in the sense per. See Matth. Gr. Gr. p. 842. Instead of ἀντιμετρηθήσεται, μετρηθῇ is received by the unanimous consent of all Editors from Mill to Fritz, and Scholz. The other was doubtless derived from the parallel passage of Luke.

3. τί δὲ βλέπετε.] Render 'how beholdest thou,' i. e. 'how is it that thou,' &c. See supra, v. 25, and a Rabbinical writer cited by Wots. on Luke vi. 19. Τί here is nearly the same with πῶς in the next verse. Κάρφος (from κάρφος, to dry,) splinter; (so the Latin tubera and verrucæ, as we say straws) as opposed to δοκός, beam. There is reference to a proverb of frequent use with the Jews, against those who, severe upon the slight offences of others, were insensible of their own crimes. Many similar sayings are adduced both from the Rabbinical and Classical writers. See Horat. Sat. l. 3. 25.

4. ἀφες, ἐκβάλω.] The Commentators usually supply ἵνα. To this, however, Fritz. with reason objects, as unnecessary; and compares the Latin permittle, erinam. The article in ἡ δοκὸς refers to the beam, as just mentioned. Compare Æschyl. Eum. 78, and Agam. 243.

9^d Ἡ τίς ἐστὶν ἐξ ὑμῶν ἄνθρωπος, ὃν ἐὰν αἰτήσῃ ὁ υἱὸς αὐτοῦ 10 ἄρτον, μὴ λίθον ἐπιδώσει αὐτῷ ; καὶ ἐὰν ἰχθὺν αἰτήσῃ, μὴ 11 ὄφιν ἐπιδώσει αὐτῷ ; Ἐὰν οὖν ὑμεῖς, πονηροὶ ὄντες, οἴδατε δόματα ἀγαθὰ διδόναι τοῖς τέκνοις ὑμῶν, πόσῳ μᾶλλον ὁ πατὴρ ὑμῶν ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, δώσει ἀγαθὰ τοῖς αἰτοῦσιν 12 αὐτόν ! 6. μὴ δῶτε—χοίρων.] Lest any one should suppose all liberty taken away of judging, even concerning matters the most manifest, Christ subjoins a precept fraught with that prudence, which he elsewhere directs to be joined with simplicity. (Grot.) The precept is couched in two adagial sayings. Similar ones are adduced from the Rabbinical, and even the Classical writers, to which may be added the following from Aristot. ap. Themist. p. 234. μήτε ρίψαι σοφίαν εἰς τοὺς τριπόδας. By dogs and swine are meant respectively (as Greswell suggests) the brutal and ferocious, and the gross and licentious; those brutal and sensual persons, who were so refractory, and given up to the lusts of the flesh, that far from receiving the truth, when proposed to them, they resisted and blasphemed it, and impeded its growth. By τὸ ἅγιον ('consecrated meat') is meant the doctrine of the Gospel. (Comp. Prov. ix. 7.) As illustrative of τοῖς μαργαρίταις, &c., it appears from the Rabbinical writers that the Jews called the precepts of wisdom pearls. And our Lord more than once compares the truths (especially the more recondite ones) of the Gospel to precious gems. See Matt. xiii. 46. The general sense, then, is, 'Do not proffer holy admonitions to those who will scorn and abuse them.'

—μήποτε καταπατήσωσιν—ὑμᾶς.] Many Commentators take καταπατ. of the swine, and στραφέντες ῥήξωσιν of the dogs, per chiasmum. This, however, is so harsh, that it is better (with Erasm., Pric., Wets., and Fritz.) to refer both to the swine; στραφέντες having reference to the oblique direction in which swine make their attack. Ἐκ τοῖς ποσὶν αὐτῶν 'suis pedibus,' equiv. to inter pedes, under foot.

7. αἰτεῖτε—ὑμῖν.] The same thing is expressed in three seemingly proverbial forms. At κρούετε sub. τῆς θύρας, in which term, as well as ἀνοίγειν the ellipsis was common.

8. ὁ αἰτῶν.] Namely arrogant. Ὁ ζητῶν, i. e. what is expedient and proper. Τῷ κρούοντι, i. e. who earnestly, and with faith addresses himself in prayer. Ἀνοιγήσεται, 'it will be opened.' The sense here is nearly that of the present, used to mark custom.

9. ὁ τίς—δοθῆσεται.] The ὁ is thought by Fritz. to denote contrariety but it has rather the illustrative force, when what follows is meant to illustrate the foregoing by another view of the subject. As to the τίς, Elan. and Fritz. rightly suppose an anacoluthon, by which two interrogations are blended; thus, 'an quis est e vobis homo, quem, si filius panem poposcerit, num forte lapidem ei porrigat?' Ἀνθρώπος is emphatical 'making (as Campb. says) the illustration of the goodness of the celestial Father, from the conduct of even human fathers, with all their imperfections, much more energetic.' The examples taken from a stone and a fish are derived from two adagia found also in all the Classical writers (ἀντὶ πέτρης σκορπίου) representing, by a familiar illustration, those who disappoint the just expectations of others, by giving them not the thing they ask for and need, but something else; which, though similar to it, as a serpent is to some sorts of fish (eel and perch) or a stone to a cake or biscuit, yet it is not only not the thing, but wholly useless, or even noxious.

11. τρωποί.] The ancients, and, of the moderns, Grot., Elan., and Schoetg., explain this evil, corrupt; most recent Commentators, avaricious. But for the latter sense there is little or no authority, nor indeed propriety. The term seems simply used by way of comparison with the all-perfect and beneficent FATHER, ὁ ἀγαθός, Ps. 73. 1. the good Being, —God; in contrast with frail and erring man, easily warped by passion.

—οἴδατε διδόναι.] Almost all the recent Commentators take this as said, per periphrasin, for διδοτε; and they adduce several passages of the Classical writers, which, however, are not quite to the purpose. It seems better to regard it as a Hebraism, and more significant expression.

12. The example of the truth and mercy of God, the encouragement afforded, and his readiness to pardon, assist, and accept us, constitute the primary argument with which this rule is enforced, and form its connection with the preceding verses.

—πάντα οὖν ὅσα, &c.] A golden rule of equity, familiar to the Jews, and not unknown to the Gentiles. Though, as Scott observes, 'moral precepts, thus enforced, are very different from the same rules of action, when prescribed by human moralists, without authority, sanction, efficacious motives, or promise.'

The οὖν introducing this precept is by some supposed transitive; by others, resumptive. But it is rather illative. Οὕτως, is edited by Fritz., with Matth. (from the Edit. Princ., and some MSS. and Versions) for οὗτος, just after. Yet the canon of preferring the more difficult reading must induce us to retain οὗτος. The sense is, 'This is the sum and substance of what is contained in the law and the prophets on the relative duties of men.' It is all one, in the meaning and result, with that νόμος βασιλικός, James ii. 8, which comprehends the whole of the Second Table of the Law, with all the several offices reducible to each commandment therein.

13. Here there is no connection with the preceding. The words (as we find from Luke xiii. 24) being spoken at another time, and in answer to the inquiry of the disciples, 'Lord, are there few that shall be saved?'

— εἰσελθετε, &c.] i. e. strive to enter (as in the parallel passage, Luke xiii. 24.) namely εἰς τὴν ζωὴν. The course of human action is often in Scripture called τῇ ὁδῷ; and, from the restraints and difficulties of virtue, its road is termed strait; as that of vice, broad. Here, however, the comparison is to a gate opening into a road leading up to a citadel. The τῆς implies that there is another gate, leading to the broad road, which we are not to enter. Similar comparisons and parallel sentiments are found in the Heathen writers.

14. τί στενή.] It is scarcely possible to imagine stronger evidence than what exists for this reading; which has been received by all the most eminent Editors. The common reading ὅτι may, indeed, be tolerated, in the sense sed; but Erasmus, from whom Stephens derived it, had little or no authority for it. Whereas τί is supported by the great body of the MSS., all the best Versions, Chrys., Theophyl., and Euthym., and the Ed. Princ. The sense, then, is, 'How narrow is the gate!'

— ὀλίγοι οἱ εὐρίσκοντες.] This seems meant to suggest the difficulty and exertion necessary to attain it.

15. προσέχετε δι' ἀπὸ τῶν ψευδοπροφητῶν.] The connexion is well laid down by Abp. Newc.

thus: 'I have exhorted you to enter in by the strait gate. But beware of false guides.' Προσείπε, when followed by ἀπὸ τινος (with which Kuin. compares the Heb. מן יסו) is equivalent to φοβεῖσθαι ἀπὸ τινος. It occurs several times in the Sept., but never, I believe, in the Classical writers. 'Εαυτοῖς seems to be understood, which is expressed at Luke xvii. 3.

— ψευδοπροφ.] This is variously explained; but usually for ψευδοδιδάσκαλοι. See 2 Pet. ii. 1. Προφήτης and προφητεῖαι, in the sense teacher and teach, being common. The expression may be taken to denote, in a general way, one who falsely pretends to have a Divine commission.

— ἐν ἐνδύμασι προβάτων.] 'Εν, like the Heb. ב and the Latin in, and our in, is often used with verbs of clothing, to denote the material of which the clothing is formed. 'Ενδύμασι προβάτων has an allusion to the μιλωτή (sheep-skin, or sometimes a cloak made of the fleece roughly worked up) with which the false prophets clothed themselves, in imitation of the true ones; and also, as it seems, the false teachers among the Pharisees.

16. καρπῶν.] Meaning 'manners and actions.' A frequent figure. See Matt. iii. 8. I would compare Thucyd. v. 26. τοῖς γὰρ ἔργοις ἀρρήσαι καὶ εὐρήσαι. In μήτι συλλέγουσιν, &c. there is a sort of adagial illustration, found also in Theogn. Admon. 537.

— τριβόλων.] A low thorny shrub (the tribulus terrestris of Linneus), so called from its resemblance to the tribulus militaris, or caltrop, composed of three or more radiating spikes on prongs, thrown upon the ground to annoy cavalry. See Polyb. L. 392. Veget. 3. 24.

17. τὸ δὲ σαπρὸν, &c.] The word denotes primarily what is decayed and rotten; but 2dly, by metonymy, what is refuse and worthless (as old vessels, and small fishes), also, when applied to trees or fruit, what is of a bad quality. The passages adduced by Wets. will illustrate all these senses. Καρπὸν ποιεῖν is not a mere Hellenistic phrase, but is found in the Classical writers, especially Aristotle.

19. Some Critics are of opinion that this verse is introduced, by interpolation, from Matt. iii. 10. The objection, however, that it impedes the course of reasoning, will be lessened, if we consider it as an awful admonition incidentally thrown in, quasi hypoparenthetica.

21. ἄραγε.] Itaque, ergo. The Particle is here conclusiva, as in Matt. xvii. 26. xi. 18. The ἄρα is illative, and the γὰρ limitative. See Herm. on Viger, p. 821, 825.

21. οὐ πᾶς.] Many Commentators, closely connect the οὐ with πᾶς, and interpret no one. But there seems no sufficient reason to abandon the construction and sense usually adopted, by which the οὐ is connected with the verb, as a negative marking distinction; q. d. 'Not all who with the lips acknowledge me as their Lord, will be admitted to the blessings which I come to bestow; but those [only] who likewise perform what my Father enjoins.' This too is confirmed by a similar passage, Rom. ix. 6. οὐ γὰρ πάντες οἱ ἐξ Ἰσραὴλ, οὗτοι Ἴ.

— Κύριε, Κύριε.] The repetition here is emphatic; since the ancients were accustomed to use this repetition on occasions when they especially sought Divine aid. See Hesych. on the Article Θεός, Θεός. [Comp. Luke 6. 46.]

22. ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ] i. e. the day implied in the foregoing words; namely, at the period when there will be a final admission or rejection of all persons. Comp. Mark xiii. 32. 2 Thess. i. 10. In some other passages, however, as Luke x. 12, and especially 2 Tim. i. 12. iv. 8, the pronoun may be understood as referring to some day well known; that expression being, as appears from the Rabbinical writers, used emphatically of the day of judgment.

— τῷ σῷ ὀνόματι] 'by thy power and authority.' See Luke ix. 49.

— προεφητεύσαμεν] 'have taught and preached the Gospel;' not, however, excluding the ordinary sense propheesied; for there is reason to think, that miracles were permitted by God to be worked by men whose lives were at variance with the precepts of the Gospel.

23. ὁμολογήσω αὐτοῖς.] 'I will tell them openly and plainly.' A signification of which examples are adduced from Ælian, Var. Hist. ii. 4. Herodot. iii. 6. and other writers.

— οὐδέποτε ἔγνων ὑμᾶς] i. e. 'I never recognized you as my servants, or approved you.' So 2 Tim. ii. 19, ἔγνω Κύριος τοὺς ὄντας αὐτοῦ. This is considered a Hebraism; γν having the sense approve. But some examples are adduced by Wets. from Greek writers; not, however, quite to the point. Far more apposite is one from Iasus adduced by me in Recens. Synop. Σὺ δὲ τίς εἶ; σοὶ δὲ τί προσῆκει εὐπτεῖν; οὐ γινώσκω σε (I do not recognise you), οὐ μὴ εἰσῆς τὴν οἰκίαν.

— ἐργαζόμενοι τὴν ἀνομίαν.] The purity of the Greek is established by a passage of Themist. adduced in Recens. Synop. i. e. οἱ ἐργαζόμενοι ἀρετὴν. 'Eργα is a far stronger term than ποιεῖν, and signifies to do any thing studiously and habitually, to make a trade of it. The Art. hero has an intensive force; q. d. all kinds of iniquity. See Middleton, Gr. A. v. § 2.

24. Our Lord now closes his discourse, which contains the great outlines of human duty, by a most apt and forcible comparison.

— πᾶς οὖν, &c.] This is regarded as a Hebrew construction for πάντα οὖν ἀκούοντα—ὁμοιώσω ἀνδρὶ. But it may be better called a popular construction, and a relique of primitive simplicity of diction. Thus it is found in Herodotus, and all unstudied writers and speakers, in every language. The same may be said of τοῖσι αὐτοῖς, scil. λόγοις, which is a popular phrase, to denote 'performeth my precepts.' Ὁμοιώσω is for ὁμοιωθήσεται; i. e. 'I will, or may, compare him.' Φρονίμῳ, prudent, provident; as in Xen. (Econ. xi. 8. cited by Wets.

— ἐπὶ τὴν πέτραν.] On the force of the Art. here and at ἐπὶ τὴν ἀμμον, see Bp. Middleton in loc.

25. ἡ βροχὴ.] This denotes, like the Heb. טֶהוֹם, a heavy gush of rain, and the Art. is used, as commonly with the great objects of nature, both in Greek and English. Ποταμοί, floods, or torrents. So γαίμαρροι ποταμοὶ in Homer.

26, 27. Many similar sentiments (especially one of Rabbi Eliaha), are adduced by Wets. from the Rabbinical writers.

28. καὶ ἐγένετο ὅτι.] Like the Hebr. וַיְהִי. — τῇ διδαχῇ.] The word may denote either the doctrine taught, or the manner of teaching. The latter is probably meant. See Greaswell on the Parables, vol. i. introd.

29. ἦν διδάσκων.] Not for ἰδίδασκε, as the Commentators say. Rather, 'he had been teaching.'

— ὡς ἐξουσίαν ἔχων] scil. τοῦ διδάσκειν, 'as one having authority to teach,' i. e. self-derived power; not as the Scribes, who rested only on that of their Doctors; as one not the interpreter, but the maker of the law; and accordingly using the authoritative expression ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω. Luke iv. 36, has ἐν ἐξουσίᾳ, as applied to his λόγος, or manner of speaking; an expression standing for ἐξουσιαστικός. Several illustrations of the phrases have been adduced by Wets. and others.

VIII. 1. δέ.] The particle has here the transitive sense, and αὐτῷ is redundant, populariter.

2. προσεκύνει.] 'Not,' says Whitby, 'as denoting an acknowledgment of the Divinity of our Lord; for the term was one expressive of civil adoration, and only paid to him as the Messiah, or a prophet sent from God.'

— ἐὰν θέλῃς, δύνασαι.] This appears from the examples in Wets. to have been a form of earnest and respectful address, much used by those who sought for relief, especially from physicians. Thus both expressions may be considered highly emphatical.

— καθαρίσαι.] A word used peculiarly of healing leprosy, and which has reference to the legal impurity supposed to be incurred by the disease, which could only be removed by the cure of the disorder.

3. ἐκτείνας τὴν χεῖρα.] There is here neither pleonasm nor Hebraism, as is commonly supposed. Nor is the expression, as others think, devoid of force; though it may be regarded as a relic of the circumstantiality of ancient diction.

— ἥψατο αὐτοῦ.] This was done, Wets. says, more mediocrum. And he adduces many examples of a similar use of the word. But our Lord seems to have touched the leper, both to inspire him with confidence (as conceiving that unless with the power as well as will to heal him, he would have incurred pollution, and possibly infection), and also to make the bystanders see plainly that the cure was effected by his touch. Our Lord, too, in most cases, condescended to accompany his words by corresponding actions, as the Prophets had done before him. See 2 Kings v. 11. and Note on Matt. ix. 18. As to the violation of the law hereby involved, it must be remembered that works performed by Divine virtue were exempted from the ritual precepts.

4. μηδεὶ εἶπῃς.] An injunction doubtless only meant to extend to the period when he had presented himself to the Priests, for examination. Considering the great multitude of bystanders, it was impossible to prevent the transaction from being made public; so that the object of the injunction must have been, to keep the officiating priest ignorant of the transaction, that he might not maliciously deny the leper to be perfectly clean; which would disappoint the benevolent object of the miracle. It has been supposed (not without reason), that this transaction is placed here by the Evangelist (for certain reasons) out of its proper chronological order.

— εἰς μαρτύριον αὐτοῖς.] It has been debated whether αὐτοῖς has reference to the priest, i. e. the priests (ἱερεῖς being taken distributively), or to the people. Though there is some harshness in the latter mode (since the antecedent does not exist in the preceding context); yet propriety requires it; for the offering could be no testimony to the priests. It may, however, be understood of both.

5. προσῆλθεν αὐτῷ ἑκατόνταρχος.] The best

6 ἑκατόνταρχος, παρακαλῶν αὐτὸν καὶ λέγων· Κύριε, ὁ παῖς μου βέβληται ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ παραλυτικός, δεινῶς βασανιζόμενος. 7 Καὶ λέγει αὐτῷ ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Ἐγὼ ἔλθων θεραπεύσω αὐτόν. 8· Καὶ ἀποκριθεὶς ὁ ἑκατόνταρχος ἔφη· Κύριε, οὐκ εἰμι ἰκανὸς ^{ο Luke 7. 6, 7.} ἵνα μου ὑπὸ τὴν στέγην εἰσελθῇ· ἀλλὰ μόνον ἐπὶ * λόγῳ, 9 καὶ ἰαθήσεται ὁ παῖς μου. Ἐπεὶ γὰρ ἐγὼ ἄνθρωπός εἰμι ὑπὸ ἡ ἐξουσίαν, ἔχων ὑπ' ἐμαυτὸν στρατιώτας· καὶ λέγω τούτῳ· Πορεύθητι, καὶ πορεύεται· καὶ ἄλλῳ· Ἐρχου, καὶ ἔρχεται· 10 καὶ τῷ δούλῳ μου· Ποίησον τοῦτο, καὶ ποιεῖ. Ἐκείνῳ δὲ ^{ε Luke 7. 9.} ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἐθαύμασε, καὶ εἶπε τοῖς ἀκολουθοῦσιν· Ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν· οὐδὲ ἐν τῷ Ἰσραὴλ τοσαύτην πίστιν εὑρον. Ἦ λέγω δὲ ^{δ Luke 18. 26. & 12. 37.} ὑμῖν, ὅτι πολλοὶ ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν καὶ δυσμῶν ἔξουσιν, καὶ ἀνακλιθήσονται μετὰ Ἀβραάμ καὶ Ἰσαὰκ καὶ Ἰακώβ ἐν τῇ

Commentators are agreed that, from the striking similarity of circumstances between this transaction and that recorded at Luke vii. 1—10, they must be the same. The points of difference are very reconcilable; waits being, both in the Classical and Hellenistic Greek, often used for δούλος, servant; like puer in Latin, and used because such services as are performed by our footmen, or valets, was originally rendered by boys. Hence the name was afterwards retained, when a change was made in the person. And as to the Centurion here being said to solicit for himself what in Luke he intreats through the medium of his friends,—it may be observed, that the Jews, and in some measure the Greeks and Romans, were accustomed to represent what was done by any one for another, as done by the person himself. See Mark x. 3, compared with Matt. xx. 20. And though Matthew does not (as does Luke) tell us that he was a proselyte, yet he says nothing to the contrary. See Grot., Lightf., Kuin., and Fritz.

6. βίβληται.] A term appropriate to sick persons confined to their couch. Whether it be rendered decumbit, with Kuin., or lecto affixus est, with Fritz., the sense is the same.

— βασιαν(έμερος.) It is debated whether this should be rendered tortured, or afflicted. For palsies, whether attended with contraction, or remission of the nerves, do not, medical writers say, occasion any great pain. Yet it has been proved that, in one stage of the disorder, the patient suffers great agony; as also when it passes into apoplexy. The word is rarely found beyond the Scriptural writers, except in Josephus and Philo.

8. καὶ αὐτοὶ] for ἀλλοι, used at John i. 27. Luke xv. 19. Comp. Matt. iii. 11. The full force of the expression will depend upon whether the Centurion was a proselyte, or a heathen. It is not, however, necessary to refine so much as may have here done. We may regard the words as constituting a formula expressive of profound humility. Μου ὑπὸ τῆς ἐπίτης, for ὑπὸ τῆς ἐτίγης μου, as in the parallel passage of Luke.

— ἀδφ.] On this reading and ἀντ, at v. 5, for τῷ ἱεροῦ, all the Editors from Mill are, with reason, agreed. The two readings are found in the best and greater part of the MSS., Versions, Fathers, and the earliest Editions. As to the vulg. τὸν λόγον and τῷ Ἰησοῦ, they were introduced on slender authority by Erasmus. The τῷ Ἰ. is evidently from the margin; and τὸν λόγον arose partly from a confusion of the ν and ι adscript; and partly from an ignorance of the phrase ἰστέον λόγος, which is like the Latin verbo dicere, and our say at a word; here, give order by a word. Finally ἰστέον λόγος occurs in the parallel passage of Luko.

9. ἀνταρτοῦς εἰμι ὡς [ἐξουσίαν.] Sub. τα-σάμενος, which is expressed at Luke vii. 8, and Diod. Sic. cited by Munthe. So of ὑποτασσάμενοι for soldiers, Pol. iii. 13, 8. The sense is not what some Commentators maintain, 'I am a man holding authority;' (for that would require ἐν [ἐξουσίαν] but (as the parallel passage of Luko requires) 'I am a man placed under authority,' viz.
the authority of my superior officer: there being an argument a minori ad majus; q. d. 'I who hold but a subordinate office, can order my soldiers and servants, who obey at a word; much more canst thou, who hast supernatural power, cure disorders at thy simple fiat.' The words following are almost graphical.

10. ἐν τῷ Ἰσραὴλ] i. e. the people of Israel, as often in Scripture. There is no reason to suppose, with some, an ellipsis of λαῶ or οἶκω.

— πίστις, uia.] The word here denotes faith in its general sense; namely, a firm reliance on the power of Jesus to work the miracle in question; a persuasion supposed to have originated in the cure of the nobleman's son, at Cana, only a day's journey distant.

11. πολλοί.] Namely the Gentiles; for they were such, as compared with the οἱ οὗτοι βασιλείας, the Jews. It is meant that the centurion's faith would not be a solitary case; but that very many heathens, would, in like manner, have faith, and be converted.

— ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν καὶ δυσμῶν.] Luke adds ἀπὸ Βορρᾶ καὶ Νότου. The expression (denoting 'from all parts of the world') is frequent both in the Scriptural and Classical writers.

— ἡδοναῖσθαι.] A convivial term (like ἡδοναῖσθαι, κατακλιθεῖσθαι, and others), adapted to the Oriental custom of reclining, not sitting, at table; on which see Horne's Introd. Both the Scriptural, Rabbinical, and Classical writers (adapting their language to the ordinary conceptions of men) represent the joys and glories of heaven under the image of a banquet; and consequently with imagery suited thereto. [Comp. Luke xiii. 28, 29. Mal. i. 11.]

12. υἱοὶ τῆς βασιλείας.] Scil. τοῦ Θεοῦ, i. e. the Israelites, for whom the happiness of that kingdom was especially destined; and who had arrogated to themselves a place there, to the exclusion of other nations. Kuin. remarks that υἱός like the Heb. בן, is used to denote a person holding some kind of property in the thing signified by the noun following in the Genit., with which it is joined; as Luke x. 6. υἱὸς τῆς εἰρήνης. See also John xvii. 12. ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀπαλείας.

— σκότος τὸ ἐξώτερον.] Compar. for superl. The expression denotes darkness the most remote from the light, and is employed in opposition to the brilliant lights, which are figuratively supposed to be burning in the banqueting room. Some, however, think that there is an allusion to the dark and squalid subterranean dungeons, into which the worst malefactors were thrust. This I can confirm from Joseph. Bell. iii. 8, 5, where, speaking of suicides, he says, τούτων μὲν ἄδης δέχεται τὰς ψυχὰς σκοτιώτερος. See also Dion. Hal. Antiq. viii. p. 522, sub fin. But thus we should have rather had μυχιαίτερον.

— ἐκεῖ ἔσται—ὀδόντων.] The force of the Art. is expressed by Middleton thus: 'there shall they weep and gnash their teeth;' the Art. having reference to the persons just mentioned; or it may, as Robinson says, express 'common notoriety, well known as belonging to the place.' Ὀδόντων is not, as some say, pleonastic; though the word is sometimes omitted in this phrase. Wets. compares Juv. Sat. v. 157. To which add Soph. Trach. 1074. βιβρόχα κλαίων. [Comp. infr. xxi. 43. xiii. 42, 50. xxii. 13. xxiv. 51. xxv. 30. Luke xiii. 28.]

13. ἑκατοντάρχῃ.] In this reading, Wets., Matth., Griesb., Vater, and Fritz. agree, for the common ἑκατοντάρχῃ; and with reason, since it is supported by the greater number of MSS., and is more agreeable to laler Grecism.

— ἐν τῇ ὥρᾳ ἐκείνῃ] 'at that very instant;' for ὥρα sometimes signifies, as the Chaldee and Syr. תּוּרָא and Hebr. שָׁרָא not hour, but time, and sometimes, like καιρὸς, a point of time.

14. ἐλθὼν] i. e. as we learn from Matthew and Luke, immediately after leaving the synagogue at Capernaum, where he began his public teaching. [Comp. Mark i. 29, 30; Luke iv. 38.]

— βεβλημένην καὶ πυρέσσουσαν.] Per hendiad, q. d. 'laid up of a fever.' Luke: συναχομένη πυρετῷ μεγάλῳ.

15. ἤψατο.] This was done, Wets. says, more medicorum; and he adduces examples from the Classical writers. But see note supra, v. 3. Ἀφίημι is a usual term to denote the departure of a disorder. See Fesii (Econ. Hippocr. The miracle here recorded did not, as in some other cases, consist in the cure of an incurable disorder, but in the mode of cure, instantly and by a touch.

— διηκόνει] waited, or attended upon him. Camp. 'entertained him.' Others, 'waited upon him at table.' It seems, better, however, to preserve the general sense; which is required by the context. This διακονία is evidently recorded as a proof of the completeness of the cure. See note supra, iv. 11.

— αὐτῷ.] On this reading, for the common one αὐτοῖς, almost all the Editors are agreed. It has every support from MSS., Versions, and Fathers, and early Edd., and is received by Scholz.—Griesb. and Fritz, indeed, retain, and the latter defends αὐτοῖς, but not satisfactorily.

16. ὀψίας.] The Hebrews reckoned two ὀψίας, the early, from the ninth hour to our six o'clock, or sunset, and the late, from sunset to nightfall. From Mark i. 32, it appears that the later one is here meant; namely, after sunset. Thus the sabbath (for we find from Mark i. 21, that it was a sabbath day) had ended when the sick were brought; and hence they brought them without scruple. [Comp. Luke iv. 40.]

— λόγῳ.] 'by a word.' Fritz. renders 'solâ imperii vi.' So the Latin verbo.

17. αὐτοῖς—ἐβάστασεν.] The words are from Isa. liii. 4, where are described the sufferings of Christ for the sins of the world. And they are supposed, by some Commentators, to be applied by way of accommodation. Yet, since the Jews considered dangerous diseases as the temporal punishment of sin, and as our Lord often addressed those whom he healed, with 'thy sins be forgiven thee,' it may be granted that the prophecy had a double fulfilment; first, in the removal of corporal maladies, and secondly in the remission of our sins, by the sacrifice on the cross. See 1 Pet. ii. 24. The verbal variation here between St. Matthew and the Sept. is ably reconciled by Abp. Magee on the Atonement, vol. i. p. 415. seqq., who refers ἀσθενίας and the corresponding Hebrew word בִּדְּחִי to bodily maladies (a signification not unfrequent in the Classics, ex. gr. Thucyd. ii. 49.); νόσους and πῶστος to diseases of the mind; the former clause signifying Christ's removing the sicknesses of men by miraculous cures, the latter, his bearing their sins on the cross. The Unitarian perversion of the passage, whereby it is made to relate to the removal of diseases only, without any reference to a propitiatory sacrifice, is completely refuted by the learned Prelate above mentioned. 'It is not surprising (he observes) that so distinguishing a character of the Messiah, as that of his healing all manner of diseases with a word (a character, too, which Isaiah himself has depicted so strongly at ch. xxxv. 5, that our Lord (Matt. xi. 5.) quotes the words in proof of his Messiahship), should be introduced by the Prophet in a passage, where his main object was to represent the plan of our redemption by means of Christ's sufferings; especially as the Jews so connected the ideas of sin and disease, that an allusion to one must suggest the other.'

At ἔλαβε (ἔλαβ) sub. ἑφ' ἑαυτῷ; or take ἔλαβε for ἀνέλαβε. This use of the word is frequent in the Sept. As to ἰβάσ., it cannot (as corresponding to the Heb. בָּשׂ) denote cured, without great harshness. And moreover, the interpretation in question passes over the important word αὐτός, himself. I would not, indeed, deny that βαρύνω might signify to remove or cure (a disorder) (for a passage of Galen cited by Weta., and another of Diog. Laert. iv. 59., seem to prove this); but I see not how it can, in the passage of the Prophet, be so taken: while the language of the Evangelist may be taken in the manner above mentioned.

18. ἰδὼν—ἐκέλευσεν κ. τ. λ.] Not so much as being incommoded by the number of applicants for cure; but rather because our Lord systematically avoided keeping a multitude long together, to prevent any suspicion of encouraging ostension. On αἰς τὸ πέραν see my Note on Thucyd. i. 111.

19. αἰς for τῆς.] A use thought by some to be Hebraistic; but it occurs in several of the later Greek writers. [Comp. Luke ix. 57.]

20. αἱ ἀλώπεκες—κλίνῃ.] This was meant to warn him of the difficulties he would have to encounter in following so destitute a master; and may lead us to suppose that the scribe was desirous of becoming Christ's disciple, from interested motives only. Φωλεοὺς denotes dens, or lair, and κατασκηνώσκει, not nests, (which would be νοσσαι) but simply places of shelter, roosts, such as those where birds settle and perch. So σκηνίω or σκηνύω is sometimes used of a place for soldiers to quarter in; as Thucyd. i. 90. ἐν αἰς (scil. οἰκίαις) ἐσκήνησαν οἱ δυνατοί.

—ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου.] This title, taken from Dan. vii. 13, where everlasting dominion is ascribed to the Messiah under that designation, and now first assumed by Christ, occurs 61 times in the Gospels, and is always used by Christ himself, never by any other person. See John v. 27. iii. 13. vi. 62. It occurs once in The Acts, (vii. 56.) (employed by the martyr Stephen); and occurs in the Revelations. On the origin and nature of the appellation there are various opinions, which see detailed in Recens. Synop. One thing is clear, that from the corresponding term ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, this title belongs to Christ κατ' ἔξοχον; and that both taken together decidedly prove that Christ, in some manner unknown to us, united in his person both the human and the divine nature, 'was very man and very God'; thus negating the opposite tenets of Socinians and of Gnostics. On this title it is well remarked by Bp. Middl. (on John v. 27.) that in a variety of places in which our Saviour calls himself the Son of man, the allusion is either to his present humiliation, or to his future glory. 'Now if (continues he) this remark be true, we have, though an indirect, yet a strong and perpetual declaration, that the human nature did not originally belong to him, and was not properly his own; consequently we may consider this simple phrase so employed, as an irrefragable proof of the Pre-existence and Divinity of Christ.' 'If, indeed,' as Mr. Coleridge observes, 'Christ had been a mere man, why should he have called himself "the Son of Man?" But being God and man, it then became, in his own assertion of it, a peculiar and mysterious title.'

—οὐκ ἔχει—κλίνῃ.] A proverbial expression, to denote being destitute of any fixed place of residence, of which sense see examples adduced in Horne's Introd. p. 409, seq. and Wetstein in loc.

21. ἔτρεψέ for ἔλλας, i. e. either one of the twelve, or of the disciples in general; said by tradition to be Philip. His father was, if not dead, probably at the point of death.

—ἐπιτρέψον κ. τ. λ.] A request (implying that he had been called by our Lord) in itself reasonable. Thus Elijah permitted Elisha to go and bid adieu to his parents: and it was regarded as the bounden duty of children to take care of the funerals of their parents; Christ, however, was pleased to refuse the request, for reasons unknown to us, and which doubtless arose from circumstances peculiar to the case. 'Ἀκολουθεῖ μοι. Equivalent to 'become my disciple.'

22. ἄφες—νεκρούς.] Probably a proverbial sentence, turning on the double sense of νεκρούς; which may mean not only the naturally, but the spiritually dead; i. e. insensible to the concerns of the soul or eternity, dead in trespasses and sins. A metaphor familiar to the Jews, and not unknown to the Greeks. Τοὺς ἑαυτῶν νεκροὺς is well explained by Euthym. τοὺς προσήκοντας αὐτοῖς νεκρούς. So Thucyd. ii. 34. καὶ ἐπιφέρει τῷ ἑαυτοῦ νεκρῷ (sub. σώματι) ἕκαστος ἦν τι βούλεται. Thus the words may be paraphrased: 'Let no lesser duty stand in the way of this great and principal one, which is to follow me.'

23. τὸ πλοῖον.] Not 'a ship,' but 'the vessel' or skiff, provided to cross to the other side. See v. 18. [Comp. Mark iv. 35; Luke viii. 52.]

24. σεισμός.] The word properly denotes terra motus; but sometimes, as here, stands for maris commotio, λαίλαψ, (a hurricane), the term used by Mark and Luke, and one highly suitable; the lake being (as travellers testify) very subject to these sudden hurricanes; as, indeed, are all lakes bounded by high mountain ranges.

—καλύπτεσθαι] ferè submergi. Mark, γεμίσσθαι. Both terms to be taken with due qualification. Luke expresses it by συνεπληροῦντο.

25. αὐτοῦ.] This is not found in most of the best MSS., some Versions and early Edit., and Theophylact, and is cancelled by Mill, Weta., Griesb., Vat., and Scholz,—rightly, for, besides the preponderance of external testimony, internal evidence is against it; since we can far better account for its addition than omission. It is not needed, because the article carries with it the sense of the pronoun possessive.

—ἀπολλύμεθα.] Mark, οὐ μίλει σοι ὅτι ἀπολλύμεθα;

26. ὀλιγόπιστοι.] viz. by not confiding in Christ's power to save, as well asleep as awake.

—ἐπετίμησε—θαλάσῃ.] A highly figurative expression, signifying 'he restrained its fury,' as Luke iv. 39. ἐν τῷ πυρετῷ. So Ps. cvi. 9. ἐπετίμησε τῇ ἰρῆνῃ θαλάσῃ. lxxxix. 9. civ. 7. 2 Macc. ix. 8. ὁ δὲ ἄρτι δοκῶν τοῖς τῆς θαλάσσης κύμασιν ἐπιτάσσων. The suddenness of the perfect calm is a proof of the reality of the miracle; for after a storm, the sea is never perfectly smooth, until some time has elapsed.

27. ποταπός.] 'Qualis quantusque sit.' The men might well regard our Lord as super-human; since to 'still the raging of the sea,' was always reckoned among the operations of God, inasmuch that in Ps. lxxv. 7, it forms as it were a designation of the Deity.

28. We are now arrived at the wonderful transaction of the Gadarene demoniac (or demoniacs). On the nature and design of which illustrious miracle, see Horne's Intro. vol. i. 227; and on the moral application of the whole, see Jones of Nayland's Sermon on the Gadarene Demoniac, or a brief summary of its contents in Townsend, i. 232.

Instead of two demoniacs, Mark and Luke only mention one. Yet that by no means denies the existence of two. They probably mention but one, because of his superior fierceness.

—Γαδαρηνῶν.] The reading has here been thought doubtful; the MSS. fluctuating between Γεργεσηνῶν, Γαδαρηνῶν, and Γερασσηνῶν. The weight of authority, as far as regards number of MSS., is in favour of the first-mentioned, which is the common reading; but those MSS. are chiefly of an inferior kind, and of one class; while Γαδαρηνῶν is supported by a not inconsiderable number of MSS., of great antiquity and different recensions, by the Pesh., Syr., and Persic Versions, and some Fathers; as Euseb., Epiphani., and Chrysostom. As to Γερασσηνῶν, it is supported almost solely by the Vulg. and a few inferior Versions. Now if external evidence were alone to be considered, we must prefer Γεργ. But internal evidence is also to be taken into the account; and that, as we shall see, is strongly in favour of Γαδ. And when some seek to reconcile the discrepancy between St. Matthew and the other Evangelists, who have Γαδαρ., by maintaining that Gergesa was in the immediate vicinity of Gadara, so that the limits belonging to one city were so included within the limits of the other, that one Evangelist might say 'the country of the Gadarenes,' and another, 'the country of the Gergesenes,' with equal truth; that is but taking for granted what ought to be proved. Upon the whole, there is reason to think that the reading Γεργ. originated merely in the conjecture of Origen (as is plain from his own words, T. iv.

p. 140.) He rejected the reading Gadara, because, he says, 'there were no cliffs nor sea at Gadara.' But he forgot that the Evangelists are speaking not of the city, but of the territory, which, as we shall see, extended down to the sea of Galilee. But the site is not, as the maps place it, at Oomkeis; and that for two reasons. 1. Because that is contrary to what Pliny affirms, who says (L. v. 16.) that it was situated 'præfluente Hieromace.' And 2. Because it runs counter to the testimony of the ruins of the city, which bear the representation of a trireme with rowers; which shows, that it must have been in the immediate vicinity of the sea of Galilee, and that its territory must have reached to it. Besides, the hot-baths which Origen and others attest were in the vicinity of Gadara, are found, not on the left, but on the right bank of the Hieromax: for the baths in question undoubtedly correspond to those now called Hammel el Sheik, plainly the ancient ῥωτή, Ἀμμαθα, or Αμαθία. In fact, the true situation of Gadara is very nearly pointed out in a passage of Eusebius, in his Onomasticum, v. Γάδαρα. His words are: Πόλις ὑπὲρ τὸν Ἰορδάνην, ἀντικρὺ Σκυ-ζουσίμω καὶ Τιβεριάδω πρὸς ἀνατολάς, ἐν τῇ ὁρί, οὐ πρὸς ὑπουργίας (I would read ὑπουργίας, for the common reading makes nonsense) τὰ τῶν Σιρμῶν ὑδάτων παράκειται. Now the mountain at whose foot are the hot-baths, is Hippus. And as the situation of Amathia must correspond to Hammel el Sheik, we may approximate to that of Gadara. It was, I conceive, near the termination of Hippus, where it runs out into a sort of promontory. The exact situation, however, may pretty exactly be determined from a passage of the Itinerary of Antoninus the Martyr, cited in Reland's Palastine.

It appears that the true situation of Gadara is at about two miles from the Hot-baths, from whence to the Lake of Genezareth are three miles; which agrees with what Josephus says of the distance.

But to return, it seems quite clear that the reading Gery, either arose from the conjecture of Jerome, or, if he adopted it from others, was derived from those who saw that Γεργασσινών was inadmissible, (because Gerasa was situated in quite another part of the country,) and therefore might, with no slight probability, conjecture Gery. For I mean not to deny (as does Fritz.) that there ever was such a city as Gergessa; or that it was situated on the E. coast of the lake. There is no proof that Origen speaks from report only (as Fritz. takes for granted); nay, his words seem to show that he speaks from his own knowledge. Yet, though he mentions it as πόλις ἀρχαία, we are not, I think, authorised to conclude that it was then in being; but only to understand by it the ruins of that city. The question, however, is, at what part of the E. coast was Gergessa situated? I apprehend, we may nearly fix its site. Epiphanius adv. Hær. lib. i. p. 131, relates, that in the neighbourhood of Gadara there were 'caves cut out of the rocks, burying-grounds, and tombs.' Now it is plain that these were the reliques of some ancient and very considerable city; and what could it be but Gergessa, which I suspect was a little to the N. N. E. of Gadara, and itself situated on the brow of the mountain? Thus, though Gadara and Gergessa were near to each other, yet the cliff over which the swine rushed was, it seems, nearer to the latter than the former. This is plain from the words of Origen, which show that it was probably opposite to Old Gergessa; and from what he says, it appears that the site of the miracle was then pointed out by the people of the country. That, however, was no reason why St. Matthew should have written Gery; for the Gergashites had long ceased to exist. And, therefore, that could not, as some Commentators have imagined, be the general name of the country in which Gadara was situated. In short, the city of Gergessa had been destroyed as long ago as the war of the Israelites with the inhabitants, (so Josephus, i. 6, 2, says: 'the cities of the Gergashites were destroyed,' &c.,) who, the Rabbins tell us, went in a body to Africa; permission, by proclamation, being made by Joshua that they should go whither they would. From that time we hear no more of the Gergashites. And, as the inhabitants were removed from the country, it must have soon ceased to bear their name; and at the time of Christ, (as we learn from Josephus in Vita, 69,) Gadara, which was the capital of Peræa, and, I suspect, had arisen out of the ruins of Gergessa, had a pretty considerable district, including several towns or villages, (doubtless amongst these, the ruined Gergessa and its vicinity); and, consequently, its inhabitants would not be called Gergessenes, but Gadarenes. I have, therefore, with Fritz. and Scholz, edited Γαδαρανών. See Note on Mark v. 3.

— χαλεποὶ.] The word signifies primarily hard, harsh, or rough, as applied to things; and thence is used figuratively to mean harsh and cruel, as said of men, and savage or fierce, as said of brutes or brutish men.

— διὰ τῆς ὁδοῦ ἐκείνης.] Namely, the road which passed by the tombs; for, as the burial-yards were always outside of the cities, so it sometimes happened that the roads leading to the city passed by the side of, and sometimes through them.

29. τί ἡμῖν καὶ σοὶ.] An idiom frequent both in Hellenistic and Classical Greek, (of which see examples in Wets. and Matth. Gr. Gr. § 385. 10.) in which there is an ellipsis either of κοινόν (expressed by Ach. Tat. and Leon. Tar. ap. Wets.) or πρᾶγμα, supplied in passages of Demosth. and Nichomachus cited in Recens. Syn. The sense of the phrase varies with the context; but it usually implies troublesome or unauthorised interference. Here it seems to be, 'what hast thou to do with us, what authority hast thou over us?' Ἰησοῦ before Υἱὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ is omitted in some MSS., and cancelled by Griesb.; but rashly: for, as Matth. suggests, 'sigla Ἰησοῦ ante Υἱὰ facile negligebatur.'

— πρὸ καιροῦ] 'before the appointed time,' i. e. the day of judgment, against which evil spirits 'are reserved to be chained in torments in the pit of destruction.' See 2 Pet. ii. 4. Jude 6.

30. μακράν] 'at some distance'; for μακρός, like all such words, is only a comparative term. Or we may here and at Luke xviii. 13. μακρόθεν, and some other passages (including examples of the Latin procul, adduced by Wets., Munthe, &c.), suppose the word to mean off, opposite to, implying a short distance. See Rose on Parkh. in v. μακρός. And though Luke here has ἐκεῖ, yet that must be understood to mean, as Mark expresses it, ἐκεῖ πρὸς τὰ ὄρη; or rather ἐν τῷ ὄρει, which follows in Luke, must be construed with ἐκεῖ. Now the mountain in question (Hermion) was some distance off; and thus in fact there is no discrepancy.

31. ἐπίτρεψον ἡμῖν.] Griesb. edits. from four MSS. and some Versions, ἀπόστειλον ἡμᾶς. But his reasons are, though specious, not to be balanced against the overpowering external evidence for the common reading.

32. κατὰ τοῦ κρημονοῦ] 'down the precipice.' This sense of κατὰ is frequent in the best Classical writers, examples from whom are adduced by Wets., Munthe, &c. The readings ἀπόστειλον ἡμᾶς ἀπελθεῖν for ἐπίτρεψον ἢ ἀπ. and τοὺς χοίρους for τὴν ἀγέλην are received into the text by Griesb., but wrongly: for external evidence is almost entirely against them, and internal by no means in their favour. See Fritz.

34. ἐξῆλθεν εἰς συνάντ. τῷ Ἰ.] An expression formed on several that occur in the Sept.; as Gen. xiv. 17. Num. xxxi. 13. Deut. i. 44, from the Hebr. phrase נִפְגַּעַתָּ בְּפָנָיו.

IX. 1. τὸ πλοῖον] i.e. either the vessel which had brought them over, or the ferry boat.

— ἰδίαν πόλιν.] So εἰς τὴν πόλιν αὐτοῦ in 1 Sam. viii. 22. This expression denoted not only the place of any one's birth, but residence; and, according to the Jewish laws, a year's residence gave citizenship.

2. καὶ ἰδοὺ, &c.] The place of this transaction, and its remarkable publicity is learned from Mark ii. 1, 2, and Luke v. 17.

— ἰδὼν τὴν πίστιν] as appeared from the trouble which (as we find by Mark ii. 4, and Luke v. 19.) they had taken to bring the man.

— ἀφίωνταί i. e. 'Thy sins are (hereby) forgiven thee'; suitably to the language of the O. T., to regard diseases as the effects of sin.

3. εἶπον ἐν ἑαυτοῖς.] A popular form of expression, like one in our own language, answering to διαλογιζόμενοι ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις in Mark and Luke.

— βλασφημεῖ.] Though in the Classical writers the word almost always denotes, in its proper sense, to calumniate; yet in Scripture it almost invariably has the religious sense, to speak impiously respecting God. The persons in question took for granted (and hence are reproached as ἐνθυμούμενοι πονηρὰ, evilly and unjustly) that Jesus was not sent from God; and hence falsely concluded, that by professing to be a Divine Legate, he was blasphemous and injurious towards God.

4. ἰδὼν] for εἰδὼς, as in Luke vi. 8. and xi. 17. and Philo and Josephus. Luke expresses this by ἐπιγινώσκου τοὺς διαλογισμούς αὐτῶν, and Mark: ἐπιγινώσκου ἐν πνεύματι ὅτι οὕτως διαλογίζονται ἐν ἑαυτοῖς.

— ἰνατί.] 'The origin of the expression (says Fritz.) is to be explained by ellipsis.' The complete phrase, after the Presens tense, is ἵνα τί γίνηται, 'ut quid fiat,' to what end? after the Præterite, ἵνα τί γένοιτο, 'ut quid fieret?'

construction, which has perplexed the Commentators; most of whom are of opinion, that the words τότε λέγει τῷ παραλυτικῷ are parenthetical. It should seem best, however, to consider the words Ἰνα εἰδῆτε—ἀμαρτίας as said per aronioripia. Thus the sense of the whole passage may be expressed, in paraphrase, as follows. 'It were as easy for me to pronounce, Thy sins are forgiven thee, as to say [i. e. with effect], Rise and walk. But, that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, [I have done as I have.] Then, addressing the paralytic, he said, Arise,' &c. If, however, the parenthesis be admitted, still the brachylogia must be supposed. It is well observed by Campb. that, 'although both, and with effect, were equally easy to our Lord, yet in the former case the effect was invisible, and might be questioned by the multitude; whereas the immediate consequence of the latter was an ocular demonstration of the power with which it was accompanied; and to say the one with effect, which effect was visible, was a manifest proof that the other was said also with effect, though the effect was invisible.' Σου for σοι is in most of the best MSS., and the Ed. Princ., and is adopted by almost all the Editors.

—ἄρὸν σου τὴν κλίνην.] Namely, as a proof of his cure. So I. ucan Philop. cited by Elancer, says of a slave called Midas, that after he had been cured of a serpent's bite, he took up his σείμασθα, and went into the country.

7. καὶ ἔγερθεὶς ἀπῆλθεν εἰς τὸν οἶκον α.] Mark adds δοξάζων τὸν Θεόν.

8. θαύμασαν.] Mark and Luke use the strong terms ἐξίστασθαι and ἐκστασις ἐλθὲν ἄπ' αὐτοῦ.

—τοῖς ἀνθρώποις.] This is usually considered as Plur. for Sing.; but, as Grot. and Fritz. remark, the Plural has place in sententia generali. It talk, indeed, under the same head as a passage of Matt. ii. 20.

9. παράγων.] Παράγειν properly signifies to VOL. I.

pass by, or away; and here, to go away, withdraw.

—τὸ τελώνιον.] 'the toll-office;' a sort of booth, in which the collector sat. The word is sometimes written τελωνεῖον, and seems to be properly an adjective, with the ellipse of οἰκημα.

—ἠκολούθησεν αὐτῷ.] He had no hesitation in doing this, as being, doubtless, well acquainted with the character of Jesus. It is generally agreed, from the great similarity of the narrations, that the Mattheu here and the Levi of Mark ii. 14. and Luke v. 29. are names of the same individual, especially as it was usual with the Jews to bear two names. The Evangelist follows the custom of the ancient historians in general; who, on having occasion to speak of themselves, use the third person, to avoid egotism.

10. ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ] 'in his house,' i. e. of Matthew, as appears from Mark ii. 15. and Luke v. 29, if indeed the feast was the same; which, however, Mr. Greswell denies. It is better to suppose the mention of the feast anticipated; for Abp. Newc. has shown, that a period of nearly six months intervened between the call of Matt. and this feast. The καὶ before ἰδοὺ seems harsh; but may be best considered, with Fritz., as used (like the Heb. ו in 1 Sam. xxvii. 1, and 2 Sam. xiii. 1.) in the sense tempore.

—ἁμαρτωλοὶ.] The word here, and generally elsewhere in the Gospels, denotes heathens, or such Jews as associated with them, and were considered on a footing with them. [See infra ii. 19. Luke v. 30. Gal. ii. 15.]

11. διατί—ἐσθίει.] From the passages cited by Wets. and others, it appears that the Heathens as well as the Jews, accounted it a pollution to eat with the impious.

12. οὐ χρεῖαν—ἔχοντες.] This appears, from the Classical citations adduced by Wets., Fritz., and myself in Rec. Syn., to have been a proverbial expression, employed to rebut such like reproaches as the present.

is thus traced by Kuin. 'You Pharisees severely censure me for associating with persons such as tax-gatherers, whom you call sinners. I therefore remind you of the word of God, as found in the Prophet, &c.'

—πορευθέντες.] This need not be considered as redundant, but as put for the verb with καί; q. d. 'Go and apply yourselves to learn.' So the phrase cited by Schoetg. πῶς καὶ ποῦ and learn, as used by Rabbis when they wished to refer their disciples to the Scriptures. τί ἐστιν, i. e. 'what this means.' See Robinson's Lex. in εἰμι 11. C. med. The indefinite mode of citation here employed was, as Surenhus. says, usual with the Rabbis, and, in some measure, with all the ancient writers. See Valckn. on Herodot. iv. 131.

The μή of the Heb., and the καὶ οὐ here, denote, not a simple and absolute, but comparative negation, and may be rendered non tam—quam; an idiom common to both Hebrew and Greek. Passages similar in sentiment are adduced from the Rabbinical writers by Wets. and Scheid., and from the Classical writers by Kypke and Munthe. Θυσία is taken, by synecdoche, for the whole of the ceremonial law. [See infra xii. 7. Hos. vi. 6. Mic. vi. 8. Prov. xxi. 3.]

—οὐ γὰρ ἦλθ. δικαίους.] In other words, 'Not you who, like the Pharisees, fancy yourselves righteous, but you who acknowledge yourselves sinners, and seek a method of expiation.' 'The sick are they who need my aid, and therefore my proper place is with them. If you be so holy as you pretend, you want not my aid. I came to save sinners; my business is with them.' See infra xviii. 11. Luke xix. 10. 1 Tim. i. 1. 15. The words εἰς μετάνοιαν are not found in several MSS., Versions, and Latin Fathers (both here and at Mark ii. 17), are disapproved by Mill, Bengel, and Vater, and are cancelled by Griesb. They are, however, defended by Whitby, Wets., Matth., Fritz., and Scholz; and the MS. authority for them is so strong, that they must be retained. Indeed, as Fritz. observes, they seem quite necessary to the course of argument, and yet cannot well be thought left to be understood.

14. νηστεύομεν.] We are not to understand this of public, but private fasts, upon various extraordinary occasions.

15. Our Lord, in reply, simply adduces three illustrations, all tending to establish the position, that 'we should study fitness and propriety in every thing.' The first derived from a marriage feast.

—μὴ δύνανται—νυμφίος.] A most delicate form of expressing, by conjecture and interrogation, strong negation. Δύνανται is not redundant (as Kuin. and others say), but, by the ellipse of some words (such as here, 'consistently with the nature of a marriage feast,' which Fritz. supplies), may be rendered debet, or decent. [See John iii. 29.]

—οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ νυμφῶνος] i. e. (by a Hebraism whereby πα prefixed denotes distinction or participation) those who were admitted into the bride chamber; namely (the friends of the bridegroom, the παράνυμφοι, προνοῦν), who formed the marriage procession, and were invited to a participation of the seven days' matrimonial feasting.

—πενθεῖν.] Mark and Luke have the more definite term νηστεύειν. In ὁ νυμφίος there is a reference to the title given by the ancient Hebrews to Christ. Νηστεύουσιν, they will, or may fast.

16. Here we have the 2nd illustration. Οὐδεὶς ἐπιβάλλει, &c. 'no one clappeth a patch of undressed cloth,' &c., i. e. rough from the weaver, and which has not yet passed through the hands of the fuller. Thus the expression answers to the καὶνόν of Luke. Ἐπιβλημα is Hellenistic for ἐκτίρμαμα.

—αἶρει γὰρ—γίνεται.] Mark, more fully: αἶρει τὸ πλήρωμα αὐτοῦ τὸ καὶνόν τοῦ παλαιοῦ. Luke gives the general sense more plainly. By this it is meant that the two substances being dissimilar (one rigid and the other supple) will never wear well together, but the rigid will tear away part of the supple. The comparison is popular; and the application suggested by this and the metaphor in the next verse is, the inexpediency of imposing too grievous burthens on them, during their weakness and imperfection, as new converts;—that all things should be suited to circumstances;—and that, as use forms the taste, so men's long accustomed modes are not speedily to be changed, nor can they be suddenly initiated into unwonted austerities.

17. Here we have the 3d illustration. Βάλλουσιν, scil. ἀνδραποῖ. Βάλλειν, for ἐμβ. is used to signify infundere, both in the Scriptural and Classical writers.

—ἀσκούς] flasks made of goat or sheep skins, used in all the ancient nations, and still employed in the Southern parts of Europe. Now these, as they are not so easily distended when they grow old and stiff, so they are more liable to burst by the fermentation of new liquor.

— ἀμφότεροι.] On this reading for the vulg. ἀμφότερα all the Editors are agreed, from Mill to Scholz. It is found in almost all the MSS. and early Edd., as also in the parallel passage of Luke. The vulg. may, indeed, be defended (in the sense 'both things'); but it probably either arose from accident (οι and α being perpetually confounded), or from the alteration of those who wished to remove the harshness connected with ἀμφότεροι.

18. ἀρχων.] Scil. τῆς συναγωγῆς, which is expressed in Luke viii. 41. He is by Mark v. 22. called εἰς τῶν ἀπουναγώγων, and named Jairus. The εἰς for τις, after ἀρχων is found in most of the MSS., the Edit. Princ., and the best of the Versions; and is, with reason, adopted by Wets., Griesb., Matth., Fritz., and Scholz.

— προσεκύνει.] i. e., as Mark and Luke express it, 'fell at his feet.'

— ἄρτι ἐτελεύτησεν] 'is by this time dead,' or 'as it were dead.' This is agreeable to Mark's ἰσχύεται ἔχει, and not irreconcilable with Luke's ἀπέθνησκει, which means, 'is [as it were] dead.'

— ἐκίθη τὴν χεῖρα.] Agreeably to the custom of our Lord, as it had been also of the prophets; who, in praying for the benefit of any person, used to put their hands upon him.' (Grot.) See Num. xxvii. 18. 2 Kings v. 11. Matt. xix. 13. Acts iv. 30.

— ζήσεται.] The interpretation of this word must depend upon the sense assigned to the former ἐτελεύτησεν; but in the popular acception it is susceptible of either the signification to be restored to life, or to continue to live, which must imply recovery from her sickness.

20. αἰμορροοῦσα.] It is not clear whether by this we are to understand a flux from the os sacrum, or the os matricis. The former seems the more probable; (see Dr. Mead cited in Rec. Syn.); but a passage of Levit. xv. 33. seems to favour the latter opinion. One thing is certain, that a flux of blood, of either kind, is the least curable of all distempers.

— τοῦ κρασπέδου.] Not so much the hem, as the tassel (i. e. one of the lower tassels) of the garment (see Num. xv. 37.); which had four corners, called πτερυγία, from each of which was suspended a tassel of threads or strings. To touch either of the two lower ones was regarded as a mark of profound respect. This, however, is not to be regarded as exclusively a Jewish custom; for I have in Recens. Synop. adduced three examples (from Arrian, Athenæus, and Plutarch) of heathens touching or kissing the fringe of a great man's robe as a mark of respect, and to gain his good will and favour. It is still retained in the East. The secrecy and delicacy here employed may be attributed to the nature of the disorder, which was considered unclean.

21. σωθήσεται.] 'I shall be restored to health.' The word is not unfrequent, as used of recovery from a dangerous disorder.

23. τοὺς αὐλητὰς.] The antiquity of the custom of wailing for the dead, and expressing grief by tearing the hair and mangling the flesh, appears from various parts of the O. T.: it was common to both Greeks and Romans, and still continues in some barbarous or half-civilized nations. Besides these offices of relations, other persons were hired to join in the howling, and to sing dirges, accompanied by various wind instruments. See more in Horne's Introd. iii. 517.

— θορυβούμενον.] This would properly mean tumultuans; but the word must here include the sense of lamentation, namely, such tumultuary responses as the præfices would make in concert.

24. οὐκ ἀπέθανε—καθεύδει.] We are not to infer from this that the girl was not dead. For that is contrary to the whole tenor of the narration. The best Commentators are agreed that the sense is, 'she is not so dead as not to return to life' (which was the idea associated with death); and that by καθεύδει is meant, 'is, as it were, asleep.' κεκοίμηται. The dead are often thus spoken of in Scripture as asleep.

— κατεγέλων αὐτοῦ. The αὐτοῦ is governed of the κατα in composition; for the verb has almost always a Genitive.

25. ἐξεβλήθη] 'was dismissed,' or desired to withdraw. This and many such terms in both Hellenistic and Classical writers are not to be strained, but to be understood populariter. Our Lord excluded the people, in order that those whom he wished to be spectators of the miracle (as the parents, and Peter, James, and John, see Mark v. 37—40.) might view what was done without interruption.

— ἐκράτησε τῆς χειρὸς.] Not as a form of raising any one, nor through courtesy, or more medicorum, as many Commentators say; but, as usual, to accompany the miracle with some act, as that of touching. So at v. 29, 'he touched the eyes of the blind man.'

27. υἱὲ Δαυὶδ.] As that was one of the titles then ascribed by the Jews to the Messiah, the use of it was an unequivocal acknowledgment of Jesus's Messiahship. And that use must have been founded upon their reliance on the testimony of others who had seen his miracles.

30. ἀνέψχθησαν αὐτῶν οἱ ὀφθαλμοί] 'they were restored to sight,' or, 'received the faculty of sight.' This is thought to be a Hebraism; but it is rather a popular form of expression. Thus it is found also in the Classical writers.

— ἐνεβριμήσατο] 'strictly enjoined them.' The expression, notwithstanding its etymology, only imports earnestness, not anger. [See viii. 4.]

31. διεφήμισαν αὐτόν.] The verb is rarely used, except of things; when used of persons, it signifies, 'to make any one known or celebrated.'

32. κωφόν, δαιμονιζόμενον.] The latter word is, as Fritz. says, explanatory of the former; q. d. 'who was such by demoniacal influence.' And this, Rosenm. and Kuin. admit, is the sense intended by Matthew and Luke xi. 14. Yet, with a strange perversity, they choose to ascribe the dumbness to disorder. Only, they say, 'the Evangelists thought proper to retain the common expression.' But this would be inconsistent with the character of honest men, much less ambassadors from God. See note supra iv. 24, and at variance with the firm belief of demoniacal possession, elsewhere so apparent in their writings. Besides, the truth and dignity of the miracle will not, as is alleged, remain the same. It would not be the same miracle; and the dignity would be far less. For though Dr. Mead expresses his surprise 'that divines should contend so eagerly for demoniacal possession, as if something were wanting to demonstrate Christ's power, when exercised only over natural diseases;' yet what has been said supra iv. 24. will abundantly prove that something would have been wanting to demonstrate, if not the power, yet the assumed character of Jesus, had it been exercised only over natural diseases. Assured we may be, that, in proportion as the soul exceeds in dignity the body, so must the suppression of evil from superhuman agents, exceed that of evil produced in the regular course of nature. Besides, the very terms employed show that the removal of the dumbness was occasioned by the expulsion of the demon. Not to say that the amazement of the people necessarily supposes the cure of demoniacal possession, not that of disease; for the latter had been very frequently seen in Israel, and evinced by the Propheets; nay, even so far as to raise the dead.

33. οὐδέποτε ἐφάνη οὕτως.] An elliptical form of expression, in which τοῦτο, or τοιοῦτό τι, and γινόμενον are usually said to be understood. Fritz., indeed, objects to the uncommonness of the ellipsis; but without reason, for this seems to have been a popular form of expression. Mill, Wets., Grieb., Matth., and Scholz., are agreed that ὅτι before οὐδέποτε, which is found in very few MSS., must be cancelled.

34. ἐν τῷ ἄρχ.] per. Heb. γ. This, however, is not a Hebraism. To the examples adduced by Schlens. may be added another from Thucyd. iii. 42. Οὐκ ὀφθαλμίζονται ἐν τῷ τοιφῷδε.

35. κώμας.] The term here includes loumas as well as villages.

— ἐν τῷ λαῷ.] These words are not found in several MSS., the Ed. Pr., almost all the ancient Versions, and some Greek Fathers. They are therefore rejected by Mill, cancelled by Griesb., Fritz, and Scholz., and double-bracketed by Knapp and Vater; though retained by Matth. They were probably derived from iv. 23.

36. ἐσπλαγχνίσθη] 'was moved with compassion.' The word occurs neither in the Sept. nor the Classical writers, and seems to have been formed by the New Testament writers from σπλάγχνος, bowels; for there the Jews placed the seat of sympathy; by a metaphor taken from that yearning which is felt in pity, or the other kindly affections. The verb is construed sometimes with πρὸς, with or without a Genit.; at others with ἐπὶ and an Accus.

— ἐσκυλμένοι.] It is almost impossible to imagine stronger authority, internal and external, than exists for this reading, which has been approved by nearly every Commentator, and received by all the Editors from Wets. downwards. As to the common reading, ἐκλεινυμένοι, it is plainly a gloss. The sense of ἐσκυλμένοι is harassed, vexed, troubled; namely, with the burdensome rites and ceremonies of the Law, and especially the irksome traditions of the Pharisees. The word denotes properly to tear, as applied to dogs and other animals (Angl. worry), and figur. to harass, trouble, as at Mark v. 33. Luke viii. 49. 3 Macc. iii. 25. iv. 6.

— ἐρριμμένοι] i. e. not scattered, as some render, but lit., tossed aside, abandoned, unprotected. See Wets. 'Ὁ μὴ ἔχοντα ποιμένα.' See Note infra, xv. 24. Similar pastoral images occur in 1 Kings xxii. 17. and Judith xi. 19.

37. ὁ μὲν θερισμὸς — ὀλίγοι.] Probably a proverbial saying, including an agricultural comparison, not unusual in the Rabbinical writings. Ἔργον and its compounds are peculiarly applied to the labours of husbandry. The meaning is, that the multitude that flocked to his ministry was very great, but the teachers few.

38. ἐκβάλῃ] 'would [speedily] send forth.'

X. We have now an account of the solemn appointment of the persons afterwards Apostles to the work of evangelization. They had been all along in attendance on Christ, had been regarded as designated for some important service, and were now solemnly appointed to the work of the Gospel.

1. ἐξουσίαν πνευμάτων δ.] Most Commentators here supply κατὰ, which, however, though found in several MSS., is only an ancient gloss. The πνευμ. is rightly regarded by Kuin. as a Genit. of object; as in Ecclesi. x. 4. ἐξουσία τῆς γῆς. John xvii. 2. Rom. ix. 21, and several passages of the Classical writers cited by Raphael and Palaiet.

2. ἀποστόλων.] This important term properly denotes ἀπεσταλμένος, one sent by another, on some important business, as in Herodot. i. 21, where it signifies a herald, and 1 Kings xiv. 6. But (in imitation of the name given to an officer sent by the High-priest and Sanhedrim to the foreign Jews, to collect the tribute levied for the support of the Temple) it is, in the N. T., almost always used to denote 'persons employed to convey the message of salvation from God to man,' and especially the twelve Apostles; who were peculiarly so called, as being at first especially sent out by Christ, and commissioned to preach the Gospel in Judea; and who afterwards, with Paul and Barnabas (who were supernaturally selected for the work), received full and extraordinary authority, not only to promulgate his religion throughout the world, but to found and regulate the Christian Church; and especially to ordain teachers and pastors, who should hereafter govern it by ordinary authority.

— πρῶτος—Πέτρος] i. e. first in order, as being first called, (see iv. 18) not first in dignity; for Christ seems not to have authorised any difference in rank. If he had done so, the Evangelists would have observed it; but they have not; for the names are recited by them in a different order. Judas, however, is always named last, and Peter first; and John and his brother James third and fourth, or fourth and fifth.

4. ὁ Ἰσκαριώτης.] The ὁ was brought into the text by the Elzevir Editor, and has been retained by Weta. and all the recent Editors, except Matthæi, who cancelled it. Bp. Middleton is of opinion, that the presence or the absence of the Art. depends upon whether Ἰσκαριώτης be a surname, or an epithet significant of place of birth or residence. If, as Chrys. and some others say, it is derived from Carioth, Judas's birth-place, the Art. he thinks is required; and if it be a mere surname, it should not have it. Yet, as, on other occasions, the Art. is often omitted where in propriety it ought to be inserted, because it is implied (as when a cognomen passes into a simple name); so it may be here; and therefore that will determine nothing as to the reading. But, since external evidence is decidedly in favour of the Article, and internal equally balanced, it ought not to have been cancelled by Matth.

5. παραγγείλας.] Namely, with directions to the following effect. Μὴ ἀπέλθῃτε. Literally, 'ye must not go.'

— εἰς ὁδὸν ἐθνῶν.] for εἰς ὁδὸν ἢ ἀγεί εἰς τὰ ἔθνη, the Genit. here being a Genit. of motion, as in Gen. iii. 24. Jer. ii. 18, ἡ ὁδὸς Αἰγύπτου. Εἰς πόλιν, anb. τινά; for it is wrongly taken by Kuin. of 'the city of Samaria'; which would require the Art. See Luke ix. 52. John iv. 5.

8. νεκροὺς ἐγείρετε.] Editors are much divided in opinion as to the authenticity of these words; which are rejected by the generality of Critics, but defended by Whitby, Griesb., and Fritz. The internal evidence for, and that against them is nearly balanced; but the latter somewhat preponderates. (See Grot., Mill, Camph., and Matthæi.) The external is most decidedly against them. See Scholz, who has, with Matthæi, cancelled the words. If they be retained, we may suppose that, like some few other passages in this discourse respecting events which did not immediately take place, they have reference to the period comprehended under the more extensive commission which the Apostles received after Christ's resurrection. See John xx. 21. I have not followed the change of position adopted by Griesb. from some MSS. and Versions, because that would remove one principal cause which may be assigned for the omission of the words, namely, the homoteleuton. The change in question might well arise from omission of words afterwards supplied in the margin.

— δωρεὰν—δότε.] A sort of proverbial saying which must, as appears from Luke x. 7, be confined to what went just before; namely, the dispensing of miraculous gifts; and therefore cannot be drawn into an argument against the maintenance of Christian ministers. All that is meant is, that they were not to make a trade of their miraculous gifts, as the Jewish exorcists did of their pretended power to cast out devils.

9. μὴ κτήσῃσθε.] 'ye must not provide, or furnish yourselves with;' (as the word often signifies in the best Classical writers). Comp. Luke xxii. 35. This may be illustrated from the customs of the Essenes, of whom Josephus, Bell. ii. 8, 4, says, that whatever they had was always thrown open to the use of their travelling brethren, just as if they were their own. Διό (he adds) καὶ ποιοῦνται τὰς ἀποδημίας οὐδὲν ἑταρκομίζομενοι; 'carrying (ἐν) with them for the journey.'

— εἰς τὰς ζῶνας ὑμῶν.] These words (to which μὴ κτήσῃσθε χρυσόν μηδὲ ἄργ. μηδὲ χαλκόν must be all referred) signify, 'for your purses,' i. e. for your travelling expences. Ζῶνας signifies properly girdles. But the Oriental nations (and even the Greeks and Romans), used the belt, with which their flowing garments were confined, as purses—a custom still subsisting in the East, and in Greece. [Comp. Luke xxii. 35.]

10. πήραν.] A sort of wallet, generally of leather, used by shepherds and travellers, for the reception of provisions, mentioned both in the Old Test. and in Homer.

— δύο χιτῶνας.] This does not forbid the wearing of two coats (for the ancients generally wore two on a journey), but a change of coats.

— ὑποδήματα.] A sort of strong shoes, for long journeys. On other occasions sandals were worn. These ὑποδήματα they were not to provide, but (as Mark more clearly expresses it) to use sandals only. An injunction which may be ascribed to the desire of our Lord to exclude even the slight forecast and provision implied in providing themselves with strong shoes, as if they could not always depend on procuring sandals. 'Ράβδους is found in most of the MSS., the Copt., Arm., and later Syriac Versions, Theophyl., the earliest Edd., and is adopted by Grotius, Beza, Whitby, Wets., and Scholz. But it is quite at variance with Mark vi. 8; for, as to its meaning 'a change of staves,' that is an attempt to remove the discrepancy (as Fritz. says) 'risu quam refutatione dignior.' Besides, we can far better account for the change of ράβδον into ράβδους, than the contrary. The scribes stumbling at a singular noun, after several plural ones, changed the singular into the plural; which they might the more easily do, since the abbreviations for ov and ous are not very dissimilar. And vain is it to urge, that in Luke ix. 3, we have ράβδους; for there ράβδον, on very strong evidence, both external and internal, is adopted by all the best Editors. Thus it appears, that the external evidence for ράβδον (including several ancient MSS. and the best Versions, as the Pesch. Syr.) is nearly equal to that for ράβδους. And the internal evidence is almost wholly on its side. Under these circumstances, I have thought proper (with Mill, Gricab., Matth., Tittm., Vater, and Fritz.) to retain ράβδον. The sense will thus be quite reconcilable with Mark vi. 8; the injunction, that they should not provide themselves with a staff, almost implying that they might take one, if they had it.

— ἄξιός γάρ, &c.] A proverbial expression (occurring also in Levit. xix. 13. & Deut. xxiv. 14, 15) importing, 'You may cheerfully trust the providence of God to take care of you while engaged in such a cause; and you may reasonably expect to find sustenance among those for whose benefit you labour.' τροφή means here, as in Xen. Œcon. v. 13, maintenance generally. Comp. Luke x. 7, 8. 1 Tim. v. 18. ἄξιός ὁ ἐργάτης τοῦ μισθοῦ αὐτοῦ. They are forbidden to load themselves with any articles of raiment besides what they were wearing, or with money to purchase more, because they would be entitled to a supply from those on whom their labours were bestowed, and money would be but an incumbrance.

11. ἄξιός scil. παρ' ᾧ μέναιτ' ἂν, 'of your company.' Though the absolute use, which is found both in the Scriptural and Classical writers, and is supported by the ancient interpreters, may possibly be preferable.

12. ἀσπάσασθε αὐτήν.] Meaning the family, as in the next verse, and as the word is often used in Scripture. Ἀσπ. includes all the customary tokens of courtesy, suitable to all, each according to their age and station.

13. ἐλθέτω.] This, and ἐπιστραφήτω just after, are commonly regarded as examples of Imperat. for Future. But it is better, with Fritz., to take the sense to be 'uolo pacem vestram,' &c. Εἰρήνη means the benefit of your peace, &c., or blessing; or, as Robinson explains, 'the good and blessing which you have invoked by way of salutation.' Πρὸς ὑμᾶς ἐπιστραφήτω. This is used in a popular sense, to signify 'let it (meaning, it shall) become void and ineffectual.' So Isaiah lv. 11. οὕτως ἔσται τὸ ῥῆμά μου, ὃ ἐὰν ἐξέλθῃ ἐκ τοῦ στόματός μου, οὐ μὴ ἀποστραφῇ, ἕως ἂν ταλίσθῃ ὅσα ἂν ᾔθελῃσα. See also Ps. xxxv. 13, and vii. 16. Thus it is meant, that if the persons were worthy to receive the blessing prayed for, they would have it; if not, the present 'came back to the giver.' An emphatic way of saying, that they would not have it. Though it may be also implied, that the blessing prayed for would redound to themselves. See Ps. xxxv. 13.

14. καὶ ὅν ἐάν.] This is not for ἐάν δὲ τις; but ἐάν is for ἂν. The construction is popular. Moreover, ἐκίνας is for ἐκίλων, by the figure πρὸς τὸ σμν. The Genit. ποδῶν is governed by the ἐκ in ἐκτινάξατε. Shaking off the dust from the feet at persons (as Acts xii. 5.) was a symbolical action, disclaiming all intercourse with them.

15. ἀνεκτότερον] 'easier to be borne.'

— ἐν ἡμέρᾳ κρίσεως] 'in the day of judgment.' Some Commentators understand this of the destruction of the Jewish nation. But that, as Whitby observes, is rather 'styled the day of re-vengeance; and is otherwise inapplicable here.' The expression, then, must, notwithstanding the omission of the Article (on which see Bp. Middleton) be understood of the day of final judgment.

16. γίνεσθε—περισσεραί.] We have here two beautiful and appropriate similes (common in the Classical writers), intimating the dangers to which they would be exposed, and the best means of avoiding them. Φρόνιμοι, prudentes. Ἀκίραιοι, 'simplices, artless.' So Rom. xvi. 19, Σίλω δὲ ὑμᾶς σοφοὺς μὴ εἰς τὸ ἀγαθόν, ἀκε-ραῖους δὲ εἰς τὸ κακόν, 'as to evil and deceit;'
which passage, being evidently founded on this saying of our Lord, supplies its best comment.

17. τῶν ἀνθρώπων.] Meaning the persons just before spoken of. See Bp. Middl. and Comp.
Acts ii. 40. By συνέδρια are here to be understood the provincial tribunals which existed in most towns, and even villages. And that συνα-γωγαῖς must be taken in like manner, is plain from the parallel passages in Mark and Luke.

18. ἐπὶ ἡγεμόνας] 'up, before.' So Xen.
Laced. ἀγεί αὐτοὺς ἐπὶ τοὺς Ἐφόρους.

— εἰς μαρτύριον αὐτοῖς] namely, of the truth of the Gospel, by your endurance of persecution in behalf of it.

19. μὴ μεριμνήσητε] i. e. be not anxiously solicitous. Πῶς ἢ τί λαλήσητε, 'how or what you may speak.' Meaning both the manner and the matter. On the full force and extent of the promise here, see Dr. Henderson's Lect. on Inspir.
p. 409, sq.

20. οὐ γὰρ, &c.] The Commentators regard this as a comparative negation, like non tam— quam; of which there are many examples in the Scriptural and Classical writers. But Winer, in his Gr. Gr. denies this qualified sense always to have place in οὐ followed by ἀλλά; and after discussing several passages where the formula is found (as Acts v. 4, and 1 Thes. iv. 8. 1 Cor. i.
17, and the present passage), he shows that the sentiment is enfeebled when the οὐ is translated non tam. Here, he observes, the reference is not to the physical act of speaking, but to the sentiment uttered; which was to be really imparted to the Apostles by the Holy Spirit. Abp. Newcome very well supplies 'in effect and ultimately.' Ἔσται is Pres. for Fut.; or it may stand for are to be, populariter. The sense is: 'for ye are not to be the speakers, but the Spirit of your Father [is to be] that which speaketh [i. e. the speaker] in you. The Apostles, observes Dr. Henderson, 'were to employ human language; but this was not to be the fruit of their own mental operations: it was to result from the supernatural influences of the Holy Spirit prompting, controlling, and guiding those operations.'

21. ἐπαναστήσονται.] Kuin., Rosenm., and others, take this as a forensic term, to signify 'they shall rise up as witnesses.' And they appeal to Matt. xii. 41. But there ἐν τῇ κλίτῃ is added.
Hence I see no reason to abandon the usual interpretation, as referred to hostility, attack, and persecution, which is well supported by Wets., Kypke, and Fritz. With this may be compared a very similar passage of Thucyd. iii. 83, καὶ γὰρ πατὴρ παῖδα ἀπέκτεινε, 'used to put to death.'

22. πάντων.] This is commonly taken for many; but better by Euthym., for most, quasi ad omnibus.

— διὰ τὸ ὄνομά μου] for δι' ἐμὲ, 'because of me,' as said at v. 18. which is not a mere Hebraism; but an idiom sometimes found in the Classical writers; as Eurip. Iph. A. 1495, ἵνα τε δόρατα (turmas hastatas) μέμνη δαῖα δι' ἐμὸν ὄνομα, τὰς γ' Ἀλλίδος στυγερῶς ὄρμεις.

— ὁ δὲ ὑπομείνας—σωθήσεται.] 'He who perseveres to the end of his trials, in the ordeal of persecution, shall escape the destruction of the Jewish people here, as well as God's wrathful judgment hereafter.' This passage seems to be of the same nature as several in Ch. xxiv. See Note on xxiv. 3.

23. τελέσητε τὰς πόλεις] for τελ. τὴν ὁδὸν διὰ τὰς πόλεις, 'ye shall not have finished passing through the cities.' So Josh. iii. 17, συνετίλεσιν διαβαίναν.

— ὥστε ἂν ἴδῃς ὁ ὕδατος τοῦ ἀνθ.] 'until, or unto, up to the time when,' &c. These words are by the best Commentators referred to the destruction of Jerusalem. See xxiv. 28, 30, and Notes.

24. οὐκ ἴσται-διδάσκαλον.] Meaning, 'no disciple is above his teacher; nor any servant above his master;' implying that he cannot expect better treatment than his master.

25. Βεελζεβοῦλ.] Several Editors and Critics would read Βεελζεβοῦθ, which Jerome adopted into the Vulg., under the idea that it is the same with the Ekronite idol called at 2 Kings i. 2. baalzebub, the Lord of flies; and that the change of β into λ was made agreeably to the genius of the Greek language, which admits no word to end in β. But besides that for Βεελζεβοῦθ, there is scarcely the authority of one MS. The title was one of honour; like the Zeὺς Ἀπομύιος, banisher of flies, given to Hercules. Whereas, the name here evidently is one of contempt. Hence the best Commentators, with reason, suppose that the name is indeed the same with that of the above-mentioned; but (according to a custom among the Jews, of altering the names of idols, to throw contempt on them), changed to Βεελζεβοῦλ, meaning Lord of dung, i. e. metaphorically, idolatry, or according to others, the 'Lord of Idols.' Hence it was afterwards given by the Jews to the prince of demons.

— ἐκάλεσαν.] Wets., Griesb., Kuin., Vater, Fritz., and Scholz. edit ἐπακάλεσαν; which indeed has very strong authority from MSS., Eds., and Fathers. Yet as the MSS. fluctuate between this and three other readings, we may suspect alteration; and in such a case the simplest reading is to be preferred. Thus, in the present case, ἐκάλεσαν might give birth to all the rest. I have, therefore (with Matthæi) retained the common reading.

26. μὴ οὖν φοβηθῆτε κ. τ. λ.] In other words, 'Fear not them that shall persecute you, and speak evil of you falsely, for my sake; for God shall be with you, and make your righteousness to be manifest as the light, and the truth for which you suffer, to be a light to lighten the whole world.' An adage, to denote that the truth, however it may be, for a time, obscured, cannot be extinguished.

27. ὁ λέγω-δωματίων.] Of the phrase λίγιστον

ἐν φωτί and ἀκούειν τι (λεγόμενον) εἰς οὐς, as also of δαίμα in the sense, house-top, see the Classical examples in Recens. Synop. They are all metaphorical, and the last adagial. It is well known that such house-tops were flat, and surrounded by battlements, being, indeed, used very much as upper rooms. We have in Joseph. Bell. ii. 21, 5, an instance of an address to a multitude from a house-top.

28. φοβηθῆτε.] Wets., Griesb., Matth., Vater, and Scholz, edit φοβεῖσθε, from very many MSS., the Edit. Princ., and some Fathers. But, though external evidence be, perhaps, in favour of φοβεῖσθε, yet internal is, I apprehend, against it, since it occurs before and after in the context, and φοβηθῆτε was more likely to be changed into φοβεῖσθε than the contrary. Hence I have thought proper to retain the common reading, which, indeed, is found without var. lect. in the parallel passage at Luke xii. 4.

— ἀπὸ τῶν ἀποκτεινόντων.] Though there be considerable authority for ἀποκτεινόντων, which is preferred by nearly all the principal Editors; yet there seems no sufficient reason for change; since the common reading is more suitable in sense, is found in at least as many MSS., and is confirmed by the parallel passage at Luke xii. 4. See also Matth. xxiii. 37. The true reading is probably ἀποκτεινόντων, (an Æolic form), found in several MSS., and at Rev. vi. 11. 2 Cor. iii. 6. See Winer, Gr. Gr. p. 79, Note. The construction at φοβ. with ἀπὸ is formed on the Heb. מִן, and occurs in the Sept.

— τὴν ψυχὴν.] Meaning the spiritual and immortal nature of man; as in James i. 21, and Plato Phæd. ix. 28, ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ ὡς ψυχὴ καὶ σῶμα. On this whole passage, comp. Is. viii. 12, 13.

29. Our Lord here exhorts them to fearlessness, from two considerations; 1. That God takes care even of his meanest creatures (as sparrows); and marks with His attentive eye even the smallest matter which concerns man.

— ἐν ἑξ αὐτῶν οὐ] for οὐδὲν, say the Commentators and Winer in his Gr. Gr. p. 160. But perhaps there is more emphasis in the present position: the sense being nearly the same as in κ Luke 21. 18. Acts 27. 34. 2 Sam. 14. 11. 1 Mark 8. 38. Luke 9. 26. & 12. 8. 2 Tim. 2. 12. Rev. 3. 5. ἄνευ τοῦ Πατρὸς ὑμῶν. ^k Ὑμῶν δὲ καὶ αἱ τρίχες τῆς κεφαλῆς 30 οὐδὲ ἐν, not even one. In fact, in all the examples adduced by Winer (as Eph. v. 5. iv. 23. 2 Pet. i. 20.) there is an intensity of sense.

— πᾶσαι ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν.] An idiom common in the Scriptural, and not unexampled in the Classical writers, for ἀπολείπεται.

— ἄνευ τοῦ Πατρὸς ὑμῶν.] 'without the counsel and providence of;' as Thucyd. ii. 70. ὅτι ἄνευ αὐτῶν (scil. τῆς γνώμης) ἐκινήσαν. With respect to the sentiment, which inculcates the superintending care of Providence even over the meanest works of the creation, the Commentators adduce many parallels from the Classical and the Rabbinical writers.

30. καὶ αἱ τρίχες—αἰσ.] Another proverbial saying (similar to many in the O. T. and the Rabbinical writers) importing that the very smallest of our concerns are under the care of God.

32. ὁμολογήσει ἐν ἐμοὶ.] A Hebrew and Hellenistic construction, for ὁμολ. ἐμέ, as at Lu. xii. 8. Rom. x. 9. The sense of the word is literally, 'to make profession in conformity to any one.' In the other member of the sentence it stands for agnoscere, to recognise, approve. Render the οὖν not, therefore, but then. See Winer, Gr. Gr. p. 425. s. fin.

33. ὅστις δ' ἂν, &c.] Here ἂν, united with ὅστις and Subj., adds to the idea of indefiniteness; as Luke vi. 35. Job. ii. 5. 1 Cor. xvi. 2. Gal. v. 10. Ἀρνήσῃται με. A popular expression to signify the refusing to believe in Christ.

34. μὴ νομίσητε—μάχαιραν.] This is (as Wets. and Camp. remark) 'a forcible and indeed Oriental mode of expressing the certainty of a foreseen consequence of any measure, by representing it as the purpose for which the measure was adopted.' See also Whitby. The words are well shown by Dr. Parr, in a Sermon on this text, as intended only to predict, not to justify, the evils of which Christianity has been eventually productive. By μάχαιρα is here meant both war (namely, the Jewish war which soon followed), and civil commotion; which is supported by what follows, and by the parallel passage in Luke xii. 51.

35. διχάσαι—κατά.] Διχάσαι signifies properly to divide into two parts; but here it denotes to set apart, i. e. at variance; in which there is a mixture of two constructions.

36. τοῦ ἀνθρώπου.] Bp. Middleton considers this as equivalent to πάντος ἀνθρώπου, every man, or men generally; which is confirmed by the words of Micah, vii. 6; where for ἐχθροὶ πάντες ἀνθρώπου, Bp. Middleton rightly conjectures πάντος, which, I would add, is required by the Hebrew.

— ὑπὲρ ἐμέ.] A Hebraism, as in Gen. xlviii. 2 Judg. ii. 19. With the sentiment here compare Luke xiv. 26 (where see Note). By οὐκ ἔστι μου ἄξιος here is meant, 'is not worthy of being my disciple,' οὐ δύναται μου μαθητὴς εἶναι, as it is there said.

38. λαμβάνει τὸν σταυρὸν.] There is here an allusion to the Roman custom of compelling a malefactor going to crucifixion to bear his cross. And by carrying the cross is figuratively denoted the enduring of whatever is burdensome or irksome, in following Christ's example, or fulfilling his precepts.

— ἀκολουθεῖ ὀπίσω μου.] This is not a mere Hebraism, but is found in Classical writers. See Wets. It is a construction which at first involved an addition of sense, but at length became a pleonasm.

39. ὁ εὐρὼν—ἀπολείπει αὐτήν.] This is supposed to be an acutè dictum, or Oxymoron, involving a Paronomasia between the two senses of ψυχὴ, namely, life and soul. Life is an Hebrew image of felicity, and in this sense the word ought to be taken in the words following, ἀπολείπει αὐτήν and εὕρησιν αὐτήν. Εὐρὼν is to be taken declaratively (see Smith's Scr. Test. ii. 248) i. e. expects to find or secure it.

these three verses the same truth is inculcated; namely, that he who should entertain with kindness himself or his disciples, in the name or quality of prophets, would thus show his respect and attachment to them, and should not fail of his reward.

40. ὁ δεχόμενος ὑμᾶς ἀπὸ δέχεται] 'and consequently he that receiveth not you, receiveth not me.' The treatment shown to an ambassador is in fact shown to his sovereign.

41. εἰς ὄνομα προφήτου] i. e. 'in the character of; for ὡς προφ. By προφ. seems to be meant a teacher of the Gospel; and by δίκαιον, a pious professor of it.

42. μικρῶν.] Meaning disciples, as opposed to teachers; either because μαθητῶν may be understood at μικρῶν, from the context, or be taken substantively, as answering to (what it seems was in the original Hebrew) עַלְמָא, and being, (as we find from the Rabbinical writings) the name given to disciples. Ποτίζω has properly an Accus. of person (as we say, 'to give any one to drink'); but sometimes, as here, and in the Sept., one Accus. of person and another of thing, namely the liquid or its recipient. At ψυχροῦ supply ὕδατος; an ellipsis (also found after frigida and gelida in Latin, and not unfrequent in the Classical writers. The word is expressed in Mark ix. 41, and occasionally in Classical writers. To give a cup of cold water was proverbial for giving the smallest thing. A gift, however, sometimes so acceptable as to be regarded as no small favour. See Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6. 6. a. fin.

XI. 1. διατάσσειν] 'giving injunctions.'

—ἐπὶ αὐτοῖς.] It is not clear to whom this refers. Chrys. and Euthym. understand the disciples; other ancients, the Jews; most modern Commentators, the Galileans; according to the Hebrew idiom of using a pronoun where its antecedent is not expressed, but must be understood from the context. See Winer's Gr. Gr. § 15. 3.

3. σὺ εἰ—προσδοκῶμεν:] 'Art thou He who should come, or must we look for, i. e. are we to expect, another?' q. d. Art thou the long expected Messiah? ὁ ἐρχόμενος being a kind of title of the Messiah (see Heb. x. 37), as spoken of under that designation in the O. T., namely, as the SHILOH, the Adonai-Jehovah, the Angel of the covenant, who should come, and that soon.

Comp. Heb. ii. 3. Few questions have been more debated than the purpose of John's sending this message to Jesus. Some ancients and many moderns think that he sent in order to satisfy certain doubts which had occurred to his own mind during his confinement. But surely his view of the descent of the Holy Ghost at Christ's baptism, the testimony he then heard from heaven, the divine impulse by which he recognised Jesus as 'the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world,' and his own reiterated testimonies forbid such a supposition. Thus, even Dr. P. Smith, who thinks that doubts might have arisen in John's mind, grants that the language of the message is rather the utterance of complaint and remonstrance [at seeming neglect] than of doubt, q. d. as Borger expresses it, Tu ita agis quasi non sis Messias, quasi alius expectandus sit. Again, to imagine that John's confinement should have affected the strength of his resolves, or drawn from him the language of fretful remonstrance, or peevish complaint, would do great injustice to so noble a character. In short, the opinion has been shown to be utterly untenable by Chrys., Euthym., Theophyl., and Greg., of the ancients; and of the moderns, by Hamon., Whitby, Doddr., Bp. Atterbury, in a Sermon on this text, and Mr. Benson (Hulsean Lectures, 1820, pp. 60, 67); who maintain, that John sent for the satisfaction of his disciples; who, mortified at seeing their master imprisoned for preaching the coming of the Messiah, and disappointed that He whom he testified to be such, should make no such claim; nor make any attempt to deliver his forerunner; stumbling, too, at the humbleness of Jesus's birth, and the lowliness of his station; and offended at his difference in character from their own ascetic master, had entertained doubts as to his Messiahship. Against these, therefore, the reproof at the conclusion of the reply is levelled. Hence, it was for their satisfaction John had sent; and as they would not heed his repeated endeavours to remove their doubts, he resolved to refer them to Christ himself; for the removal of their scruples; and our Lord, well aware of his intention, took the surest means of fixing the wavering minds of his disciples, by displaying such supernatural endowments as should completely answer to the predicted character of the Messiah.

The reply is, as Bp. Atterbury observes, not direct and positive, but so ordered only as to give them an occasion of answering the question themselves, which they had proposed to Christ. q. d. 'You come to learn of me whether I am the promised Messiah. Your master has often told you I am He, but you will not believe him. To him you should have gone as my forerunner: to me it belongs not so properly to proclaim my own titles. Behold, therefore, the testimony of God! for the works which I am doing before your eyes bear witness that the Father hath sent me.' The description of the works in question is so framed as to be taken from a prophecy of Isaiah lxi. 1. xxxv. 5, 6, of the Messiah. As the best comment on this portion I would notice a passage of John v. 31, 36, where our Lord similarly refers to the works which he doth, to 'bear testimony that the Father hath sent him.'

7. ὁ Ἰησοῦς εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Πορευθέντες ἀπαγγεῖλατε Ἰωάννῃ, ἀ ἀκούετε καὶ βλέπετε. Τυφλοὶ ἀναβλέπουσι, καὶ χωλοὶ 5 περιπατοῦσι· λεπροὶ καθαρίζονται, καὶ κωφοὶ ἀκούουσι· νεκροὶ ἐγείρονται, καὶ πτωχοὶ εὐαγγελίζονται. καὶ μακάριός ἐστιν 6 ὃς ἐάν μὴ σκανδαλισθῇ ἐν ἐμοί. Τούτων δὲ πορευομένων, 7 ἤρξατο ὁ Ἰησοῦς λέγειν τοῖς ὄχλοις περὶ Ἰωάννου· Τί ἐξήλθετε εἰς τὴν ἔρημον θεάσασθαι; κάλαμον ὑπὸ ἀνέμου σαλευόμενον; Ἀλλὰ τί ἐξήλθετε ἰδεῖν; ἄνθρωπον ἐν μαλακοῖς 8 ἱματίοις ἡμφιεσμένον; ἰδοὺ, οἱ τὰ μαλακὰ φοροῦντες ἐν τοῖς οἴκοις τῶν † βασιλέων εἰσίν. Ἀλλὰ τί ἐξήλθετε ἰδεῖν; 9 προφήτην; ναὶ, λέγω ὑμῖν, καὶ περισσύτερον προφήτου. 27 Οὗτος γάρ ἐστι περὶ οὗ γέγραπται· Ἴδού, ἐγὼ ἀπο- 10 στέλλω τὸν ἄγγελόν μου πρὸ προσώπου σου, ὃς 28 κατασκευάσει τὴν ὁδόν σου ἔμπροσθέν σου. Ἀμήν 11 λέγω ὑμῖν· οὐκ ἐγήγερται ἐν γεννητοῖς γυναικῶν μείζων

5. πτωχοὶ εὐαγγελίζονται.] 'the poor have the good tidings of salvation brought to them.' (See Is. lxi. 1.) A peculiar feature of Christianity, as distinguished from Judaism and Heathenism, whose priests and philosophers courted the rich, and condemned the poor. See John vii. 49, and Note.

6. σκανδαλισθῇ ἐν ἐμοί.] Meaning, 'stumble in faith'; fall off from his faith in me. Σκάνδαλον signifies a stumbling block, and, in a spiritual sense, what obstructs us in our Christian course, and causes us to fall away from the faith, or scruple to receive it.

7. τούτων δὲ πορευομένων.] Render, 'when they were gone'; πορ. being not unfrequently used for ἀπέρχομαι. This sense is required by the ἀπελθόντων of Luke. And so also the Pesh. Syr. renders.

— κάλαμον ὑπὸ ἀνέμου σαλευόμενον.] The Commentators are not agreed whether the words should be taken in the natural sense,—meaning, that it was not the sight of any trifling thing, such as reeds (with which the wilderness abounded), tossed about by the wind, but, &c.,—or the metaphorical, as figuratively descriptive of levity and inconstancy—a wavering man. The former view is adopted by Grotius, Beza, Campbell, Wets., Rosenm., Schlus., and Fritz.; the latter by the ancients generally, and, of the moderns, by Whitby, Mackn., and Kuin. The latter is more pointed and significant, but the former is more simple, and not less agreeable to the context.

8. ἀλλὰ τί] for ἢ τί, says Kuin. But Fritz. more rightly regards this use of ἀλλὰ after interrogations, as meant to deny any thing as corresponding to the objective αἱ, q. d. 'If ye deny that ye went with that view, for what purpose, then, did ye go?' Μαλακοῖς denotes soft, and therefore fine; whether of silk, linen, cotton, or other materials. Luke says: ἐν ἱματισμῷ ἰνδόξῃ.

— βασιλέων.] Very many MSS. have βασιλείων, which is edited by Matth. and Scholz, but wrongly, for internal evidence is quite against it, inasmuch as it would produce an idle circumlocution, in the place of an expression whose simplicity and Oriental air attest its truth. The error arose from a mistake of the abbreviation for οὐ with that for εἰων.

9. περισσύτερον προφήτου.] 'something (i. e. a person) more exalted than a prophet'; namely, by his supernatural conception and birth, by his more important commission as Forerunner of the Messiah, nay as being himself the subject of ancient prophecies!

10. Quoted from Mal. iii. 1. The words, however, differ not only from the Heb. but the Sept., in one or both of which Drs. Owen and Randolph suppose a corruption, but without cause. Ἐπιβλίσσεται is only a free version of רָחַץ, which scarcely admits of a literal one. Indeed, some MSS. have ἐτοιμάσει, and no doubt others in the time of Christ had ἐπισκηνάσει, which is a correct version of the Heb. Πρὸ προσ. μου in both the Sept. and the Evangelists, are a literal version of the Heb. לפני; instead of which the English V. has me, which is the true force. Thus the only real difference in the Evangelists is the supplying (for better illustration of the sense) one word, which is implied in another expressed; and in changing, for better application to the present purpose, μου into σου. [See Luke i. 17.]

11. οὐκ ἐγήγερται] Ἐγείρεσθαι, like the Hebrew קָם is especially applied to the birth of eminent persons. (Grot. and Kuin.)

—ὁ μικρότερος ἐν τῇ βασ., &c.] See 2 Tim. i. 10. Heb. vii. 17.

12. ἡ βασιλεία—βιασταί.] Few passages have been more variously interpreted than the present. Whatever may be obscure, one thing is plain,—that the two clauses are closely connected with each other; so that whatever can be shown to be the sense of the former, will fix the sense of the latter. And here it is of importance to attend to the general scope; which (as in all this portion, v. 9—14.) is, to set forth the high dignity of the Baptist. But to advert to the interpretations in question; most of them will be found either contrary to the scope, or at variance with the connection. Among these are those which are founded on attributing an active sense to βιάζ. Leaving, therefore, to βιάζεται its natural force (as a passive), it will be best interpreted (with almost all the ancient and the best modern Commentators) as put for βιαίως κρατεῖται, ‘impetu quodam et cupidè accipitur Messias regnum.’ But if this sense be determined, it will fix that of οἱ βιασταί, which cannot (as Hamm., Wets., and Bp. Middl. imagine) denote ‘those who had lived by rapine,’ as meant of the publicans, soldiers, and the meaner crowd. This is at variance with the connection, and yields a forced and frigid sense; such, indeed, as Middl. would never have adopted, had he not been induced to do so, rather than admit one of his canons on the Article to be broken. From the context, βιασταί must denote ‘persons who engage in any thing impetuously and eagerly.’ So in the parallel passage of Luke xvi. 16. (which has been too little attended to), ὁ νόμος καὶ οἱ προφῆται ἕως Ἰωάννου· ἀπὸ τότε ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ βιάγεται, καὶ πάντες εἰς αὐτήν βιάζονται. Hence the general sense is, ‘Since the Gospel has been proclaimed, there has been a rush to it. Men have been earnestly and vehemently pressing to obtain the desired blessing, as if they would take it by force.’

13. πάντες—προεφήτευσαν.] The γὰρ is causal, and has reference to v. 11, for v. 12. is, as it were, parenthetical, and the scope of it is, to point out the dignity of John: from the time of whose appearance the message of the Gospel was received with delight, and its truths were embraced with eagerness, by those whose minds were earnestly bent on forcing their way through the strait gate. The sense (which is obscure from brevity) will be made clearer by regarding προφ. as put emphatically. We may paraphrase: ‘For all the prophets, and other sacred writers of the law (i. e. revelation) of God, and its expounders up to the time of John, did but foretell and advert to as far off, the dispensation, which should hereafter be promulgated; whereas John announced it as at hand.’ [See Luke xvi. 16. Mal. iv. 4, 5.]

14. εἰ θέλῃτε δέξασθαι.] An impressive formula, like ὁ ἔχων—ἀκουέτω just afterwards; the latter soliciting patient attention, the former implicū faith. The air of this phrase (with which compare Ps. xcvi. 8. and Heb. iii. 7. εἰαν τῆς φωνῆς αὐτοῦ ἀκούσῃς), intimates, that the doctrine announced was contrary to their expectation, which was, that Elijah would appear in person. This sense of δέχασθαι (hearken, believe), both with the Accus., and used, as here, absolutely, is frequent in the Classical writers.

—αὐτός ἐστιν Ἠλίας] q. d. this is the person meant by Malachi iv. 5, and designated under that name. What is said is not at variance with the disavowal of the Baptist himself, John i. 21; since it is manifest that he was not Elias according to the sense in which Elias was expected by the Jews, i. e. the same person. He only bore the name, by figurative adoption, as being the antitype to Elias, who was the type of what the Baptist would be in after times. So, in Sirach 48. 10. he is represented as ὁ καταγραφείς ἐν ἡλεγοῖς εἰς καιροῦς, &c. where for ἡλ. (variously written in Mss.) I conjecture ἡλεγοῖς. The ε arose from the ε adscript, and the σ from the σ following. That the figurative adoption of a name does not imply an identity, is admitted by the Rabbins themselves; most of whom acknowledge that the prophecy in question relates to the Messiah. The typical character of Elias is manifest from the Gospel; for as the angel (alluding to this prophecy) told Zacharias that his son would be endued with the spirit and power of Elias; so these qualifications were communicated to John in the same manner as the spirit of Moses was given to Elijah by the Holy Ghost. The resemblance between the Prophet and the Baptist was conspicuous; not only in mode of life, manners, and dress, but still more in spirit (with which he was exceedingly jealous for the Lord of Hosts, 1 Kings xix. 10.) and in power, whereby he turned many to the Lord their God, Luke i. 16.

15. ὁ ἔχων—ἀκουέτω.] A formula often used to solicit attention to something of great importance, and chiefly occurring after parabolic or prophetic declarations figuratively expressed. See infra xiii. 9. Rev. ii. 7.

16. Our Lord now proceeds to expose the perverseness of the Jews by an apt similitude.

—τῇ δὲ ὁμοιώσω.] A form of introducing a parable or comparison, frequent in the Scriptures and the Talmud.

—παιδίους.] In this reading all the Editors from Wetstein to Scholz acquiesce, instead of the common one παιδαρίους, which has very little authority, and every mark of being an alteration of scribes. Ὁμοία ἐστὶ only denotes that there is a general similarity, by which the two things compared may be mutually illustrated. 'Ἀγοραῖς' denotes not only market-places, but those broad places in the streets (especially where they intersect each other), which are places of concourse, like market-places. Hence the words ἀγοραὶ and πλατεῖαι are often, in the Sept., used indifferently to express the same Heb. word. Καθῆσθαι is said to be, like the Heb. רצו, used in the sense versari, esse. Yet it may allude to the posture, so suitable to Eastern manners.

17. ὑλήσαμεν—ἐκόψασθε.] Seemingly a proverbial expression; in which there is an allusion to the dramatic sports of children; who, to use their phraseology, 'play at' (i. e. represent) some action or character. So the Pharisees are compared to wayward children, who will join in no play which their companions propose; since they neither would admit the severe precepts of John, nor approve the mild requisitions of Christ. On the use of musical wind instruments both at funerals and at feasts, in airs adapted, in character, to each respectively, see Grot., Mackn., and Horne's Introd. iii. 480, 524.

18. ἦλθε.] This is not redundant (as some regard it) but signifies, 'came forward as a teacher and prophet.' Μῆτε ἐσθίων μῆτε πίνων is an hyperbolical expression, well characterizing the ascetic austerity of John. By the force of the opposition, ἐσθίων καὶ πίνων must denote the contrary, namely, the living like other men.

19. καὶ ἰδικαιώθη—αὐτῆς.] There is scarcely any passage in the N. T. that has been more variously expounded than this. The most probable interpretations are the following.—1. Understanding σοφία to apply to the counsels and plans of John and of Christ respectively, we may regard the sentence as a reflection of our Lord on the Pharisees, thus: q. d. 'But when the [perverse]ness of men has done its utmost in aspersing the preachers of true religion] wisdom and virtue will still vindicate themselves.' 2. Understanding by σοφία the counsels of God for the conversion of the Jews; and by τέκν. those who embrace those counsels; the sentence may be thus paraphrased: 'The conduct of John the Baptist and myself, however different, are alike conformable to Divine wisdom; and those who are enlightened by this wisdom will justify both;' i. e. will vindicate the propriety of both, as the result of different circumstances. The first interpretation would seem preferable, as more agreeable to the context; while the other is strongly confirmed by a passage of Luke vii. 29. ἰδικαιώσαν τὸν Θεόν. In either case, the καὶ is (as often) for ἀλλά; and ἀπὸ means 'on the part of,' or, 'in the case of.' And the Aorist (ἰδικαιώθη) denoting continuance of time, includes the present with the past.

20, 21. After censuring the perverseness of the Jews in general, our Lord now upbraids some of those cities, in which he had chiefly wrought his miracles, for their impenitence.

20—24. There is such a thing as determined rejection of what is known and felt to be the truth; and it must have been a principle of that kind which called forth these fearful denunciations! (Prof. Turton against Dr. Wiseman.)

21. οὐαὶ σοι.] Meaning, 'Woe is [reserved] to, or for thee!' Said by Divine prescience, and amply fulfilled.

—Βηθσαιδάν.] Βηθσαιδὰ is found in many MSS., Versions, and Fathers; and is adopted or preferred by every Editor from Mill to Fritz, except Griceb. and Scholz, who retain the common reading: and rightly; for external evidence is against Βηθσαιδὰ, and internal by no means in its favour; Βηθσαιδάν being the more difficult reading, and therefore more probably genuine. It is not, as some imagine, in the accumulative case, but is a nominative of Chaldee form.

—πάλαι.] This signifies not so much ancient as jamdiu. See Robinson's Lex. on ἐν i. 1, 3.

—σάκκῳ] from the Hebrew שק, a coarse cloth, of linen or rough wool, worn for humiliation; as ashes were sprinkled on the head in token of sorrow. See Horne's Introd. vol. iii. p. 523.

22. πλὴν.] Render, 'moreover.'

23. ἡ ἕως τοῦ οὐρανοῦ—καταβιβ.] Expressions figuratively denoting the height of prosperity and spiritual privileges, and the depth of adversity and utter ruin; ἄδου signifying the lower parts of the earth. (Comp. Is. xiv. 13; Lam. iv. 6.) The very same image occurs in Anthol. i. 80, 15. ad Fortunam. τοὺς δ' ἀπὸ τῶν νεφελῶν εἰς αἶδη κατέγει.

24. Comp. supra x. 15.

25. ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπεν.] This expression is here, as sometimes elsewhere, used where nothing has gone before to which an answer could be supposed: in which most Commentators (as Kuin.)
 imagine a pleonasm of ἀποκριθεὶς; others a He-braism, πᾶν being sometimes so used. There must, however, be some reason for the use of either term; and Whitby seems right in supposing that there is usually a relation to something; i. e. to something which is passing in the mind either of the speaker or hearer, i. e. (as Fritz. says) 'either to some supposed question, suppressed from brevity, to which this is an answer (see Matth. xxii. 1. Luke v. 22. vii. 39. sq.), or to some question which might arise from certain actions.' See Mark ix. 38. Luke i. 60; xxii. 51. So Scott remarks that 'the sovereignty of God, in vouchsafing more abundant means of instruction to one city or country than to another, might excite objections; to which perhaps our Lord answered, when he adored the Divine conduct in a similar concern.'

— Ἐξομολογοῦμαί σοι.] This verb properly signifies to fully acknowledge, with an ellipsis of χάρις (obligation); and, consequently, to return thanks, to praise and glorify. This secondary sense it carries when followed by a Dative; and it often occurs in the Sept., where the same Hebrew word is rendered by ἔξομολογίσαι, αἰνεῖν, and ὑμνεῖν.

— ὅτι ἀπέκρυψας—νηπίοις.] Meaning, as the best Expositors, ancient and modern, are agreed, 'because, having hidden these things from the wise, thou hast revealed them unto babes:' (by a similar mode of expression to that, Rom. vi. 17.
 Is. xii. 1.) Here, as elsewhere in Scripture, God is said to do what He is pleased to permit to be done (see Exod. vii. 4, 5. 2 Sam. xii. 11.), and what He foresees will be done, under the circumstances in which men are placed, though without any constraining power over the will to produce this result. The σοφοὶ and the συνετοὶ have been thought to have reference to the Hebrew שָׂמַיִם and שְׂנוּי, different orders of Jewish teachers of the Law. But it should rather seem that σοφοὶ has reference to acquired knowledge, and συνετοὶ to natural talents (what we should express by wise and talented); while νηπίοὶ, by the force of the opposition, denotes persons of plain understanding: as in Plutarch, vi. 128.

28. ὁ Πατήρ.] Nomin. for Vocat. An idiom chiefly occurring in Heb. and Hellenistic Greek, but occasionally in the Classical writers, Greek and Latin, in which this vocative sense is imparted by the Article; the full sense being, 'thou who art the (i. e. our) Father.' The ὅτι is emphati-cal; and the full sense is: 'Yea [I do thank thee], O Father, because it was thy good pleasure that so [it should be.]'

27. This verse contains a very remarkable declaration of our Lord's personal and mediatorial dignity. (Scott.) Comp. Matth. xxviii. 18; John xiii. 3. By πάντα are meant all things relating to the counsels of God for the salvation of man, through Christ; q. d. 'The revelation of these mysteries, and the carrying into effect of these counsels are entrusted to me by the Father. And as no one can fully understand them, or the nature and office of the Redeemer, (not even the angels, 1 Pet. i. 10—12.) but the eternal Father; so, on the other hand, none (οὐδείς, meaning neither man nor angel) can fully know [for that is the complete sense of ἐπεὶ.] the person and character of the Son (τῆς ἑστί) but the Father.' An irrefutable proof of this of the Divinity of Christ our Saviour.

This doctrine, of a certain subordination of the Son to the Father, and the origination of the attributes of Divinity with the Father, (comp. infra xxviii. 13; John iii. 35; xiii. 3; xvii. 2.) when connected with what we elsewhere learn of their equality and majesty eternal, (see John i.
 18; vi. 46; x. 15,) and that which follows, of the reciprocal knowledge of the same Divine Persons, involves a mystery which, as it is utterly beyond the power of human understanding to penetrate, it is at once folly and presumption in man to attempt to fathom.

28. δεῦτε, &c.] An inference from the preceding: 'Come then,' &c.

— οἱ κοπιῶντες καὶ πεφορτισμένοι.] Some, understanding these words of the Jews, take them to refer to the burdens of the ceremonial law; and the additional injunctions of the Rabbis, called φορτία βαρῖα, δυσβάστακτα, Matt. xxiii.
 4. Others of the Gentiles, with reference to the burden of sin. It should seem best to take them (with Chrys., Origen, and Theophyl.) of both Jews and Gentiles, and meant to apply as the case might be; to the Jews, in both senses, to the Gentiles, in the latter; and, of course, ἀναπαύσω will be interpreted accordingly. They may, indeed, be referred to those of every age, who labour under the slavery of sin, from which they can alone be released by taking on them the yoke and service of Christ. Comp. John viii. 34—36.

29. ἄρατε—ἐμοῦ. Meaning, 'become my disciples,' (or, as it is just after said, 'learn of me'); by a metaphor familiar to the Jews, and not unfrequent with the Gentiles, whereby a law or precept is called a yoke, with allusion to oxen which are in harness. Comp. Zech. ix. 9. Πρᾶος signifies gentle, mild in his government; as opposed to the tyranny and haughtiness of the Scribes and Pharisees. This clause, πρᾶος—καρδία, is, in some measure, parenthetical; and meant by our Lord to recommend himself to their choice as a teacher. Ἀνάπαυσις denotes not only relief from the burdens of the Jewish ceremonial law, but relief from the sense of unforgiven sin; including all the comforts and blessings of the Gospel, both in this world and in the next.

30. χρηστός. As spoken of a burden, the word denotes easy (comp. 1 John v. 3), i. e. what is suited to the strength of the bearers. The meaning is: 'The services I shall require are a reasonable service, and comparatively light.' So Plato Epist. 8. μετρία ἡ Θεῷ δουλεία· ἄμετρος δὲ ἡ τοῖς ἀνθρώποις.

XII. 1. ἐν ἐκείνῳ τῷ καιρῷ. An indefinite phrase, signifying 'about that time,' not necessarily connecting what follows with the preceding. The exact time is indicated by Luke vi. 1.

—σάββασι. This term (by the usage of both the Sept. and the N. T.) has only the force of a singular. The Sabbath here meant is (as we find from Mark and Luke) the Sabbath called δευτερόπρωτον. Τίλλειν conjoined with ἐσθίειν, implies what Luke expresses by ψάχοντες. It appears from Deut. xxiii. 25, that it was allowed by the law, to pluck ears of corn with the hand in another's field.

2. οἱ δὲ Φαρ. εἶπον αὐτῷ. Luke makes the words addressed to the disciples; but there is, in reality, no discrepancy; for though addressed to them, they were meant for Jesus, and no doubt uttered in his hearing. Hence Luke himself expresses more strongly than Matthew and Mark, that Jesus made answer to them.

—ὁ οὐκ ἔξεστι κ. τ. λ. That, however, was a disputed point; for, though Moses had forbidden

all servile work on the Sabbath day;—it was a controverted point what was, and what was not such. Reaping was admitted to fall under the former class; and the plucking of ears, being a sort of reaping, was forbidden by the more rigid Rabbis. That rigidity, however, (especially when the action was done from necessity), was contrary to the spirit of the law. See Exod. xii. 16. But our Lord only meets the accusation, by urging, that the thing was not done purposely, but from necessity; on the score of which, or for the performance of a work of charity, he shows that the ceremonial law may be dispensed with.

3. αὐτός. This has no place in many of the MSS., and some Versions; and has been thrown out, or disapproved, by the Editors in general from Mill to Scholz, but is retained by Matthæi and Fritz: rightly, I think, for not only external but internal evidence, is in favour of the word; which, as Fritz, observes, is necessary to the connection: αὐτός—αὐτοῦ being said, κατ' ἐπαπό-θωσιν, of which he adduces several examples, from both the N. T. and the Classical writers, as Acts xi. 14. ὅς λαλήσει ῥήματα πρὸς σὺ ἐν οἷς σωθήσῃ σὺ καὶ πᾶς ὁ οἶκός σου. John ii. 12.

4. οἶκον τοῦ Θεοῦ. Not the Temple, (which was not then built,) but the court of the Tobernacle, which preceded it. See Horne's Introd.

—τοὺς ἀρτους τῆς προθέσεως for ἄρτους τοὺς προτιθεμένους, as often in the Sept. Εἰ μὴ is for ἀλλὰ, when a negative sentence has preceded. A use called Hebraistic; though occasionally found in the Classical writers. It occurs also at 1 Cor. vii. 17. Rev. ix. 4. [Comp. 1 Sam. xxi. 6. Exod. xxv. 30. Lev. xxiv. 6; viii. 31.]

5. ἐν τῷ νόμῳ. See Numb. xxviii. 9, from which and other passages of the O. T. it appears that more beasts were sacrificed (and, of course, slain and prepared for sacrifice) on the Sabbath than on any other day, and of course more servile work, of every kind, must have been done by the priests. From the above, then, and all such passages, the inference is, that 'the action, which would otherwise be a profaning of the Sabbath, being done by the especial command of God, the priests in doing what they do must be blameless.'

—βιβηκούσι. Not really so, but only in letter, not in spirit: as those may be said to violate a law, by doing what, unless the worship of God had excused it, it would not have been lawful for them to do. So the Rabbins speak, when they say that the Sabbath is lawfully violated by doing such and such sacerdotal works, and that ‘there is no Sabbatism in the Temple.’

6. τοῦ ἱεροῦ—ὧδε.] Our Lord here anticipates an objection; q. d. ‘But you are no Priest, nor is your work for the benefit of the Temple.’ To which he does not directly reply, ‘I am one greater than the Temple;’ but, modestly and delicately, ‘here is something (i. e. one) greater than the Temple;’ even the Lord of the Temple, whose coming was foretold by Malachi, iii. 1. Μεῖζον, which is preferred by nearly all the Editors and Commentators, and edited by Matth., Fritz., and Scholz, is evidently the true reading; being found in the greater part of the MSS., the Edit. Princ., and many of the Greek Fathers. The sense is the same as ver. 41. καὶ ἰδοὺ, πλείον Ἰωάνᾳ ὧδε (ἔστι): and 42. πλείον Σολομώνος, and Luke xi. 31.

7. εἰ δὲ ἐγνώκετε τί ἐστίν.] A delicate mode (as supr. ix. 13.) of asserting the excellency of a thing. The passage cited is Hos. vi. 6, before adduced at ix. 13. Ἐλεον and Θυσ. stand, respectively, for the virtues of charity and benevolence, and the works of the ceremonial law.

8. Κύριος—ἄνθρωπον.] Grot. and many other eminent Commentators maintain that ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου here signifies man generally; which may seem to be countenanced by the parallel passage of Mark ii. 28. But in all the other 87 passages of the N. T. where it occurs, the expression signifies the Son of man, the Messiah; which sense also the Article requires: whereas υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου without the Art. as invariably denotes a son of man, a man. Neither does the ῥῆμα at Mark ii. 28, compel us to take the phrase to denote man; since it may be constitutive, introductory of a new argument, and signify moreover; on which sense see examples in Hoogev. Part. See more in Hamm., Whitby, and Doddr. As to the γὰρ of the present passage, it may refer to something not expressed, but merely what is passing in the mind of the speaker; an idiom very frequent in all writers, Scriptural and Classical. And here the suppression is evidently from the same cause that produced the use of μεῖζον for μεῖζον. It will clear the construction to consider ver. 7 as parenthetical, and to refer the γὰρ to ver. 6; q. d. ‘There is one here greater than the Temple [and his sanction will warrant the breach of any such ceremonial institution as that of the Sabbath]; for the Son of man,’ &c. Thus the δὲ at ver. 6 has an explanatory force, and may be rendered now, as at Mark xvi. 8, εἰς δὲ αὐτοὺς τρόμος, and John vi. 10, ἦν δὲ χορτὸς πολλὸς ἐν τῷ τόπῳ. Acts xxiii. 11, in all which cases the passages are admitted to be parenthetical.

The καὶ before τοῦ σαββάτου is not found in the great body of the MSS., nor in several of the Greek Fathers; and is cancelled by Matth., Griesb., Knapp, Vater Fritz., and Scholz, as having probably been introduced from the parallel passages of Mark and Luke. And one can hardly imagine it to have been here omitted, in so many MSS., by accident or design; since in the passages of Mark and Luke not one MS. omits it. If retained, it may be rendered ‘even.’

9. αὐτῶν] i. e. of the people to whom he had now come.

10. τὴν χεῖρα ἔχων ξηράν.] Meaning (by the force of the Article, which is here, and in the parallel passage of Mark, used κατ’ ἐξοχὴν), the right hand, as expressed by Luke. This is not to be understood of a partial paralysis (as some suppose); but (according to the most accurate inquirers) of an atrophy of the limb, occasioned by an evaporation of the vital juices, involving an inability to move the nerves and muscles; which must also be meant at 1 Kings xiii. 4.

—ἐπηρώτησαν αὐτόν, &c.] Mark and Luke only say, ‘*touch*ed him;’ and do not mention any question, at least not expressly; though in the latter it is manifestly implied in the words ἐπερωτήσω ὑμᾶς τι (v. 9.)

—εἰ ἔξεστι, &c.] From the Rabbinical citations it appears that it had been decided by the Doctors unlawful to heal any one on the Sabbath-day, unless he were in imminent peril of life. Yet it appears from Luke xiv. 3, that our Lord, at length, made the Pharisees almost ashamed to advance the principle. [Comp. Luke xiii. 14. John ix. 16.]

11. τίς ἐστὶ ἐξ ὑμῶν, &c.] A form of speaking used when a general truth is to be illustrated by a particular example, see Herm. on Soph. Trach. 451. [Comp. Luke xiv. 4, 5.]

—ὅς ἔξει πρόβατον ἓν.] Some render, ‘a single sheep.’ But thus the comparison is perturbed and obscured, and that by προβ. ἓν is only meant, ‘a sheep,’ is plain from the parallel passage of Luke xiv. 5, τίς ἐξ ὑμῶν ὄνει ἢ βοῦν, &c. The expression is, in short, Hebraistic. So

1 Kings xx. 13, תנא נביא, a prophet; and Matt. xxi. 19, συκὴν μίαν. At ἰδὼν ἱμπίση there is a Hebrew or Hellenistic construction. Some, too, suppose an ἀνακούφισαν at οὐχὶ κρατήσῃ. But this is, with reason, rejected by Fritz. 'Ἐγερεῖ, 'will lift it out,' ἀνασπάσει, Luke xiv. 5. Of this, which is a rare sense of the word, an example has been adduced from Philo. This was, we find, allowed by the earlier Rabbins, but forbidden by the later ones.

12. καλῶς ποιεῖν.] Render, 'to do good.'

13. Having given this exposition of the true nature of the Sabbath, our Lord at once silences their cavils by miraculously healing the withered hand, and that without labour, even by the divine power of his word only.

— ἀποκαταστάθη.] The term properly signifies to bring any thing back to its former situation, or state; and figuratively, to restore to health, as in the Sept. and some later writers.

14. Comp. John x. 39. xi. 53.

15. ἀνεχ. ἐκείθεν.] Namely, as we find from Mark, to the sea-coast.

— καὶ ἠκολούθησαν, &c.] See a full account in Mark iii. 11.

17. ἔπειτα πληρωθῇ.] See Note supra i. 22.

18. (ἰδὼ, ὁ παῖς μου, &c.) This prophecy (from Is. xlii. 1.) differs in the wording somewhat from the Hebrew, and yet more from the Sept.; which is supposed to have been corrupted; and the words 'Ἰακώβ and 'Ἰσραὴλ (of which there are no traces in the Heb.) are thought to have been inserted by the Jews, that the passage might not be applied to the Messiah; but, I apprehend, without reason. The words were, it should seem, at first, noted in the marginal of some very ancient Archetypes; and then were introduced, inadvertently, into the text by the scribes. Thus Eusebius testifies that the words were, in his time, obelized in the Sept., and were not expressed in the other Greek Versions; that is, not even that of Aquila the Jew; which is certainly very adverse to the above suspicion. In short, in the first two verses (at least as far as οὐ σβίσσει), there is very little variation from the Hebrew, certainly none of any importance; and where there is any at all, it is justified by the Sept. And as to the variation of the Sept. from the Evangelist, it is not (up to the above words) any greater diversity than that of a free version as compared with a literal one; that is, if the words of the Sept. be emended from MSS., and a great corruption, which at present exists, be removed. For such I consider ἀνέσει, which yields a sense directly the reverse to that which is required by the context. I have no doubt but that the true reading is ἀναβσει, will exclaim.

The word occurs in Theocritus, Id. iv. 37, elsewhere. The abbreviation for αν is sometimes confounded with η. Bp. Randolph thinks the Evangelist here followed some old translation different from the Sept. But that is too hypothetical a view: whether there was any such version early as the time of St. Matthew may be doubtful. It should rather seem, that the Evangelist, serving the Sept. not to give a faithful representation of the original, corrected it agreeably thereto, and conformably to what had already appeared in the Syro-Chaldee edition of his Gospel.

The greatest difficulty, however, connected with this passage rests on the words ἰακὼβ—ἰσραὴλ. There is here a considerable variation from both the Sept. and the LXX; though it will be found to involve real discrepancy. Let us, however, first examine the variation between the Hebrew and Sept. The translators by ἰδὼ thought proper to give the meaning intended by the Prophet, as the literal expression; which would require ἦσονται. The sense is, the 'most renowned nations, not only the Jews, but the Gentiles; as to the diversity in νόμῳ (for the ἡγῆ means law or doctrine) we may either, Schleus., suppose νόμῳ to be used in the sense law or doctrine, as in various passages the N. T., which he so explains in his Lex. Test.; or we may suppose the true reading νόμῳ. So in Ps. cxx. 4, instead of ἐν νόμῳ, several MSS. have νόμου, which is required by the Hebrew, and was edited by Grabe; ever, as both methods seem somewhat probable, I should prefer supposing that the Sept. here, as before, chose to express the law in a very free version; and that the Evangelist followed the Sept. as far as he thought it faithful, and to his purpose.

But there yet remains one diversity suggested; which is, I apprehend, quite probable, namely, ἀνακάμψῃ. But this suspect, proceeds from corruption in text. For ἀναλ, I have no doubt, wrote ἀνακάμψῃ; and also that a title has here (as occasionally in slipped out. Thus οὐκ ἀνακ., 'his way or deist.' (See Cebeas cited by in v.) expresses the true sense ἡγῆ μή. Finally, to advert to between the Hebrew and the LXX, consists, 1. in the omission of and 2. in the change of others. I apprehend, involves any real the sense, as will be seen, is ἡγῆ. The Evangelist seems to have 1

μου, ὃν ἡρέτισα· ὁ ἀγαπητός μου, εἰς ὃν εὐδόκησεν
 ἡ ψυχὴ μου. Θήσω τὸ πνεῦμά μου ἐπ' αὐτόν, καὶ
 19 κρίσιν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν ἀπαγγελεῖ. Οὐκ ἐρίσει, οὐδὲ

 20 φωνὴν αὐτοῦ. Κάλαμον συντετριμμένον οὐ κατεάξει, καὶ λίνον τυφόμενον οὐ σβέσει· ἕως ἂν ἐκβάλῃ 21 εἰς νίκος τὴν κρίσιν. καὶ [ἐν] τῷ ὀνόματι αὐτοῦ ἔθνη ἐλπιούσι.
 22 Τότε προσηνέχθη αὐτῷ δαιμονιζόμενος, τυφλὸς καὶ κωφός, 14

 Οὗτος οὐκ ἐκβάλλει τὰ δαιμόνια, εἰ μὴ ἐν τῷ Βεελζεβούλ

part of the words, because they were not very suitable to his purpose; and probably were even then very corrupt in the Sept.: and in expressing the sense of the others, he chose (as is often done in Scripture) to blend together the two clauses ἐποσὶν καὶ πνεῦμα and ἐποσὶν καὶ πνεῦμα into one, and express the SUBSTANCE of them. So that the sense of the words ἕως ἐκβάλῃ (answering to ἐξέλθῃ in the Sept.) εἰς νίκος τὴν κρίσιν is this: 'And thus will it be until he send forth [over the whole earth] his Rule of life [the Gospel] conquering and to conquer: literally for conquest; namely spiritual conquest. On this sense of κρίσιν see Schleusn. and Wahl, and Bp. Lowth on Is. xlii. 4. The article is, as often, put for the pronoun possessive; as the later Syriac translator saw, and also the early interpreters; for to them we may attribute the αὐτοῦ which is added in several MSS. The Evangelist has shown the true application of the prophecy; the chief import of which is centred in the second verse. The whole has reference to the quiet and unostentatious mode in which Christ promulgated his religion; not resorting to violence or clamour, or offering resistance to oppression; but employing the mildest means: by which, however, it would at length be spread over all the nations of the universe.

— ὁ παῖς μου.] The Messiah is spoken of under the name of παῖς, from his having taken upon him the form of a servant (Phil. ii. 7.) and from his general obedience, in quality of Son, to God the Father.

— ἡρέτισα.] Ἀιρετίζω signifies properly to choose, and from thence, as here, to love and favour.

20. λίνον τυφόμενον] i. e. a smoking lamp-wick, τῶφ., dimly burning, and ready to go out in smoke. So Plut. Solon. l. παριφύλαξι τυφομένην ἀπὸ πυρὸς, ἐπὶ ἥσαν, φλόγα. In this and the former we have lively images of extreme weakness, importing profound humility and contrition. And here (as often in the Greek writers) by the negation of one thing is implied the affirmative of the contrary; q. d. he will struggle with wavering faith, and remains nearly extinct piety.

21. καὶ ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι αὐτοῦ—ἐλπ.] These words correspond exactly with the Sept., but not literally with the Hebrew, which may be rendered, 'And for his law the isles shall wait.' But by ἐν the Prophet, we may suppose, meant Gen. tiles the most distant. For ἐν the Sept. expressed the general sense freely, which, according to a closer rendering, is that 'in his name and ἐν Law, or Revelation, shall the uttermost Gentiles trust for salvation.'

The ἐν does not appear in various MSS., the Ed. Princ., and some Fathers; is marked for omission by Wets. and Vater; and is cancelled by Matth., Griesb., and Scholz. But as both the Heb. and Sept. have a preposition, it should seem probable that the sacred writer, in adopting this image from the Sept., would take the preposition as well as the other words; which, indeed, can scarcely be dispensed with, since its omission destroys the construction. And in all other cases some preposition, either ἐν or ἐν, is used. So in Rom. xv. 12, ἐν αὐτῷ ἔθνη ἐλπιοῦσι, and 1 Cor. xv. 19.

23. Ἐξίσταντο.] Ἐξίστασθαι properly signifies, by an ellipsis of τοῦ νοῦ, to be moved out of one's mind; and fig. to be greatly astonished. Μῆτι is to be rendered num, or an forte, not num; for, the former implies that diabolist, proponderates; the latter, belief. The multitude seems to have spoken thus modestly, to avoid offending the Pharisees. By υἱὸς Δαυὶδ is meant the Messiah, promised under that character. The multitude inferred Jesus to be such, from the fulfilment, under their eyes, of the prophecy of Is. xxxv. 5.

24. The Pharisees, being compelled to acknowledge the working of miracles by Jesus, endeavour to elude the proof of his Messiahship, by imputing the thing to diabolical agency.

— οὐκ ἐκβάλλει—εἰ μὴ.] This is not merely an idiomatic way of saying δαιμόνια ἐκβάλλει ἐν τῷ Βεελ. (as the Latin non nisi) but rather a sort of unwilling admission of the fact.

— ἀρχόντι τῶν δαιμ.] Not only was a hierarchy of good angels held, but a subordination and headship was believed to exist among the evil ones. And this not only by the Incarnators and Exorcists, &c., but by the Rabbis, and even the Grecian Philosophers.

 28 καὶ ὁ μὴ συνάγων μετ' ἐμοῦ σκορπίζει. Διὰ τοῦτο λέγω 31

25. εἰδὼς τὰς ἐνθυμήσεις.] This does not refer to what immediately precedes, but to something then said by our Lord, but unrecorded by Matthew, though preserved by Luke xi. 16. Ἰταροὶ δὲ, πειράζοντες, σημείον παρ' αὐτοῦ ἔχθουν ἐξ οὐρανοῦ. Comp. infra ix. 3, with the parallel passages.

— πᾶσα βασιλεία, &c.] The above foul imputation our Lord now rebuts; using a proverbial saying (similar to many cited from the Greek and Rabbinical writers) in which we have an argumentum ab absurdo; q. d. 'The safety of a state or of a family is promoted by concord, and destroyed by dissension.' Now, if Satan were to combine with me in expelling his demons from the bodies of men, whither he has empowered them to enter, he would be at variance with himself, would act foolishly, and his authority could not continue.

27. Having shown the absurdity of their argument, he now turns their own weapons against them.

— ἐν Βεελζεβούλ.] That there were persons among the Jews who professed to cast out demons by exorcisms, and invocation of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, we learn both from the Scriptures (see Luke ix. 49. Acts xix. 13. Mark ix. 38), and from Joseph. Ant. viii. 2, 5. vii. 6, 3, and from the early Fathers (as Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Origen, Tertullian, and others); also Lucian, Trag. p. 171. The argument, therefore, is, 'If those who cast out demons prove themselves to be leagued with Satan, then must your disciples be also leagued with him; and the censure will apply to them as well as unto me.' It affects not the argument whether the demons were really expelled by such exorcism (though it might sometimes happen, by the permission of God); it is sufficient for the argumentum ad hominem, that the Pharisees thought they were expelled, and did not attribute it to the agency of Satan. Yiol, by an idiom derived from the customs of the Jews, denotes disciples. See 1 Kings xx. 35. 2 Tim. i. 2.

28. ἐν πνεύματι Θεοῦ 'by divine energy,' as in Luke xi. 20, ἐν δατύλῃ Θεοῦ. See Middleton, G. A. p. 168. The reasoning is this: 'But if I cast out demons by divine power, I perform miracles by the aid of God: hence it follows, that I am sent from God. But if I be sent from God, you should believe me, when I announce to you the kingdom of God.'

— ἔφθασεν.] Schmid. and Fritz. take this to be a strong expression, signifying 'is come upon you before you are aware.' It rather means, 'is already come upon you.' So in Luke xi. 20. 1 Thess. ii. 16.

29. The purpose of this verse is to show, by a fresh illustration, the folly of supposing that he acts by a power from, and consequently under Satan; since he evinces superiority over him, by overpowering him, and despoiling him of his authority; q. d. 'If (as all must confess) he who binds another is stronger than he who is bound by him, you will easily perceive that I must be far more powerful than the Prince of demons.'

— ἢ πᾶσι.] This use of ἢ (else) is remarkable. It may be rendered or else. Examples may be seen in Robinson's Lex. in voc. 2. a., in addition to which I add Joseph. Bell. ii. 2, 5, fin. ἢ ποταπὸν——; ἢ πᾶσι is here, as often, used in questions which serve to affirm the contrary; q. d. 'ye cannot.'

30. ὁ μὴ ὦν, &c.] Here we have another proverb; of which the converse holds equally true, (and is used by Christ at Luke ix. 50); as often in adages, (see Prov. xxvi. 4, 5,) each being applicable, according to circumstances. On the distinct measure and proper import of each, see Bp. Taylor's Works, xiv. 301, and Simoon's Hor. Hom. vii. 282. The scope of the reasoning is, that 'there can be no collusion between Satan and himself; since they are, and must necessarily be, in opposition to each other,' agreeably to the proverb, &c.

— σκορπίζει.] This, like συνάγω before, seems to have been an agricultural term; the former signifying to scatter abroad grass, to be made into hay; the latter, to collect it, when hayed, into heaps.

31. διὰ τοῦτο.] Our Lord now proceeds to declare the awful nature of the sin they had been guilty of. Comp. Luke xii. 10. And here it may be observed that there is scarcely any point in the interpretation of the N. T. which has been more debated than the nature of the BLASPHEMY AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT, of which it is here said, that 'it shall not be forgiven.' It would be a waste of time to read, still more to detail and review, the far greater part of the interpretations propounded by Theologians, ancient and modern, of this verse. These may, however, be seen in the Critici Sacri, Poole's Syn. Suicer's Thesaur. i. 69, 8, Wolf, Köcher, Kuinoel, and lastly in Bingham's Antiquities of the Christian Church, L. xvi. ch. 7. In order to ascertain the true sense, it is of importance to attend carefully to the connection, and to gather what help we can from the parallel passages. Now the connection should seem to be decided by the formula διὰ τοῦτο, which introduces what is said; and has reference not so much to the words which have just preceded, as to the whole of the foregoing matter; and especially points at the diabolical calumny which had been uttered by the Scribes, in attributing the undisputed miracles of Christ to the agency of the Devil; as is certain from Mark iii. 28, 30, ὅτι ἔλεγον· πνεῦμα ἀκάθαρτον ἔχει, of which the full sense is [‘this denunciation was uttered] because they said,’ &c. The main question on which the whole hinges is, whether it be the conduct of the Pharisees on this particular occasion, that is meant, or that of the same persons soon afterwards, by similarly calumniating the supernatural gifts of the Spirit, shortly afterwards poured forth, after the resurrection and ascension of Christ. The latter view is strenuously and ably maintained by Whitby, Baxter, Hanm., Dodder, and Mack., whose arguments may be stated in the words of Mr. Holden, as follows: ‘1. It is declared, that whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him;’ and, therefore, the Pharisees, in calumniating his miracles, were not guilty of the unpardonable sin. ‘2dly. The sin against the Holy Ghost could not be committed during our Saviour’s abode on earth, as the Holy Ghost was not given till after his ascension, John vii. 39. xvi. 7. Acts ii. 1, seq. 3dly. In St. Luke xii. 10, our Saviour makes the same declaration respecting this sin, when no calumny against him was uttered.’ These arguments, however, are by no means conclusive. As to the 1st and 3d, they proceed on a false supposition; for blasphemy could be committed during our Saviour’s lifetime; since, though the Holy Ghost was not given to men until after Christ’s ascension, and even then only occasionally and limitedly, to Christ it was given perpetually, and without measure; as is plain from John iii. 34, οὐ γὰρ ἐκ μέτρου δίδωσιν ὁ Θεὸς τὸ Πνεῦμα, where compare the text. The 3d argument has not the least cogency; since in St. Luke the order of the events is very little observed, and the occasions when things were said, is often rather intimated than indicated. The only one of any weight that has been urged is, that the Pharisees present could not be thought utterly inexcusable, since the crowning evidence of Christ’s Messiahship, by his resurrection and the subsequent effusion of the Holy Spirit, had not yet been afforded. But that argument is more specious than solid; and involves a sitting in judgment on our God’s proceedings: in the words of St. Paul, it is ὑπερφρονεῖν παρ’ ὃ δεῖ φρονεῖν. The crime of the Pharisees was, assuredly, all things considered, greater than that committed by those who afterwards spoke evil of the supernatural gifts of the Holy Spirit. It was, as Archbp. Secker observes, ‘the greatest and most wilful obstinacy in wrong that can be imagined, when they and all around them saw the most illustrious and beneficial miracles done in confirmation of the most holy and benevolent doctrines, to stand out in opposition to both; to insist that the Devil conspired against himself, rather than own the finger of God, where it was so exceedingly visible; not only to oppose, but to revile, the strongest evidence laid before them in the fullest manner, and that, very probably, against the secret conviction of their own hearts; such behaviour manifests the most hardened and desperate wickedness.’ In short, when we consider the extreme harshness of supposing, that what was said in immediate connection with the conduct of the Pharisees, and introduced by a formula confusing it to that, was not meant to be understood of that, but of another offence which bore an affinity to it, we shall see that the interpretation in question is really untenable. There is the more reason to warn Biblical students against embracing it; since it was the adoption of it by the Latin and some Greek Fathers, and the subsequent extension of it to speaking evil of the operations of the Holy Spirit generally, even of his graces, which opened a door to the grievous errors into which those Theologians, of the ancient and earlier modern School fell, who almost made the Sin (as they inaccurately term it) against the Holy Ghost, to consist in a wilful opposition to the teaching of the Spirit, in respect to what such men persuade themselves is alone the truth, as it is in Jesus. Hence the passage has been quoted by Romanists against Protestants, and by Protestants against Romanists; by orthodox Protestants against heterodox Protestants; and might be adduced by the maintainers of the lying miracles of the day against those who reject them. Nay, it has been explained of obstinate resistance to the graces of the Holy Spirit by invincible hardness of heart and impenitence; or of apostasy, or of falling into mortal sins after the grace of the Holy Spirit in baptism. Yet those who maintain these various views are constrained to, virtually at least, admit the crime to be pardonable; which seems contrary to our Saviour’s words. Besides, it could not be the design of our Lord, to utter what should prove, as it were, a trap for the consciences of men; and should operate to fill timid, though sincerely pious persons, with vain alarm; or to furnish arms for Church polemics to wield one against another ad infinitum. At the same time it must be remembered that most of the offences which have been thought to constitute the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, bear some affinity thereto; being, if not blasphemy, at least sin against the Holy Spirit, ‘doing despite to the Spirit of Grace, and bringing swift destruction on those who habitually commit them.’

Λέγω δὲ ὑμῖν, 36 ὅτι πᾶν ῥῆμα ἀργόν, ὃ ἐὰν λαλήσωσιν οἱ ἄνθρωποι, ἀποδώσουσι περὶ αὐτοῦ λόγον ἐν ἡμέρᾳ κρίσεως. Ἐκ γὰρ τῶν 37 λόγων σου δικαιωθήσῃ, καὶ ἐκ τῶν λόγων σου καταδικασθήσῃ.

Τότε ἀπεκρίθησάν τινες τῶν Γραμματέων καὶ Φαρισαίων 38

32. οὔτε ἐν τούτῳ—μέλλοντι.] According to a common form of speaking frequently used by the Jews, importing never. So R. Eleazer (of the Samaritans) 'You shall not build with us, either in this world, or the world to come.' For presumptuous sins, like this, no expiation was provided, even under the Jewish law.

—τούτῳ τῷ.] The greater part of the MSS., and many early Editions have τῷ νῦν, which is confirmed by 1 Tim. vi. 17. 2 Sam. iv. 10. Tit. ii. 12, is preferred by Wets., and edited by Matthæi and Scholz. And this I should have received, had it not been liable to some suspicion of having arisen ex interpretatione. Besides, none of the passages cited from the Rabbins support it.

33. ἢ ποιήσατε, &c.] 'ponite, suppose, consider.' A Latinism for τίθετε. Robinson (Lex.) explains it, 'to make [by supposition], as we should say, assume the tree to be good.' So Dionys. Hal. Ant. iv. 6. Xen. Anab. v. 7, 9, ποιεῖν δὲ ὑμᾶς ἑξαπατηθέντας—ὅπ' ἐμοῦ ἦκειν εἰς Φᾶσιν. There is here a return to the course of argument, interrupted by the solemn warning at vv. 31, 32. The words, which have the air of an adage, are by some Expositors applied to the Pharisees. And this may seem supported by the parallel passages at Matt. vii. 17, and Luke vi. 44. But from the context, they are better referred (with the best Commentators), to our Lord himself. q. d. 'Account the tree as good, which produces good fruit; or the tree bad, which produces bad fruit. The goodness of my doctrine argues its divine origin, as good fruit a good tree.'

34. Our Lord now applies the argument adverted to in the foregoing verse. Πῶς δύνασθε ἀγ. λαλεῖν. A popular idiom, importing that it is morally possible. On γενν. ἐχιδ. see Note supra, iii. 7. A yet stronger expression occurs at xiii. 33.

—ἐκ γὰρ τοῦ περισσεύματος, &c.] A proverbial expression, with which Wets. compares Menand. ἄνδρος χαρακτήρ ἐκ λόγων γνωρίζεται. Aristid. οἷος ὁ τρόπος, τοιούτος καὶ ὁ λόγος.

35. ἐκβάλλει.] For προφέρει. It is not, however, a Hebraism, as some say; for examples are adduced from the best Greek writers.

—τῆς καρδίας] is omitted in the greater part of the MSS., the Edit. Princ., and several Versions and Fathers; and is cancelled or rejected by all the Editors from Mill downwards. It was, no doubt, inserted from the preceding verse, or the parallel passage in Luke vi. 45. The τὰ before ἀγαθὰ has no place in very many MSS., the Edit. Princ., Matthæi, and Scholz, and liable to the strong objections stated by Middleton. Some, indeed, as Raphael, Wets., and Fritz., trace a peculiar sense arising from the addition of the Art. to ἀγαθὰ, and its rejection after πονηρά. But on the sense itself they widely differ; and the principle on which they go is too fanciful to be admitted.

36. Our Lord here closes his address by a solemn declaration, intimating that for such sins of the tongue God would bring them into judgment.

—ἀργόν.] On the sense of this word there has been no little difference of opinion. Some explain it vain, unedifying. And there is something to countenance this in the use of the Chald. ܐܪܓܢ. And so Joseph. Antiq. xv. 8, 4. λόγος ἀργὸν εἶναι, 'without producing any effect.' But although that sense (which is ably supported by Wets.) may be not inapposite, yet it is not so apt as that of useless, pernicious, propounded by others; in which there is a litotes common to many words of similar signification. The scope of the passage, however, is most in favour of the interpretation of Chrysa., Whitby, and Campb., false, meaning especially falsehood, combined with calumny, such as the Pharisees were guilty of. Oldshausen would take it to denote the language of a man who speaks one thing, and means another. But this is too confined a sense to suit v. 37. And as the two first interpretations merge into each other, and may include the third, so the most extensive sense is to be preferred. With respect to the syntax, there is here what is called a Nom. absolute, occasioned by the abandonment of the construction.

39. Θέλομεν—ἰδεῖν.] This was a demand often made, (see infra xvi. 1. Mark viii. 11. Luke xi. 16.) and probably founded on the prophecy of Daniel vii. 13, which describes the Son of man as coming in the clouds of heaven. Inasmuch that it was almost a characteristic of the Jews to ask a sign. So 1 Cor. i. 22. of Ἰουδαῖοι σημεῖον αἰτοῦσι. We find from Luke xi. 16, that the sign they asked was one from heaven. They had witnessed several δυνάμεις, or ordinary miracles, on earth; and they seem to demand the appearance of some celestial one, which would be the strongest test of Jesus's pretensions. Our Lord, however, knowing that the demand was made from bad motives, refused to comply with it.

39. μοιχαλίς.] This is not (what the Lexicographers say) the same with μοιχάς; but it is a diminutive form thereof (like others in -αλίς), expressive of contempt, as γυνάρια 2 Tim. iii. 6. This is by some understood of adultery figuratively, i. e. idolatry. But of that there is no reason to think the Jews of Christ's age were guilty. The term may be taken of adultery in the proper sense, which was then exceedingly prevalent. But it should rather seem to denote the spiritual adultery of living without God in the world. For the marriage covenant, which the Jewish nation was typified as having entered into with God, might be broken by godlessness as much as by idolatry. 'Ἐπιζητεῖ. The ἐπι is intensive, denoting, 'pertinaciously seeketh, or continually seeketh.'

—σημ. οὐ δοθ. εἰ μὴ τὸ σημ. Ἰωῶνᾶ] q. d. the proof of my divine mission shall be an event no other than what happened to Jonah. See Jonah ii. 1, 2.

40. τοῦ κήτους.] It is now generally agreed that this denotes, not the whale, but another large fish called Lamia, of the shark genus. See Horne's Introd. ii. 560. 'Ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ τῆς γῆς is said to be a Hebraism for ἐν τῇ γῇ; but a similar expression occurs in our own and most other languages. On the Jewish mode of reckoning time, by which small parts of days were counted as whole days, and accordingly a space of time not two whole days might be computed as three days and nights, see Horne's Introd. iii.

180 sq. This custom, however, was not, as he imagines, exclusively Jewish; but may also be noticed among the Greeks. Thus Thucyd. vii. 75. τρίτῃ ἡμέρᾳ ἐπὶ τῆς ναυμαχίας, that being only what we should call the second day.

41. ἄνδρες Νινευῖται.] This pleonasm of ἄνδρες is common in the Greek writers, and may be considered a vestige of the wordiness of primitive phraseology. Ἀναστήσονται—κατακρινοῦσιν αὐτήν. There is something refined, and perhaps Oriental, in the turn of this and the next verse, by which the Ninevites and the Queen of the South are supposed to bear testimony against the Jews, as to the transactions here mentioned; and, by that testimony, be the means of increasing the condemnation of the Jews by the contrast. So κατακρ. is used also at Heb. xi. 7.

—μετενόησαν, &c. The Ninevites had repented at the preaching of Jonah, though he worked no miracles in proof of his Divine mission, and his conduct was in many respects such as to leave no favourable impression; whereas with Christ all was widely different.

42. περάτων τῆς γῆς.] A usual phrase to denote a remote country; such as was Sheba. (See 1 Kings x. 1. 2 Chron. ix. 1.)

—πλείον Σολ. ὧδε.] Namely, a greater in all respects, and not least in that wherein Solomon was greatest; for though Solomon was the wisest of men, yet Christ was Wisdom itself, 'the eternal Word' (Prov. iii. 19.), 'who is made unto us Wisdom.' (1 Cor. i. 30.)

43—45. The difficulty of this passage is not in itself, but in its connection, i. e. to determine whether it belongs to the verses immediately preceding, viz. v. 38—42, or to the whole narration, v. 22—42. If to the former, it is meant as a warning to those who had been demanding a sign. And then the most probable interpretation will be that of Kaufmann, cited by Kuin.; q. d. 'Though I were to give you a sign from heaven, yet the effect would be but momentary; the demon of infidelity and obstinacy would return, and, seizing you with greater violence, would but increase your final condemnation.' This, however, is somewhat harsh and forced. Hence it is better to suppose (with others) that the reference is to the whole of the above portion. So Mr. Groswell heads his Section

38—45. (which he divides into two Sub-sections, 38—42. and 43—45.): 'Phariseis signum flagitantibus primum respondet; deinde ad priorem sermonem revertitur.' And so Bengel. This, too, is confirmed by Luke bringing in the words of v. 24—26. immediately after the words which terminate v. 30. Moreover, the Article at ἀνθρώπου may be rendered, 'the man,' i. e. the kind of person above mentioned, a dæmoniac. That the reference is not to those Pharisees who had been just asking a sign, but to the unbelieving, or half-believing, part of the Jewish nation in general, is plain from v. 45. τῇ γενεᾷ ταύτῃ, compared with γενεὰ πονηρὰ at v. 39. An impressive warning is suggested, drawn from the well-known case of a dæmoniac, who, after a half-recovery, succeeded by a relapse, becomes worse than ever. At the same time, the illustration is capable of a general application suited to all times and persons of every age. With respect to the minor circumstances of the illustration, they are merely accessory, and accommodated to the notions of the Jews, as to the haunts and habits of demons (who, they supposed, chiefly abode in waterless deserts), and also as to those of dæmoniacs. Thus the words ζητοῦν ἀνάπαυσιν (in search of rest) καὶ οὐχ εὐρίσκει are accommodated to the latter; since restlessness was the characteristic symptom of the δαίμονιζόμενοι or persons possessed.

44. σχολάζοντα.] Many render, 'unoccupied, uninhabited;' alleging a passage of Plut. C. Gracchus, 12. καὶ τῷ δήμῳ σχολάζοντα μεθ' ἡμῶν ἀπέδειξε τὸν τόπον. But it should seem to mean (as others understand) 'ready for his reception.' So in the Test. Patr. cited by Bretschneider, we read: δύο πνεύματα σχολάζουσι τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ, &c.

— κεκοσμη.] Literally, 'put in right order;' from κόσμος, ordo. A beautiful image to represent saneness, as opposed to that dérangement by insanity which our great Dramatic Poet finely compares to 'Sweet bells jangled out of tune;' disorder being to the eye as discord to the ear.

45. ἑπτὰ.] A definite for an indefinite number, to denote a sufficient number for the purpose. Καὶ γίνεται τὰ ἐσχάτα, &c. A proverbial expression. Comp. 2 Pet. ii. 20, 21. Heb. vi. 4. x. 26. The words οὕτως ἔσται—πονηρὰ serve to show the scope of the illustration; the state of that man being a representation of that of the generation of the men in question, in whose minds and hearts the evil principles of infidelity and wickedness had taken such a hold, that, in spite of every means for their reformation, the evil would return, and the people grow worse and worse.

46. From the parallel passages of Mark and Luke it appears that the earnest vehemence of our Lord's address to the unbelieving Jews was by his mother and relations thought to exceed all bounds of discretion, and likely to draw destruction upon him. They therefore sent to call him forth, and prevail on him to desist. This gave our Lord an opportunity of evincing his own single-hearted devotedness to the work his heavenly Father had given him to do, and the near and dear relation in which all his true disciples of every age would bear to him.

— οἱ ἀδελφοὶ αὐτοῦ.] It is not agreed whether by this expression are meant brothers, or half-brothers, sons of Joseph by a former wife, or cousins. But see Fritz. on Matt. xiii. 55. The ancient Commentators in general adopt the last-mentioned interpretation; which may, however, be accounted for from their desire to uphold the opinion of the perpetual virginity of Mary. But, on an impartial consideration of the question, it will, I think, sufficiently appear that the first-mentioned sense is that required by all the ordinary and most approved rules of philology, which forbid the abandonment of the proper and usual signification of a word without some cogent reason. A reason which certainly does not exist in the present instance; for there is not a particle of evidence that Joseph had a wife before Mary. And the force of Ecclesiastical tradition, that these were cousins of Jesus, is weakened by its want of uniformity, and is well nigh negated by what seems much like positive evidence in Scripture (see Matt. i. 25.), that Mary had afterwards other children. Besides, the air of a passage further on, ch. xiii. 55, 56. would of itself be sufficient to decide the question; for no one who was ignorant of the debates that have been raised on this question, would ever doubt the meaning to be, the brothers of Jesus, and sons of Joseph and Mary.

48. τίς ἐστίν, &c.] Our Lord put this interrogatory in order to show them, in the most marked manner (δακτυλῶς), who those were that sustained the nearest relation towards him.

49 ἀδελφοί μου ; Καὶ ἐκτείνας τὴν χεῖρα αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τοὺς μαθητὰς 3.

50. μου ἀδελφός, &c.] The Commentators notice the ellipse of ὡς, quasi, and compare a similar one of the Heb. 3; also adducing examples of a similar idiom in the Greek and Latin. But, as Fritz has rightly remarked, no such ellipse must here be supposed, which would destroy the force of the address. [Comp. John xv. 14.]

XIII. 1. ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐκείνῃ.] Meaning the very day on which the events recorded in the preceding Chapter took place. See Luke v. 17. — ἀπὸ τῆς οἰκίας.] Namely, that in which our Lord dwelt at Capernaum.

2. τὸ πλοῖον.] The Art. may denote either the vessel kept for Jesus, or one belonging to the Apostles; or, indeed, both. See Middleton.

3. εἰστήκει:] 'stabat, was standing.' So εἰστή-κισαν, supra, xii. 46.

— παραβολαῖς.] The word παραβολή, in its general sense, denotes, 1. a justa-position of one thing with another; 2. a comparison of the one with the other, in point of similarity or dissimilarity; 3. an illustration of any thing resulting from a comparison of it with another thing. In Rhetoric it is defined, 'that species of the genus ALLEGORY, which consists of a continued narration of real or fictitious events, applied, by way of simile, to the illustration of moral truth.' In Scripture, it may be defined generally as a similitude, derived from natural things, in order to instruct men in things spiritual. In the Old Test. it sometimes denotes merely a proverb or pithy apophthegm (Heb. ḥam), and sometimes a weighty truth, couched under enigma or figure. While in the New Test. it generally denotes a fable or apologue; namely, a narration applied, with more or less of enigma, by way of simile, to the illustration of moral or religious truths. In this use, the Parable consists of two parts: 1. the Prothesis, conveying merely the LITERAL sense; 2. the Apodosis, presenting the thing signified by the similitude, the EXPLANATION, and containing the mystical sense couched therein. The second part may be dispensed with, and was often omitted by our Lord, from the causes adverted to infra, v. 13. The Parables of Christ were of two sorts:

1. such as contained illustrations of moral doctrines, and the duties of man to man; 2. such as signified, though obscurely and sub involucri, the nature of the Gospel, and the future state of the Church. These could not be understood without the previous comprehension of certain matters which required to be cleared up by our Lord himself, or by the Holy Spirit, who was promised 'to guide the Apostles into all truth.' For the right

explanation of the Parables (especially when they are without the Apodosis), we must, 1. ascertain their general scope or design; which is to be collected from the context, and the occasion on which the parable was spoken; 2. we must first trace the literal or external sense, and then open out the mystical or internal: 3. we must give due attention to historical circumstances, and make ourselves acquainted with the nature and properties of the things whence the similitudes are taken, the peculiar genius of the composition itself, and the local and national circumstances of the hearers: 4. we must avoid a too minute scrupulosity, by pressing on single words or phrases; nor must we aim at accommodating every part to the general spiritual intent of the parable; since few correspond throughout to the thing compared, many circumstances being introduced which serve only (like drapery in a picture) for ornament and effect. Such may suggest, but they rarely establish, some collateral truth. They more frequently serve only to illustrate the general meaning, and heighten the general effect. To the general scope, then, our attention must chiefly be directed, without entering into too close an examination into minute particulars. A procedure, indeed, which were inconsistent with the simplicity of purpose every where observable in the Parables of our Lord, which, as Mr. Ogilvie, in his Bampton Lectures for 1836, remarks, 'furnish principles of action, rather than precise and definite rules of conduct. And while they stand far removed from the stiffness and formality of tedious directions for the minute details of daily behaviour, stand equally distant from the vague generalities of abstract theory.' Indeed our Lord's own example, in the exposition of some of his own Parables, may teach us to dwell on their general scope, rather than on such minuter features as are but accessory, and subsidiary to the main purpose. And even in illustrating the external sense, by a discussion of the historical circumstances, &c., we should beware of heaping together so cumbersome a load of matter, as, by an over curious examination into minute particulars, may overlay the beautiful simplicity of the Parable, and rather obscure than illustrate its real import.

To advert briefly to the reasons why parabolic instruction was resorted to by our Lord, in preference to a more regular mode:—1. As it was the most ancient mode of instruction, so it was the customary one throughout the East, and was well adapted to the character of the Eastern nations, where it is prevalent to this day. 2. It had many advantages, both to the hearers and to the speaker, especially the former; because, as Mrs.

H. More well observes, 'it is naturally adapted to engage the attention, and is level with the capacity of all; and conveys moral or religious truths in a more vivid and impressive manner than the dry didactic mode; and by laying hold of the imagination, insinuates itself into the understanding and affections, and, while it opens the doctrine it professes to conceal, it gives no alarm to men's prejudices.' Nay, Maimonides Port. Mos. p. 84. (cited by Weta.) goes so far as to say, 'Non potest doceri vulgus, nisi per enigmata et parabolas, ut ita communis sit ista docendi ratio mulieribus etiam puerisque et parvulis, quo, cum perfecti evaserint intellectus ipsorum, parabolarum istarum sensus dignoscant.' Nor was it so very obscure to attentive and inquiring auditors. And as to such as would neither exercise attention and thought, nor seek elucidation from the speaker,—they must be presumed to be indisposed to receive the instruction, and consequently unworthy of it. This mode had also the advantage, as far as it was really obscure, (which was only in a comparatively small degree, and chiefly as they were prophetic), of exercising, and consequently invigorating, the understanding. And it was never the intention of God that man should attain heavenly knowledge any more than earthly, without pains and attention. Parabolic instruction was therefore adopted, among other reasons, in order (to use the words of Justin Martyr cited by Grot.) ὥστε καὶ ποιῆσαι τοὺς ζητούντας αὐρεῖν καὶ μαθεῖν.

Of course, the foregoing view of the purpose of parabolic instruction is inconsistent with the opinion strenuously contended for by some learned and excellent writers, that the Parables were meant not to instruct, but to hide from all but Christ's constant hearers and faithful followers, those lessons of virtue and piety, which his words might to them, but could not to others, convey: in short, that his Parables were adapted to a state of judicial blindness; and consequently, that the real intent of this mode of teaching was punitive. An opinion which, though it may seem countenanced by a few passages of the Gospels, and may admit of something to be urged in its defence, is wholly untenable. Its origin is ably traced, and the insecure foundation on which it rests evinced by Mr. Ogilvie in the 4th and 5th of his Bampton Lectures, who uproots the only foundations of such a notion by observing at large, that 'the passages of Matth. ix. 25, 26. and xiii. 10—17. (and the parallels) Luke x. 21. and John xii. 37—40, so triumphantly appealed to by its supporters, have no such sense as they affirm.' See the Notes on each. The learned Lecturer also points out how irreconcilable the opinion is with our Lord's express declarations, of the ends of his ministry,—with the plain matter of fact, as shown in the attention of some, and the offence of other hearers; and, finally, with the reason of things, and the very nature of the case; since the universal consent of men of all ages, and every variety of mental character, assigns to the Parabolic mode of instruction quali-tics and effects directly opposite to those maintained in the above-mentioned opinion. An opinion (I would further observe) sufficiently negatived by what is said further on, iv. 34, that he spoke to the people in parables, 'according as they were able to hear them;' which is utterly inconsistent with the idea that they were spoken in order not to be heard or understood. In short, as Mr. Ogilvie has proved, 'the two instances, of miracles and parables, were regarded by our Lord as corresponding with each other, in cause, tendency, and result (see Luke x. 21. and Note, and John x. 37.) we should not be justified in assigning to the latter a character of studied obscurity, and an express purpose of concealment, which we cannot perceive to belong to the former.' There is the more reason to caution students of the Divine word against this error, since, as long as the opinion is entertained, that the Parables were spoken for the sake of concealment, not instruction, (namely, to punish obstinacy and hardness of heart by withholding information), occasion will be given to run into the other error, against which I have already protested—that of a frivolous minuteness of search after hidden meanings, which ill accord with the beautiful simplicity of parabolical instruction.

To proceed to the first Parable that follows, that of the SOWER AND THE SEED, it is not a mere apologue, or moral example, but contains an allegory, and relates to the preaching of the word; and consequently its moral is to be found in the success or results of that preaching. See Grew. It is an allegory, which describes beforehand the success of the first preaching of the Gospel, both to Jews and Gentiles; a concealed prophecy, and relating entirely to the first formation, but not to the final constitution of the Christian Church.

—ὁ σπείρων.] The Art. (as Middleton remarks) here gives the participle the nature of a substantive, i. e. σπορέως, which was unknown to the LXX. This is not a Hebraism, but is frequent in the Greek Classical writers. See Matth. Gr. Gr. § 269. For σπείρειν many MSS. chiefly ancient, have σπείραι, which is edited by Fritzsch, and placed in the inner margin by Griesbach. External evidence is of little weight in cases like this, of great similarity; and the εἰν and αἰ are in MSS. so alike, as sometimes to be scarcely distinguishable.

—παρὰ τὴν ὁδόν.] Meaning, 'by the side of,' or upon the hard path through the field, untouched by the plough, so that the seed could not come up.

5. τὰ πετρώδη.] Supply χωρία, (which is expressed in Thucyd. iv. 9.) rocky ground, τὴν πέτραν, as Luke expresses it. In this Palestine very much abounded. So Laborde, in his Travels, p. 233, says, that 'so great is the natural fertility of the soil, that even the very rocks, wherever water is plentiful, will produce vegetation.'

6. ἐκαυματίσθη.] In Palestine, during the seed time (which is in November), the sky is generally overspread with clouds. The seed then springs up even in stony places; but when the sun dissipates the clouds, having outgrown its strength, it is quickly dried away. (Rosenm.)

— διὰ τὸ μὴ ἔχειν ῥίζαν, ἔξηρ., Luko says: διὰ τὸ μὴ ἔχειν ἱκανάδα. But there is, in fact, no discrepancy: for the latter is but the cause of the cause alleged; it being for want of moisture, through the shallowness of the soil, that the seed took no root.

7. ἐπὶ τὰς ἀκάνθας] 'upon thorny ground.' So Polyzen. 615. χωρὶον ἀκανθῶδες. By thorns, however, we may understand, not what we call thorns, but various thorny and prickly plants (like our brambles and briers) which spring up with the seed, and at length outstrip it in growth, and choke it.

8. ἐδίδου] 'gave, yielded.' Mark, ἔφερε. This sense of δίδωμι is frequent in the Classical writers.

— ἑκατὸν.] An immense produce, but by no means unexampled. So Strabo and Pliny testify that the soil in Babylonia never produced less than 200 fold, and sometimes even 300: the grain, too, being of an astonishing size. Finally, it may suffice to refer the reader to Warnekroo's Dissertation on the fertility of Palestine, or Greswell, on Parab. vol. i. 19, sq., who present statements from ancient writers, which fully justify the accounts of Scripture and of Josephus; borne out as they are by the testimony of modern travellers.

10—17. In these verses our Lord, in answer (as we learn from the parallel passage of Mark) to the private inquiry of his disciples, tells them why he employed this mode of instruction, and also the meaning of the parable.

11. δίδοται] 'it is granted' (by Divine grace); not obēget, as Weta. renders; which is an unjustifiable curtailment of the sense. By τοῖς ἔξω, in Mark, are meant 'those who are removed from intimate connection with me, and acceptance of my religion.' This name the Jews used to give to the Heathens, as being removed from covenant with God. Our Lord, therefore, as Whitby remarks, seems to hint to them, that in a short time the kingdom of God would be taken from them, and they themselves be the ὁ ἔξω. This mode of speaking is also found in the Rabbinical writers. See Lightfoot.

11. μυστήρια.] This does not mean things entirely beyond the reach of the human understanding. Μυστήριον (from μύειν, to shut up) properly denotes something hidden, withheld, and therefore unknown, either wholly or partly. For all mystery has been well said to be imperfect knowledge. Here, and elsewhere in the N. T., it denotes something disclosed only to certain persons, and not revealed to the multitude; namely, in the present case, the things concerning the plan of salvation, which had not yet been revealed, and were only partially disclosed in our Lord's explanations of his parables. Thus we are to understand this (as Walch, cited by Koecher, observes) not so much of the doctrines of the Christian religion, as 'de statu fatique ecclesie sub æconomia Novi Fœderis futuris.' Of course, the rejection of the Jews, and the calling of the Gentiles, are included in these mysteries; and those were gradually disclosed to the disciples, 'as they could bear them,' first by our Lord, and then by the Holy Spirit, which was sent to guide them into all truth. These were matters not in themselves obscure, nor withheld from any desire to conceal necessary truth; but only because the things in question were, for various reasons, not proper to be then communicated to all; but reserved, in their complete explication, for the ὁλωτερικολ of the disciples. See Greswell in loc.

12. ὅστις γὰρ ἔχει—αὐτοῦ.] This adage, partaking of the oxymoron (which has a twofold application), properly has reference to worldly riches; for ὁ ἔχωντες and ὁ οὐκ ἔχωντες (scil. χρήματα) is a frequent phrase in the Classical writers to denote the have-somethings, and the have-nothings, the rich and the poor. And, in this view, the adage would need little explication. Here, however, it is transferred to spiritual riches; and under it is couched the lesson,—that he who hath religious knowledge, and takes that care to increase their wealth, will find it increase; while those who have but little, and manage it, as the poor are often observed to do, imprudently, will find it come to nought. The little he hath learned will slip out of his memory; he will be deprived of it, and, in that sense, it will be taken from him.

13. διὰ τοῦτο—λαλῶ.] The Jews (as we have before seen) were addressed in parables, because their hardened wickedness and blind obstinacy had indisposed them to receive instruction of a more explicit kind. For we are by no means to understand from this and v. 15. μήποτε ἴδωσι τοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς, &c. that our Lord spake in parables, in order to cause the blindness and obstinacy, and therefore occasion the final condemnation of the Jews. The words, when properly interpreted, involve nothing incompatible with the justice and mercy of the All Good and Perfect Being; the true sense being, that 'the hearts of the men were so hardened by a long course of wilful and presumptuous sin, that, according to the regular operation of moral causes and effects, they, though seeing, in fact did not see; and though hearing, yet, in fact, did not hear, nor hearken, and consequently could not understand. The expression is a proverbial one, common to both the Scriptural and the Classical writers, and used of those who might see, if they would use their reason, what they now discern not, through inattention and neglect. So Æschyl. Prom. 456. οἱ πρῶτα μὲν βλέποντες ἔβλεπον μᾶλλον, κλύοντες οὐκ ἤκουον. See Greswell on Parab. vol. i. 58. Thus the general sense of the passage of Isaiah now adduced is, that the Jews would hear indeed the doctrines of the Gospel, but not understand them; would see the miracles wrought in confirmation of its truth, but not be convinced thereby. Not that the evidences themselves were insufficient to establish its truth, but that their hearts were too corrupt to allow their understandings to see the force of those evidences. [Comp. 1 Cor. ii. 10, 14.] 'In our Lord's account of this matter (observes Mr. Ogilvie), a clear distinction is made between the case of the multitude and that of his disciples. The latter he addresses (see v. 11.) as entitled to a privilege, and enjoying an advantage, of which the former were destitute; and he represents that privilege and advantage as the result of opportunities improved, of previous benefits accepted and employed, and thus, by a diligent use, augmented and multiplied. He condescends to explain his motives for teaching by Parables, and anticipates the results of the plan which, for wise and merciful purposes, he has adopted. He saw that Parables were well suited to the multitude, and calculated to rouse them from their torpor, to unclothe their eyes, unstop their ears, and open the avenues of access to their understandings and hearts; to convey to their souls, labouring under the fatal disease of obdurate sin, the medicine of his pure and perfect doctrine. Their condition did indeed answer, with a fatal exactness, to the description of Isaiah; and for such persons direct reproof and admonition were but ill adapted; while, on the other hand, there was some chance that the parabolic mode might effect the desired purpose.'

— ὅτι βλέποντες οὐ βλέπουσι, &c.] In the parallel passages of Mark and Luke this is expressed somewhat differently, thus: ἵνα βλέποντες βλέπωσι, καὶ μὴ ἴδωσι, &c. But there is no material difference in the sentiment. In the passage of Matthew we have the fact simply stated; in those of Mark and Luke, the result. Or rather, as it is observed by Mr. Gresw. Parab. vol. i. 59, 'in Matthew we have the first cause that produced the mode of teaching by allegorical parables; in Mark and Luke the final end of that mode of teaching.' [Comp. Mark viii. 17, 18. John iii. 19, 20. ix. 39—41. 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4.]

14. καὶ ἀναπληροῦνται i. e. 'is, as it were, again fulfilled,' by the similar blind obstinacy of the same people. This is by some regarded as what Spanh. calls the secondary and improper use of the formula, by analogy, or example, when a thing happens similar to one that has formerly been done, said, or predicted. There is, however, no reason why it may not be understood of a second fulfilment.

— ἀκοῇ ἀκούετε.] This is called a Hebraism, though examples have been adduced from the Greek Classical writers. The idiom almost always carries emphasis. 'Eri before αὐτοῖς is marked for omission, or cancelled, by almost all the Editors; and on the strongest grounds, it being omitted in most MSS. and Versions; and its insertion is far easier to be accounted for than its omission. [Comp. Is. vi. 9. John xii. 40. Acts xxviii. 26.]

15. ἐπαχύνθη.] Παχὺς and its derivatives (like pinguis in Latin) are often used of stupidity, from a notion common to all ages, that fat tends to mental dulness. But as with us stupid is colloquially used in the sense obedinate, so here both senses seem to be meant.

— βαρέως ἤκουσαν.] 'have heard with difficulty, are dull of hearing.'

— ἐκάμμυσαν.] Καμμύνειν is a later Gr. form for καταμύνειν, and means, to close the eyelids; literally, 'to draw down the eyelids, in order to avoid seeing a thing.' Of course, the eye of the understanding is here meant. So Philo, p. 589, cited by Loesn. καμμ. τὸ τῆς ψυχῆς ὄμμα. And Hierocl. Aur. Carm. p. 192 (cited by Elanor), τοῦτων δὲ (scil. κακῶν) λύσις μία ἡ πρὸς Θεοῦ ἐπιστροφή, ἣν ἐξευρίσκουσιν οἱ τὸ ὄμμα τῆς ψυχῆς, καὶ τὸ οὐς πρὸς τὴν τῶν ἀγαθῶν ἀνέληψιν ἐπιχειροῦντες. The figurative closing of the ears (adverted to in the corresponding words of the following clause) is here implied. That would require the term ἔβυσαν. So, in a very ancient life of St. Luke, we have Πρὸς δὲ τὴν ἀληθινὴν διδασκαλίαν τὰ τῆς καρδίας ἔβυσαν ὅσα, καὶ τὰ τῆς διανοίας ὄμματα. Μήποτε is for ἵνα μὴ; adeo non, in the eventual sense, as in John xii. 40. It is implied in the following words, that this blindness would continue till the destruction of the Jewish state. Συνῶσι. This is found in very many MSS., and is edited (for the common reading συνιῶσι) by Matth., Griesb., Vater, and Fritz.

of expression common to the poetic or the pathetic and animated style, in every language. See Luke xi. 27. x. 23. [Comp. infra xvi. 17. Eph. i. 9, 18.]

17. πολλοὶ προφῆται—ἤκουσαν.] Meaning, that 'they regarded the period when the Redeemer should appear as one which should dispense universal happiness; and they would have rejoiced to see the miracles and hear the doctrine of Christ; but that privilege was denied them, because it was not yet the proper time.' [Comp. Heb. xi. 13. 1 Pet. i. 10.]

18. After the above condescending introduction, our Lord proceeds to expound the parable, prefacing his explanation with 'Ἀκούσατε, 'attend ye.'

19. παντὸς ἀκούοντος] lit. 'on any one's hearing the word.' Καὶ μὴ συνιέντος. i. e. by metonymy of cause for effect, 'and not laying it to heart, so as to understand it,' not so comprehending it, as to enter into its spirit and to obey its requisitions; a figurative use similar to that of ἀκούω in the sense obey. See more in Beza and Elzevir, who compare Cebes p. 5, εἰ μὴ προσέξῃτε καὶ συνήσκητε τὰ λεγόμενα, εὐδαίμονες ἴσασθε. This suggests the important warning, that the best spiritual instruction depends, after all, for its effect, upon the state of mind and heart of those to whom it is addressed.

—ὁ—σπαρεῖς.] He who is such may metaphorically be called a man sown by the way-side. A man may be termed sown, (σπαρεῖς) on the same principle that we call a field sown, which receives the seed. We may render, 'he who is sown on the way-side.' For (as appears from the next verse) the man is compared to the field, not to the seed.

20. [Comp. Isaiah lviii. 2. John v. 35.]

21. οὐκ ἔχει ῥίζαν.] It is properly the word that hath no root in itself. (Comp. Col. ii. 7. Eph. iii. 17.) But it is here transferred to the person; the meaning being, 'but he does not suffer it to take deep root in his mind.' Πρόσκαιρος, scil. μόνος, 'is but a temporary and unstable disciple.' So Luke viii. 13, οἱ πρὸς καιρὸν πιστεύουσι, &c. Σκανδαλίζεται, 'takes offence at, and falls off from the Gospel.'

22. ἡ μέριμνα] 'anxious care'; (from μεμερισμένος.) So called because μερίζει τὸν νοῦν, it distracts the mind with worldly cares, and so dissipates the attention, as not to leave us 'leisure to be wise' unto salvation, or to attend to the concerns of the soul. [Comp. 1 Tim. vi. 9, 10.]

23. ὁ δὲ—σπαρεῖς] i. e. 'he who is represented as the one that received seed on the good ground.' —ὁ συνιῶν.] Meaning, 'who gives it admission, lays it to heart, so as to understand it.' Ὁς καρποφορεῖ, &c. This is to be referred, not to the word, but to the person, in whose heart the word is sown. By this is adumbrated the different effect of the Gospel on different hearts.

24—30. The parable now subjoined by our Lord was meant to represent the different effect of the Gospel when already preached; wherein the field is the world, and the good seed the word of God preached by Christ and his Apostles. (Gresw.) The purpose of the parable was to draw attention to a future public and final declaration of the distinction between the righteous and the wicked; and to found, on the certainty of such declaration, a solemn warning of the necessity of righteousness and the danger of sin. The machinery of the parable is so contrived, as to afford occasion and employ means for the display of some momentous truths, to which our Saviour saw fit to refer, because they were calculated to prove auxiliary to his chief design. The end of the world,—the judicial office He should then assume, and execute,—the ministry of Angelic beings under his orders,—the opposite conditions of misery and of glory, to which, after the day of judgment, men shall be consigned,— these momentous facts and events of the Divine dispensations are incidentally disclosed and aptly illustrated. (Ogilvie, Bampton Lect.)

— παρίθηκον.] Render, 'laid before them.' Æth. Vers. produxi; Vulg. proponit. So 2 Tim. ii. 2, ταῦτα παράθου πιστοῖς ἀνθρώποις, and Exod. xix. 7, παρίθηκον αὐτοῖς. A metaphor taken from setting food out; as often in the Scriptural and Classical writers.

— ὁμοιωθῇ ἡ βασιλ. &c.] Meaning, 'there is a similarity between the effect of the Gospel, and that of a man sowing good seed.'

— σπείροντι καλὸν σπέρμα.] I would compare something similar in Xen. Cyr. i. 6, 6, οὐδὲ, μὴ σπείροντας γε σῖτον, εἰδεσθαι καλὸν αὐτοῖς σῖτον φύεσθαι.

25. τοὺς ἀνθρώπους.] Some (as Euthym., Whitby, Beng., and Wakef.) understand this to denote 'the men whose duty it was to take care of the field.' A sense, however, harsh, and indeed highly improbable; it not being customary to keep watch in fields, except when the corn was far advanced to maturity. It is therefore better to take ἀνθρ. in a general sense; and to suppose, with Grot., that ἐν τῷ καθεύδειν τοὺς ἀνθρώπους is meant for a designation of night.

— αὐτοῦ ὁ ἐχθρὸς.] An idiomatic form of expression, designating some particular person as especially such. See 1 Kings xxi. 20.

— ζιζάνια.] Some difference of opinion exists as to what plant is here intended. It is with most probability supposed to be the darnel, or lolium temulentum of Linnaeus, which grows among corn, and has, in the ear, much resemblance to wheat; but is useless, nay noxious, and therefore deserving of the epithet infelix given by the Poet. (Virg. Ecl. v. 37.)

27. οἰκοδεσπότην.] This word has the conjoint notions of householder and landowner, meaning such a householder as cultivated a farm, whether his own, or one rented.

— τὰ ζιζάνια.] The Article is in many MSS. and some Versions and Fathers not found; and is cancelled by almost all the Editors from Weta. to Scholz.

30. τῷ.] This is not found in many MSS. and early Edd., nor recognised in the Syr. Vers. and Epiphanius; and is cancelled by Weta., Matth., Griesb., Knapp, Vater, and Scholz. Middl. and Fritz, however, though on different grounds, disapprove of the omission.

— συλλέξατε πρῶτον.] This would be impracticable according to our mode of reaping; but not according to one of the two modes frequent in ancient times, and, as we learn from modern travellers, yet in use in the East; namely, either by cutting off the ears separately close to the stalk (leaving the straw on the ground), or by plucking up the whole, ear and stalk, by the root. According to either of these modes, every ear would pass singly through the reaper's hands to be dealt with as he thought fit; but as the expression is not simply συλλέξατε, but συλλέξετε δέσμας (which would not be practicable with the ears alone) we must suppose the latter mode here adopted. On the moral of this parable see Greswell, and on the imagery, comp. supra iii. 12.

31. This, and the parable at v. 33, forms, in conjunction with that at Mark iv. 26, 29, three minor parables, or allegorical comparisons; the moral of which respectively was (to use the words of Mr. Gresw. vol. i. 265), 1. the intrinsic vitality of the Christian religion, and the tutelary providence of God, which after the first rise of the religion into being, would co-operate together to preserve it in being, until the end of its being should be accomplished. 2. The prodigious, sensible disparity between the grandeur, extent, and dominion of the visible church at last, compared with the smallness and the narrowness of its limits and jurisdiction at first. 3. The diffusive, regenerating, and transforming energy of the Christian doctrines in the complex, as exerted on the wide-spread, inveterate corruptions both of religion and of morality throughout the Gentile world. As regards the present parable two things are especially worthy of notice, as opposed to each other; the smallness of the seed which gives birth to the plant, and the greatness of the plant which grows out of the seed. And the moral of this parable is (to use the words of Mr. Greswell), 'the ultimate extension of the Christian religion, compared with the smallness of its beginnings. And in this view is one of the most remarkable prophecies in the Gospels.' See more in Mr. Greswell.

32. ὁ μικρότερον.] This has been usually considered as an idiomatical expression, derived from Hebraistic usage, for μικρότατον. The principle has, however, been of late exploded. The phrase, 'as small as a mustard-seed,' was proverbial with the Jews to denote a very small thing. — μεῖζον τῶν λαχάνων] vegetables; as we say roots, from λαχάνω. Various writers of known credibility have proved the immense stature which plants raised from small seeds will often acquire under favourable circumstances, in particular climates and in particular soils. Pliny has given an instance of the malva attaining in Mauritania the height of twenty feet, and a thickness beyond the power of man to span.

33. ζύμῃ] i. e. leaven, or sour dough, which assimilates to its own nature the mass with which it is mixed.

34. χωρὶς παραβολῆς οὐκ ἐλάλει αὐτοῖς.] This is regarded by some as not merely applying to the discourses delivered that day, but as a common figure of exaggeration, signifying that 'his parables were exceedingly numerous.' But the air of the context is such as should rather lead us to refer the phrase to the discourses of Christ at that time; q. d. his teaching that day was a continued series of parables. Indeed, the other sense would not be borne out by facts; for there is no reason to think that our Lord's parables were so exceedingly numerous, but rather the contrary, since the parabolic mode of teaching was not his ordinary but extraordinary mode of teaching, and used only on special occasions, like the present.

35. ἀνοίξω—κόσμου.] From Ps. lxxviii. 2, but not exactly agreeing either with the Hebrew or Greek; though ἐρεύξομαι might then be in the text of the Sept., and φθίγγωμαι, the present reading, may be a gloss. The words are not quoted by the Evangelist as a prophecy, but are accommodated to the present purpose. The term ἐρεύγασθαι is properly used of the gushing forth of fluids, but metaphorically, of the pouring forth of free and earnest speech. Of the expression ἀνοίξω στόμα in several examples have been adduced. Κατὰ ἀπὸ κατ. κ. is a designation of the Gospel, with which comp. Eph. iii. 9, τὸ μυστήριον τὸ ἀποκεκρυμμένον ἀπὸ τῶν αἰώνων.

— καταβολῆς.] Is properly used of the founding of buildings, but applied occasionally by the Classical writers to the beginning of any thing. It was especially used of the world, because, according to the common notion of ancient times, the world was supposed to be an immense plain surface, resting on foundations.

36. τὴν οἰκίαν] i. e. the house he had left at Capernaum.

38. τὸ δὲ καλὸν σπέρμα, οὗτοί εἰσιν, &c.] Οὗτος is accommodated in construction to υἱοί, though referring to σπέρμα, which is considered as a noun of multitude. By τοῦ Πονηροῦ we are to understand the Evil One, Satan; so called as being the original author and continual perpetrator of evil.

39. συντέλεια τ. α. τ.] The word signifies αἱ δὲ θεμισταὶ ἄγγελοι εἰσιν. Ὡς περὶ οὖν συλλέγεσθαι καὶ 40

 ζῴα καὶ πυρὶ * καίεται. οὕτως ἔσται ἐν τῇ συντελείᾳ τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου. Ἀποστέλλει ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου τοὺς 41

* Πάλιν ὁμοία ἐστὶν ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν θησαυρῷ 44

properly a bringing together, and figuratively a consummation or completion. When joined with nouns of time, it means the completion of the period denoted thereby, whether definite (as συντέλεια τοῦ αἰαντοῦ in 2 Chron. xxiv. 25), or indefinite, as συντέλεια καιροῦ or καιρῶν, or ἡμερῶν, several times in the Sept. and Apocrypha. Συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος does not, indeed, there occur; but it was doubtless used by the Jewish Hellenists to denote the Hebr. עֲוֹן, meaning the consummation of the period appointed for the continuance of the Jewish state, at the close of which the Messiah should appear. Thus it came to denote the end of the world or present state of things. So in 4 Esdr. vii. 43. 'Dies iudicii erit finis temporis huius, et initium temporis future immortalitatis, quo transivit [I conj. transferit] corruptela.' In the N. T. the phrase always bears this sense; in the use of which the period denoted by αἰὼν is the duration appointed by Divine Providence to the present state of probation, and of the visible Church.

39. ἄγγελοι εἰσιν.] Bp. Middleton remarks that we certainly ought to render, 'the reapers are angels;' though he grants that at v. 49 of this chapter, and at xxv. 31, the task is assigned to the angels generally. But, not to mention the jejune-ness of the version he proposes, there is no reason why the general sense may not here be assigned, especially as it is required by the parallel passages. In fact, that ἄγγελοι can dispense with the Article, and has the license which the Bishop denies it, is certain from several passages of the N. T.; e. gr. Heb. ii. 5, οὐ γὰρ ἄγγελους ὑπέταξε, &c., and 7, βραχύ τι παρ' ἄγγελων. 2 Pet. ii. 4, ἄγγελων ἀμαρτησάντων οὐκ ἐφείσατο. Jude 6, ἄγγελους τε τοὺς μὴ τηρήσαντας τὴν ἐαντῶν ἀρχήν, &c. And no wonder that the Article should be thus dispensed with, since the term was so appropriated, by use, to a particular class of messengers, as scarcely to require the limitative force of the Article. As to συντέλεια, though Middleton allows to it a dispensation (speciali gratia) on account of its being an Abstract noun, yet that, I apprehend, did not occasion the omission of the Article (for the word is never used without it when standing alone), but the reason was simply because the Article could be dispensed with in conjunction with the noun following; the phrase ἡ συντ. τοῦ αἰῶνος being a very frequent one, and always employed in this sense, of the world's end; so that, in a context like the present the Article could very well be dispensed with, as in our world without end. Thus also, the phrase occurs without the Article at Hebr. ix. 26. As to what the Bishop thinks, that ἡ συντέλεια is a not improbable reading, I must say that I think it is avowedly improbable; first because it is only found in one MS. (for when Bp. Middleton speaks of eight of Matthew's MSS., he speaks without book), and its reception is forbidden by the most certain of all critical canons, that we can account for the insertion, but not for the omission of the Article. In short, the absence of the Article in the above passages of Heb. ii. strongly confirms the common reading here.

40. καίεται.] Such is the reading of almost all the MSS. and early Edd., which has been adopted by almost every Editor from Wets. downwards. The common reading κατακαίεται was probably derived from the Scholiasts.

41. σκάνδαλα.] The word signifies a stumbling block, either in a natural or in a figurative sense, denoting, in the latter case, whatever occasions any one to err in his principles or practice. Here, however, as it is joined with τοὺς ποιούντας τὴν ἀνομίαν, it must denote, not things, but persons, i. e. false teachers (such as are censured by Peter and Jude) who, under the pretence of Christian liberty, inculcated doctrines repugnant to moral virtue, holding vice to be among the ἀδιάφορα, or things indifferent.

42. βαλοῦσιν—αὐτοὺς—πυρός.] Render, 'the fiery furnace.' An expression formed on that of the Prophet Dan. iii. 6, ἐκβλήθησονται εἰς τὴν κάμινον τοῦ πυρός τὴν καιομένην, and equivalent to that of γίγναται τοῦ πυρός, Matt. v. 22.

43. ἐκλάμψουσιν—αὐτῶν.] 'Then will the righteous, the children of the kingdom, shine forth as the unclouded noon-day sun, in the image of Christ in the kingdom of their Father,' being made unspeakably glorious and happy. (Scott.) Our Lord seems to have had in mind the words of the Prophet Daniel, xii. 3. Comp. Wisd. iii. 7. Eccles. ix. 11. 1 Macc. ii. 62. 1 Pet. v. 4.

—ὁ ἔχων ὦτα ἀκ. ἀκ.] Meaning, 'let every one seriously attend to these awful truths' [as he values the salvation of his soul.]

44. θησαυρῷ κεκρυμμένῳ.] Meaning such valuables as, in the insecure state of society in ancient times (from war and political trouble) men were accustomed to bury in the earth. (See Gresswell.) From the present passage, and one cited by Wets. from the Mishna, it appears that the Jewish law adjudged all treasure found on land to be the right of the then proprietor of the land.

κεκρυμμένῳ ἐν τῷ ἀγρῷ· ὃν εὐρὼν ἄνθρωπος ἐκρυψε, καὶ ἀπὸ τῆς χαρᾶς αὐτοῦ, ὑπάγει καὶ πάντα ὅσα ἔχει πωλεῖ, καὶ ἀγοράζει τὸν ἀγρὸν ἐκεῖνον.

— ἐν τῷ ἀγρῷ.] Bp. Middleton would, from some MSS., cancel the Article at τῷ ἀγρῷ. And indeed it is not easy to see what sense it can have. But idioms, though difficult to be accounted for, are not therefore to be swept away; and the existence of the idiom in the present case is ingeniously accounted for by Greswell and Fritz.

— ὃν εὐρ. ἀνθ. ἐκρυψε.] Meaning, 'a man having found, concealed [his good fortune].'
'Ἰράγαι, 'hies him away.' The expression denotes alcantara.

45. ἀνθρώπῳ ἐμπόρῳ.] 'A merchant-man.' Such as those found in the East, who travel about buying or exchanging jewels, pearls, or other valuables; a custom illustrated by the citations in Wets., which, with Mr. Greswell's matter, well illustrate the natural history, locality, use, and value of pearls in ancient times. They were, beyond all others, costly. As respects the origin of the word μαργαρίτης, it is justly remarked by Bp. Marsh, that, 'as pearls are the produce of the East, it is more reasonable to suppose that the Greeks borrowed the word from the Orientalists than the contrary, which is the common opinion.'

47. σαγήνη.] Something like our drum-net, which, when sunk, and dragged to the shore, creeps, as it were, the bottom, and was therefore called terriculum. It was, however, not like an ordinary draw-net, being far larger, and intended to take not part of the fish of a pool or stream, but the whole, of every kind, size, and quality. It was formed of cane, osiers, and in wadded work. Of this the antiquity is proved by allusions to it in Herodot. vi. 31. and Æschyl. Ag. 1333. The term occurs in the Sept. and the later writers, as Oppian, Ælian, and Artemid.

At ἐκ παντὸς γένους suppl. τινὰ from the context; not, however, understanding, with Kuinoel, 'other things besides fish,' but supposing a metonymy from the context of ἰχθυῖα.

48. ἀναβιβάσαντες ἐπὶ τὸν αἰγιαλόν.] 'having hauled up on shore.' A tax sol. de hac re. of hauling ships to land. See Xen. Hist. i. 1, 2. Καθίσαντες is passed over by Camph. as pleonastic. But if it adds little to the sense, it increases the spirit of this parabolic comparison, the circumstance of sitting down to sort the fish being beautifully graphic, as those in Luke xiv. 28, οὐχὶ πρῶτον καθίσας ψηφίζεις, and 31, καθίσας βουλεύεται, by an allusion to the sitting down to a desk, or a council table. I should hardly have thought it necessary to notice the point, but that I find Mr. Greswell mistaking the sense, by rendering, 'and laid them down.' Misled, perhaps, by the καὶ before καθίσαντες; and no wonder, since it not a little embarrasses the sentence. It is not found in some MSS., and in others of great antiquity it is placed before αἰγιαλόν, which indeed removes the difficulty, but violates the proprietas linguæ; since this idiom of the participle of καθίζω admits of no adjunct, being closely connected with the verb following. I would rather cancel than transpose the καὶ, which I suspect arose from those Critics who stumbled (as even the erudite Fritz. does) at two participles to a verb, without any connective particle; and accordingly inverted one. But the participles are quite distinct; and one is merely put for a verb followed by καὶ. So at v. 46, we have ὃν εὐρὼν—ἀπελθὼν πέπρακε.

— τὰ σαπρὰ] 'the refuse.' A tax sol. de hac re. See vii. 17, and Note. 'Ἐξω may either be referred to the baskets; or simply denote away.

49. ἐκ μέσου.] This is thought to be redundant; but it rather stands for de societate, as in 1 Cor. v. 2, ὅσα ἔχαρθῃ ἐκ μέσου ὑμῶν, &c., and especially 2 Cor. vi. 17, ἐξέλθετε ἐκ μέσου αὐτῶν καὶ ἀφορίσθητε.

52. διὰ τοῦτο.] The Commentators regard this either as redundant, or as a formula transitiōis. But it rather seems to denote an inference from what has preceded, and may be rendered, Wherefore, then, since that is the case; thus scilicet

ing to introduce an admonition to use the knowledge they have; and that couched under another allegorical comparison; namely, that of a provident housekeeper (or master of a family) who having laid up in store a variety of articles for family use, brings them forth as the exigencies of the case require. There is here an allusion to the office of Apostles.

— γραμματεὺς.] The term properly denotes a doctor of the Jewish law; but here a teacher of the Gospel, see Vitrings de Synag.

— μαθητευθεὶς εἰς τὴν βασ. τ. ο.] Griesb., Knapp, Vater, and Fritz, edit μαθ. τῇ βασιλείᾳ; but on too slender authority. The phrase may be rendered, 'discipled into the kingdom of heaven,' i. e. admitted by discipleship into the Christian society, (see xxiii. 34. xxviii. 19. Acts xiv. 21.) If, however, τῇ βασιλείᾳ, be the true reading, the sense will be, 'instructed for,' 'disciplined into,' i. e. completely acquainted with the nature and purposes of the Gospel. At καινὰ καὶ παλαιὰ we may supply βρώματα or σκεύη; meaning both what he has long laid up, and what he has recently provided. In ἐκβάλλει the idea of force is, as often, dropped; the sense being, puts forth, brings out, προφέρει.

54. πατρίδα] scil. πόλιν, i. e. Nazareth, the place where he had been brought up, and which was therefore, in a certain sense, his country; the expression being used of any one's native place, even of a city or town. So Joseph. Ant. vi. 4. 6, εἰς Ῥαμαθὰν πόλιν πατρὶς γὰρ ἦν αὐτοῦ. Herodian viii. 3. 2, ἣν δὲ χιλίρχος, ᾧ πατρὶς ἡ Ἀκυλῆα ἦν.

55. οὗτος.] The use of the pronoun here, as often in the Greek writers, implies somewhat of contempt, like the Heb. הוּא and the Latin iste.

— τοῦ τέκτονος.] Τέκτων means an artisan, as opposed to a labourer; and, according to the term accompanying it, may denote any artifice whether in wood, stone, or metal. But when stands alone, it always, like our word wright, notes a carpenter (as faber and πηρ) in the Septuagint, and, almost always, in the Classical writers. That such is the sense here intended cannot sonably be doubted; especially as it is supported by the concurrent testimony of ancient ecclesiastical writers.

57. οὐκ ἐστὶ προφήτης—αὐτοῦ.] A paternal sentiment, importing, that 'one whose downfalls enable him to instruct others, general no where so little held in honor among his townsmen and immediate connexions.'
58. See Note on Mark vi. 5.

XIV. 1. ἐν ἐκείνῳ τῷ καιρῷ.] On what particular time is here meant see Dr. Hales & Greaswell. As our Lord had then been considerable time engaged in the work of the try, (see Scott) it may seem strange that had not heard beforehand of him; so many reasons have been imagined. It seems to be, that he had heard of Jesus was long before his fame became known and still longer before it engaged his attention.

— παῖσιν.] This, by a use frequent in Sept., is supposed to denote friends. It signifies officers of his Court.

— αἱ δυνάμεις ἐνεργ. ἐν αὐτῷ.] Bp. renders, 'the powers, or spirits, are act.' Yet the arguments he adduces in favour rendering are rather specious than there seems to be no reason to the common interpretation of δυνάμεις, it is not so certain,—indeed it is a moot point,—whether ἐνεργ. should be usual active sense, or as put for 'are wrought,' ἐν αὐτῷ being for

The latter is confirmed by the ancient Versions, and adopted by most Expositors; and may seem preferable, as enabling us to account for the Article, without resorting to any far-fetched interpretation. Thus the full sense will be, 'And hence the miracles [we hear of] are wrought by him.' The authority, however, of Versions, in nice cases like the present, is very slender. And though Neuters be sometimes used for Passives, yet that is only when there is something in the regimen of the verb to intimate that. Being construed as Passives, they are considered as such. Now such is not the case here; ἐν αὐτῷ being adapted not to a passive, but an active or neuter verb. Not to mention that this would be contrary to the usage of the N. T., in which wherever a passive sense is required, a passive form is adopted. Moreover, ἐνεργ. is often used with ἐν, never with ὑπό, or ἐκ for ὑπό. Hence it is best to regard the term as used in a Middle signification for ἐνεργουῦνται, as in Ephes. ii. 2, τοῦ πνεύματος τοῦ ἐνεργοῦντος ἐν τοῖς νήσι τοῦ σώματος, Gal. ii. 8, and sometimes also in the Classical writers, as Diod. Sic. iv. 38. Pol. iv. 40, 4. Artemid. i. 1, 2. Finally, δυνάμεις is, strictly speaking, not for the power of working miracles, but is put for ἐνεργήματα δυνάμεων, which occurs in 1 Cor. xii. 10, meaning the χαρίσματα whereby miracles are worked. The true force of the Article here is that of notoriety (see Middleton, ch. iii. 2.), to denote the well-known; q. d. 'And the power of miracles which we hear so much of exerts its force in him.'

3. ἔδησεν αὐτόν, &c.] In this episodical digression (vv. 3, 13.) recounting the imprisonment and death of John the Baptist, the Aorists ἔδησε, &c. must be rendered as Pluperfects.

— διὰ Ἡρωδιάδα.] Josephus, Ant. xviii. 5, 2, gives a somewhat different account, ascribing John's imprisonment to Herod's jealousy of his great influence with the people (of whom such multitudes flocked to him), who would be likely to do whatever he enjoined. Whence, says he, Herod thought it better to anticipate his designs (if he had any) by throwing him into prison. But though that may be the truth, it is evidently not the whole truth. If John had so much influence with the people as Josephus says, — Herod, we may suppose, would scarcely have ventured to throw him into prison, much less take his life, without some pretext at least. Now this would be afforded him by John's authoritatively (in quality of a Prophet) forbidding the Tetrarch to marry Herodias. And perhaps the manner of his doing this was so blunt and unceremonious, as to be construed into a sort of crimen læsæ majestatis;

whence his life would be forfeited, and might therefore be taken at any time: which accounts for Herod's so suddenly taking it, as well as Herodias venturing to ask it. Thus there is, in effect, no discrepancy at all in the two accounts, which mutually confirm and illustrate each other.

— Φιλίππου.] Not Philip the Tetrarch, but another Philip, a son of Herod. 1. by a daughter of Simon, the High Priest. See Josephus, Ant. xviii. 5, 1.

4. ἔχειν for γαμῖν. A use frequent in the Classical writers, like that of habere in Latin. [See Lev. xviii. 16.]

6. γενεσίῳν ἀγομιένων.] The Commentators are not agreed whether this expression should be understood of the birthday festival of Herod, or that in commemoration of his accession. That the latter was observed as a feast, is certain from Joseph. Ant. xv. 11, 3. (of Herod) and 1 Kings i. 8, 9. Hos. vii. 5. Since, however, no examples of this sense of γενεσία have been adduced, the common interpretation is the safer; and that the ancients, both Jews and Gentiles, kept their birthdays as days of great rejoicing, is certain from a variety of passages cited by Wets. At γενεσίῳν some supply συμποσίῳν; others, ἡμερῶν. The latter is preferable, as in the phrase ἀγίου ἑορτήν. Yet no ellipse is necessary, since γενεσία, and also ἡγκαίνια and γενέθλια (which is the term used by the earlier writers) are in fact nouns. At least no plena locutio has been hitherto produced that will determine what was originally the noun employed with them.

— ᾠρχήσατο.] Most Commentators (as Grot. and Kuin.) here understand a pantomimic and lascivious dance, recently introduced into Judæa, such as that so severely censured by Juven. Sat. vi. 63. and Hor. Od. iii. 6, 21. Yet that Herod should have permitted, and even been gratified with a lascivious dance by his daughter-in-law, would argue almost incredible indecorum and depravity. It is therefore better, with Lightfoot, Mich., Elan., and Fritz., to suppose that the dance was a decorous one, expressive of rejoicing, and, from the extreme elegance with which it was performed, such as attracted universal admiration.

8. προβιβασθεῖσα] 'adducta, urged, instigated.' A signification occurring in the Sept. and also Xen. Mem. i. 2, 17. προβιβ. λόγῳ. Πίνακι, not a laminæ, as Campbell renders, but a broad flat dish; for from its origin (namely, πῖνον, a board) the word commonly denotes what is flat, or nearly so. Dr. Walsh, in his Travels in Turkey, informs us that the head of the celebrated Ali Pacha, after being cut off, and sent to Constantinople, was publicly exposed on a dish.

— ὧδε] here, upon the spot [and immediately] lest in the morning he might repent of his promise, and refuse to perform it.

9. ἰλυπήθη.] This is by Kuin. and Wahl interpreted 'was angry'; of which sense they adduce examples from the Classical and Scriptural writers. But some of them are exceptionable; and here there seems no reason to deviate from the usual signification of the word 'to be sorry.' So Mark vi. 26. περιλυπος γινόμενος. Though it might be rendered 'he was chagrined.' The feeling was doubtless a mixed one; chiefly sorrow (on his own account most) and chagrin, not without anger, at being thus taken advantage of; nay, even alarm; for he could not but feel apprehensive of the consequences of so unpopular an action. His chagrin may also, as Hammond thinks, have been increased by a superstitious dread of any ill-omened occurrence on his birthday. So Martial Epigr. X. 87. 'Natalem colimus, tacete lites.' In short, great must have been the fluctuation of Herod's mind, occasioned by various contending passions and feelings in his bosom, which are well described by Grotius. Διὰ τοὺς ὅρκους, i. e. 'out of a scruple to break his oath before his guests;' for at entertainments there was a delicacy in refusing requests. So Josephus, Ant. xvii. 3, 3. ἐπὶ τῇ τιμῇ τοῦ ὅρκου. The plural (ὅρκους) is for the singular, by an idiom not unfrequent, unless we may suppose that the King, in the excitement of the moment, had repeated his oath.

10. πέμψας] scil. τινά. Mark says σπεκουλάτωρα. That this is not, as Rosenm. considers it, a Hebraism, is plain from two examples from Classical writers adduced in Recens. Synop. I would notice something similar in Herodian, i. 9, 19. ὡς τῶτο ὁ Κ. πέμψας ἀποτίμει τὴν κεφαλάν.

13. ἀκούσας.] Namely, of John's death, and Herod's opinion of himself. On both which accounts, and also to avoid the imputation of blame for any disturbances which might be expected to follow such an atrocity, and likewise (as we learn from Mark vi. 31.) to refresh himself and his Apostles after their fatigue, our Lord sought retirement. Πεζῇ. Not 'on foot,' but 'by land,' as opposed to ἐν πλοίῳ. This signification is frequent in the Classical writers, and sometimes has place where there is no opposition expressed or even implied.

— ἀκούσαντες] having heard (where he was).

14. ἐξελθὼν.] Namely, on leaving the ship.

— ἰσπλαγχνίσθη ἐπ' αὐτοῖς.] Namely, as Mark adds, ὅτι ἦσαν ὡς πρόβατα μὴ ἔχοντα ποιμένα. On this reading αὐτοῖς all the Editors are agreed. The vulg. αὐτοῖς is proved to have been a mere typographical error of Stephens's 3d Edition. On the present narration comp. infra xv. 32. seqq. and John vi. 5.

15. ὀψίας γενομένης] i. e. the first evening, which commenced at three o'clock. Nor, considering the aptitude of the place, and the time of year, a little before the Passover, is this inconsistent with the expression of Luke ix. 12. ἡ ἡμέρα ἤρξατο κλίνειν, for the day is there quite on the wane. That mentioned further on at v. 23. is the second evening, which commenced at sunset.

— ἡ ὥρα ἤδη παρήλθεν] 'the day is far spent.' "Ωρα, like the Latin hora, has often the same time of day. Mark's words are: ἡ ὥρα ὥρα πολλῆς γενομένης, meaning, when much of the day was now past.' See the Note there.

16. δότε αὐτοῖς ὑμεῖς φαγεῖν.] Render, 'Give ye them to eat.' [Comp. 2 Kings iv. 23.]

19. καὶ τοὺς ὄχλους ἀνακλίσθαι.] The Versions, both ancient and modern, are, I apprehend, all wrong in rendering, 'ordered the multitude to sit down;' for from the parallel passages of Mark, Luke, and John (where we have ἀνέκλιναν ἅπαντας καὶ ἐπέταξεν αὐτοῖς ἀνακληθῆναι πάντας), it appears that ἀνακλ. must here have its usual passive force, and that the construction is: ἐκέλευσε (ᾧς) ἀνακληθῆναι τοὺς ὄχλους, 'he gave orders for the multitude to be seated.' ἐκδοκᾶν in ordine (as L. Brug. explains) namely, as Luke says (ix. 14, where see Note), κατὰ κλισίας (or συμπόσια) ἀνὰ πεντήκοντα; implying the colloca-tion on the part of others. [Comp. infra xv. 36.]

— ἐπὶ τοῖς χόρτοις.] Render, super gramina 'on the herbage.' As I know no other example of the word in this sense, in the plural, I suspect that the idiom was introduced into the later Greek from the Latin.

— [καὶ.] This is rejected or cancelled by almost all Editors, as not found in the greater part of the MSS., early Eds., and Fathers. Internal evidence is as much against it as external.

— ἀναβλέψας εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν.] A gesture, as Beza observes, appropriate to prayer.

— εὐλόγησε.] scil. αὐτοῦς, as expressed in Mark and Luke.

— κλάσας.] The Jewish bread was formed into cakes; broad, thin, and brittle, like our biscuits; and therefore required to be broken, rather than cut, and thus would leave very many fragments; which accounts for the great quantity thereof gathered up.

20. ἦσαν] scil. οἱ ἀπόστολοι. At τὸ περισσεῖον supply μέρος. Κλασμάτων means not only the fragments which would arise from breaking up cakes for so great a multitude, but (as appears from John vi. 13) those also which each person would make in eating. The words following δώδεκα—πλήρεις are in apposition with, and exegetical of the preceding; q. d. 'namely, twelve baskets full.'

— κοφίνους.] This word has occasioned more discussion than one might expect among the Commentators, who are not a little perplexed since these cophini are in Juv. Sat. iii. 14. & vi. 512. connected with hay. The most probable opinion is, that the κοφ. in question were either (as Duxt. thinks) such baskets as had, from the earliest period, formed a part of the household utensils of the Jews (see Deut. xxviii. 5.); or (as Reland, Schlaus., and Kuin. suppose) were such portable bag-baskets as were commonly used by the Jews in travelling through Heathen countries, to hold their provisions, in order to avoid the pollution of unclean food. The hay, it is supposed, they took with them, to make a bed. Yet these baskets could not have held any quantity sufficient for that purpose. It is more probable that the cophini here meant carried no hay; and that those mentioned by Juvenal were of a much larger sort, like our *hamper*s, and used for containing various articles of pedlery, such as the foreign Jews, even then, there is reason to think, used to deal in.

21. ἦσαν ἄνδρες ὡσεὶ πέντ.] The men (as usual with the Jews) being alone reckoned.

22. ἠνάγκασεν.] From this term many have inferred the unwillingness of the disciples to depart; influenced by ambitious views, and thinking that, from the multitude being so desirous to make Jesus a King, now would be the time for him to set up his earthly kingdom. The verb, however, like others in Greek and Latin of similar import, is often used of moral persuasion. See Thucyd. viii. 41. and vii. 37. Nay, by an idiom frequent in our own language, it may only mean 'he caused them to enter,' &c.

23. τὸ πέραν.] Mark adds πρὸς Βηθσαιδάν, by which I would not (with many) understand the Bethsaida of Galilee, and consequently on the West side of the Lake; but the Bethsaida of Gaulonitis (mentioned at Luke ix. 10.) on the East side of the Lake, and near the embouchure of the upper Jordan into the Lake, and which, on being enlarged by Philip the Tetrarch, was called Julias, after Julia, daughter of Augustus. See Jos. Ant. xviii. 2. 1. The real state of the case seems to be this: that Jesus directed the Apostles to pass in a vessel from the place where he had worked the miracle of feeding the 5,000 to Bethsaida Gaulonitis, while he should dismiss the multitudes, intending that they should go by land, and himself to meet them at Bethsaida Gaulonitis, and then embark with them, and cross the lake to Capernaum. It may, indeed, be asked, how Bethsaida Gaulonitis could be said to be πέραν with respect to the West side of the Lake? a difficulty which has caused many to suppose Bethsaida of Galilee to be here meant. But the Lake might be crossed in any other direction as well as from West to East, or across the middle. Thus Bethsaida Gaulonitis might be said to be πέραν with respect to the scene of the miracle; though not on the West side of the Lake, whose exact form, however, is, I believe, very imperfectly known. I suspect that the shore of the Lake makes a greater hollow than the maps represent. The reason why our Lord pursued this course was, that the Lake is often very dangerous to cross over at the middle. And it should seem that, from the place where the miracle was worked at Capernaum, it was safer to make the distance by two crossings over; first to Bethsaida Gaulonitis, and from thence to Capernaum. As circumstances, however, fell out, they never went to that place at all.

If this mode be not adopted, far more difficulty will arise in another way, from its being inexplicable why our Lord should send them forward to Bethsaida of Galilee in the way to Galilee, when it would be quite out of the course, and involve the danger of crossing over the middle of the Lake to no purpose.

— ἕως οὐ ἀπολ. τοὺς ὄχλους] 'donec plebem dimisisset.' Subj. for Opt. (which strict propriety would require), because, as Fritz. observes, the writer regarded, in his mind, the thing as present, when Jesus would have said: προ-ἀγέτι με, ἕως οὐ ἀπολύσω τοὺς ὄχλους.

23. τὸ ὄρος.] Not 'a mountain,' but the mountain,—namely, that of the desert of Bethsaida, a part of that range by which the Lake of Genesareth is encircled on all sides.

— κατ' ἰδίαν προσεύξασθαι.] And also, as we find from John vi. 15, because they were about to take him by force, and make him a king.

24. μέσον.] This is, (as Krebs. and Fritz. show), not in the accusative, with the ellipse of κατὰ, but in the Nominative, as at Herodot. i. 170. τίσιν γὰρ μέσον εἶναι τῆς Ἰωνίης. and Greg. Naz. 52. ὡς ναῦν μέσῃ κλυδωνοῖ. The term μέσ. is meant to be taken populariter, of being somewhat advanced; since from John vi. 19. it appears that they had only gone about four miles.

— βασανιζόμενον.] Simply signifying, 'violently tossed;' as in Polyb. i. 48. 2. a stormy wind is said πύρρον βασανίζειν.

25. περιπατῶν ἐπὶ τῆς θαλ.] Thus evincing his Divine power; since this is in Job ix. 8. made a property of the Deity; ὁ πανύσας τὸν οὐρανόν, καὶ περιπατῶν, ὡς ἐπ' ἰδάφου, ἐπὶ θαλάσσης, meaning 'He who can work impossibilities.' And Horapollo Hierogl. i. 58. says, that the Egyptian hieroglyphic for expressing impossibility was 'a man's feet walking on the sea.'

26. φάντασμα.] A verbal from the third person Perf. Pass. of φανταζομαι; for which φάσμα was often used by the Classical writers, though φάντασμα occurs in Plato. The Jews, like the ancients universally, believed in the existence of spirits clothed in human form, to which were applied the names φάντασμα, φάσμα and εἰδωλον. The term may here be rendered spectre, or apparition. The disciples, some think, supposed it to be either the apparition of their Master, whom they imagined to be dead (so Eurip. Hec. init. Πολυδῶρον εἰδωλον), or his angel. (See Note on Acts xii. 15. and so Joseph. Ant. i. 20. 2. v. 6. l. uses φάντασμα for angel). For it was also the opinion of the ancients that, on the death of the person, his tutelary angel sometimes appeared in his exact form to his friends. Yet it is hardly, I think, to be supposed that the Apostles would entertain so low an idea of their Divine Master; and therefore it may rather be imagined that they took the appearance to be that of some spectre, they knew not what; for it should seem they were not near enough to distinguish the countenance. Accordingly Jesus addressed to them the words 'It is I, be not afraid.'

27. ἐγὼ εἰμι] Sc. ἐκείνος, 'it is I.' Literally, I am the person! as also John xiii. 13. xviii. 5.

28. κέλευσον, &c.] Under bid is also implied enable me to, &c.; for Peter desired a miracle to be worked, to prove that it was really Jesus.

31. ἰδίστασας.] The word properly signifies to stand in obscuro, undetermined which way to take. So Eurip. Or. 625. διπλῆς μερίμνης δαττ' ὅχουσι ἰδὼν ὁδοῦ.

32. ἐμβάντων.] Some very ancient MSS. and Fathers, as also the Vulg. and Italic Versions, read ἀναβάντων, which is strongly supported by the parallel passage of Mark vi. 51. καὶ ἀνέβη εἰς τὸ πλοῖον, sine var. lect. It is scarcely necessary to notice that ἀναβαίνω is used for ἐμβαίνω in all the ancient writers from Homer downwards; but as ἐμβ. is almost always used by the later writers, the scribes not unfrequently mistake ἀναβ. for ἐμβ. Here, however, ἀναβ. has more propriety; the term being used of per-— ἐκόπασεν] 'was lulled,' i. e. hushed. Sub. αὐτῶν. The word occurs both in the Sept. and in the Classical writers, as Herodot. vii. 31. After this John (vi. 21.) adds: καὶ ἐθίβαν τὸ πλοῖον ἰγνίετο ἐπὶ τῇ γῇ εἰς ἣν ὑπῆγον. And Mark: καὶ λίαν ἐκ περισσοῦ ἐν αὐτοῖς ἐξίσταντο, καὶ θαύμαζον. Οὐ γὰρ συνῆκαν ἐπὶ τοῖς ἄρτοις· ἦν γὰρ ἡ καρδία αὐτῶν πεπρωμένη. [Comp. Ps. cvii. 29.]

33. Θεοῦ Υἱὸς εἶ.] Bishop Middleton has proved that the want of the Art. will not authorize us to translate 'a son of God,' or 'son of a God.' For, as to the former in the sense prophet, there is no proof that prophets were so called. And as to the latter, which is thought suitable to the ideas of Paganism, there is no proof that these men were such; or, if so, they might join in the language of the Apostles on this extraordinary occasion. And though it be urged, that the disciples were not yet acquainted with the Divinity of our Lord, yet even that must be received with some limitation. That the Messiah would be the Son of God, was a Jewish doctrine; and, therefore, if they acknowledged him as the Christ (a title which they had repeatedly heard him claim to himself), they must have regarded him as the Son of God (though how far they then comprehended the full import of the title Son of God we cannot determine); and thus προσεκύνησαν may be taken in its full sense. And what they themselves heard, they would be likely to impart to the mariners; whose exclamation may thus be understood in the highest sense. 'Ἄλθως, &c. too, implies as much as, 'Thou art really (the character which thou claimest, and art said to be), the Son of God.' So the Centurion, Matt. xxvii. 54, exclaims, ἀληθῶς Θεοῦ Υἱὸς ἦν οὗτος. [Comp. Matt. xvi. 16. John vi. 22—24. xi. 27. 34—36.]

XV. The fame of Jesus had now become so great, that the Jewish rulers thought it high time to put a stop to its further progress.

1. οἱ ἀπὸ Ἱεροσολύμων] 'those of,' or belonging to 'Jerusalem.' An idiom occurring in numerous passages of the Scriptural and Classical writers referred to by the Commentators. The Scribes of Jerusalem were the most learned of the Pharisaical sect, and, as such, were entitled to deliver instruction wherever they went. The persons were probably sent by the Chief Priests and Pharisees, and doubtless came with insidious intentions.

2. τὴν παράδοσιν τῶν πρεσβυτέρων.] Παράδ. signifies a precept, or body of precepts, not written, but handed down by tradition. So Josephus, Ant. xiii. 10, 6, says, ὅτι νόμιμα πολλά τινα παρίδοσαν τῷ δήμῳ οἱ Φαρισαῖοι ἐκ πατέρων διαδοχῇ, ἀπὸ οὐκ ἀναγίγνασθαι ἐν τοῖς Μωυσίαις νόμοις. These νόμιμα were afterwards digested into one body, and called the Talmud; divided into the Mischna (or Text) and the Gemara (or Commentary), on which see Horne's Introd. ii. 417, seqq. By τῶν πρεσβυτέρων are meant, not the members of the Sanhedrim, but the most celebrated doctors.

3. διατί καὶ ὑμεῖς—ὑμῶν.] Our Lord confutes them from their own positions; skilfully opposing the παράδοσις τῶν πρεσβυτέρων, &c. to the ἐντολὴ τοῦ Θεοῦ; and before he disputes respecting the tradition to which they referred, he uproots the very foundation on which their whole reasoning was erected; showing, by a manifest example, how often this was at variance with the Divine Laws.

— καὶ ὑμεῖς] 'you too.' Διὰ τὴν παράδοσιν. Render either, 'through your tradition,' or because of. Either sense will hold good in point of fact; since the Pharisees superseded the written word of God through the medium of a traditionary system of faith and practice. The latter sense, however, is supported by the parallel passage of Matthew, and is therefore preferable; especially as it is confirmed by the Pesch., Syr., and Arab. Versions, and is more agreeable to the usus loquendi of the Gospels.

4. τίμα τὸν πατέρα.] Exod. xx. 12. This was understood to comprehend, under obedience and dutiful respect, taking care of and supporting. See Numb. xxii. 17. xxiv. 1. Judg. xiii. 17. Deut. v. 16. Eph. vi. 2. So Eccles. iii. 8. ἐν ἔργῳ καὶ λόγῳ τιμα πατέρα. Thus also κακολογεῖν, answering to Heb. הָרָה, denoted slighting, neglecting [to support]. Such, too, was the mode of interpretation sanctioned by their own Canonists. See Lightf. and Wets. See Exod. xxi. 17. Comp. Deut. xxi. 18. Σοῦ after πατέρα is cancelled or rejected by all the best Editors, as indeed of little or no authority. Θανάτῳ is not a mere pleonasm, but a strong expression, importing a capital punishment of the worst sort. Or Σαν. τσλ. may mean, 'let him be put to death without mercy,' Hebrew תָּמָה תָּמָה to which our common phrases bear a little affinity.

5. ῥάρον.] Scil. ἵστω. From the parallel passage of Mark it would seem that ῥάρον is here simply the interpretation of the Heb. קָדַשׁ denoting any thing devoted—namely, to the service of God. But as it was often employed in making a vow against using any article, it came, at length, to denote any thing prohibited; and, if spoken with reference to any particular person, the phrase imported that the vower obliged himself not to give any thing to the person in question; and thus, if that person were the father of the vower, he was held prohibited from relieving his necessities. Such is the view taken of the term by Lightf., Grot., Camp., Kuin., and most of the recent Commentators. Yet it seems more natural, with the ancient Fathers, and some modern Commentators, to take ῥάρον simply of something consecrated, or rather supposed to be consecrated, to pious uses, by a collusion between the sons and the priests, so as to leave the father destitute. For (to use the words of Bp. Jebb, Sac. Lit. p. 246,) 'when the Jews wished to evade the duty of supporting their parents, they made a pretended, or at least an eventual dedication of their property to the sacred treasury: or rather a dedication of all that could or might have been given by them to their parents, saying, Be it Corban.' From that moment, though at liberty to expend such property on any selfish purpose, they were prohibited from bestowing it on their parents. Thus κορβάν, ῥάρον, might imply the notion of prohibition; but it could not express it. On either interpretation, however, to say to a parent Corban, &c., was a breach of the commandment, in spirit if not in letter, and was virtually κακολογεῖν πατέρα.

— ὃ εἰς ἐξ ἐμοῦ ὠφέλ.] Render, 'whatsoever thou mightest or shouldst have been profited by me.' The εἰς is for ἐν, and belongs principally to the verb, but also to δὲ, to express ever; by an idiom frequent in St. Matthew.

— καὶ οὐ μὴ τιμήσῃ, &c.] There is here no small difficulty in the construction, in which many suppose an ellipsis of some word, as ὀφείλει. Here, however, ἐλλipsis, properly speaking, cannot have place. We may rather suppose an apodosis to be wanting (namely οὐ τελευτᾷ θανάτῳ) to be supplied from the preceding verse, of which Fritz. adduces several examples, with references to Critics. Bp. Jebb, indeed, thinks that the context has within itself the full meaning; q. d. 'Whosoever shall say Corban, &c., must also not honour his father or mother,' i. e. he is under an obligation not to do so. So in the parallel passage of Mark vii. 12, οὐκ ἐστὶ ἀφεῖναι αὐτὸν οὐδὲν ποιῆσαι τῷ πατρὶ. But this is doing violence to the construction (καὶ οὐ μὴ τιμήσῃ being suspended on ὃς ἂν εἴπῃ), and introducing what would, I apprehend, be bad Greek; for though οὐ μὴ with the Subj. in forbidding is found, yet never with καὶ preceding, which here demands that τιμ. be taken with the preceding.

7. προεφῆτευσεν.] From the use of this term the early Commentators in general regarded the passage which follows as a real prophecy; while others have considered it as only a prediction of what would afterwards happen, veiled under a rebuke to the persons addressed. Certainly the employment of the above expression does not necessarily imply that the words are to be considered as a prophecy; for προφητεύειν may be taken in the very frequent sense of speaking or writing under Divine inspiration. And there is a peculiar propriety in that use of the term here; the words purporting to be the words of God himself. That Chrys., Theophyl., and Euthym. did not regard the passage as a prophecy, is certain; and that they took προεφ. to denote speaking under Divine inspiration is highly probable from their expositions. As to περὶ ὑμῶν, that may very well be taken figuratively, for (ὡς) περὶ ὑμῶν; the sense being, that 'Isaiah (xxix. 13.) spoke, under Divine inspiration, of the Jews, as if he had been speaking of you.' So Euthym. 'Ἀγὰρ τὸν προφῆτην πάλαι κατηγοροῦντα αὐτῶν ὡς οὐτοὶ κατηγοροῖ. Thus the passage may be regarded as an accommodation or application, by way of illustration, of what was said of the Jews of Isaiah's time, to those of the time of Christ. And it may, therefore, be classed among quotations in the way of illustration, which are allowed not to be, properly speaking, prophecies: though they are sometimes said to be fulfilled, i. e. in a qualified and peculiar sense of the word, whereby any thing may be said to be fulfilled, which can be pertinently applied; on which see Note, supra ii. 17, 18.

8. ἐγγίξει μοι, καὶ τῷ στόματι αὐτῶν καὶ.] These words, omitted in a few MSS., and some Versions and Fathers, are double bracketed by Vater, and cancelled by Griesb. But the evidence in question will scarcely warrant even suspicion. The words of the quotation (Isaiah xxix. 13.) in this and the next verse, exactly correspond to the Sept., except that in the Sept. there is a καὶ beτρεσα διδασκαλίας and ἐντ.; which, however, has nothing corresponding to it in the Heb., and doubtless arose from the negligence of scribes or mistake of scribes. In v. 9, both the Sept. and St. Matthew differ not a little from the Heb.; and the discrepancy is such as cannot be removed, unless by resorting to so bold an alteration of the Hebrew text, as sober criticism will not permit.

For though there is no doubt, that for τῇ the Sept. read τῆς, and for πτοῦ read πτοῦ; yet although these are slight alterations, they ought not to be admitted, on authority far greater than that of any Version, nor indeed all the Versions; because they break up the construction of the whole sentence, the וְיָ (inasmuch as) at the beginning of the 13th verse corresponding to וְיָ (therefore) at the beginning of v. 14. The words of the Prophet may literally be rendered, 'Their worship of me is [only] a taught commandment of men;' i. e. their religion rests only on the precepts of men's teaching, i. e. according to the tradition of the elders, and the interpretation of the Scribes. So that, upon the whole, though there be a discrepancy in words, there is none in sense.

9. μάτην.] Properly the Accus. sing. (with an ellipsis of κατὰ) of the old noun μάτη, from the obsolete μάτος (from μίματος). Διδασκαλίας, 'as, or by way of doctrines.'

— ἐντάλματα ἀνθρώπων.] The term is here used at Mark vii. 7, and Col. ii. 22, contrasted, by implication, with the commands of God, which are in the N. T. called, not ἐντάλματα, but ἐντολαί. (Campb.) Mark here adds, (vii. 8.) ἀφίεντες γὰρ τὴν ἐντολὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ, κρατεῖτε τὴν παράδοσιν τῶν ἀνθρώπων, βαπτισμοὶ ἐξ ὕδατος καὶ ποτηρίων· καὶ ἄλλα παρόμοια ταυτά πολλὰ ποιεῖτε.

10. τὸν ὄχλον.] Namely, as opposed to the Pharisees.

11. Ὁ δὲ εἰσερχόμενος εἰς τὸ στόμα is meant, 'what entereth into his mouth as food.' So Xea. Cyr. i. 6, 17, ὅσα τὰ εἰσόντα. By τὸ ἐκπορευόμενον ἐκ τοῦ στόματος is meant (as we learn from the explanation at vv. 18, 19.), evil words, emanating from corrupt hearts. Κοινὸν for κοινὸν ποιεῖ.

In thus speaking, our Lord did not intend to abrogate the distinction between clean and unclean things for food. His meaning was only this; that nothing which they should eat was naturally per se impure (and therefore such as could defile the mind of man); but was only so by accident, ex instituto. As the best comment on this passage, compare xii. 35, 37.

To complete the present narration there should be supplied from Mark vii. 16, 17, εἰ τις ἐχει ὅσα ἀκούει, ἀκούειτω. Καὶ ὅτε εἰσῆλθεν εἰς οἶκον ἀπὸ τοῦ ὄχλου, &c. For the words εἰτις, &c., would be a very proper conclusion to so serious an address; and it is plain from the air of the words following, that they were not pronounced in the presence of the multitude, and while the Pharisees remained, but after they had withdrawn from thence, and (as we find from Mark) had returned home.

12. τὸν λόγον.] The Article is here used as in all cases when λόγος means λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ or Κυρίου. (Middleton.)

13. φυτεία.] The word properly signifies 'a planting,' or plant; but metaphorically denotes the doctrines, or traditions in question, by an allusion to the mind as soil, and precepts as plants, just as the Word is elsewhere called seed. Comp. John xv. 2. A comparison familiar both to the Hebrews and Greeks. Comp. Matt. xiii. 23, 38. John xv. 2. 1 Cor. iii. 6. So, by a similar allusion, Psal. Sal. xiv. 3, ἡ φυτεία αὐτῶν ἐπρίξω μὲν εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα.

14. [Comp. infra xxiii. 16. Luke vi. 39.] — τυφλὸς δὲ τυφλὸν—πεσοῦνται.] A proverbial saying, common to both the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans. Βόθυνον signifies, not ditch, but pit, such as was dug to procure or receive water.

15. παραβολήν.] The sense here is, moral 'maxim, or weighty apothegm.' It is not that Peter did not understand it (for it was by no means obscure, inasmuch that our Lord says καὶ ὑμεῖς ἀσυνετοὶ ἐστε); but that his prejudices prevented his receiving it. Indeed he could scarcely believe his ears, that a distinction of meats availed not; and therefore asks an explanation.

16. ἀκμὴν.] Put adverbially for ἔτι, ἔτι, yet, as not unfrequently in the Classical writers. Comp. infra xvi. 9.

17. χωρεῖ] 'passeth.' Ἀφιδρῶνα. A word of the Macedonian dialect, no where else occurring. From its etymon, (ἀπὸ and ἔδρα) it signifies a place apart, and thence a privacy; and may be compared with κοινῶν.

18—20.] Here our Lord proceeds to say what does defile the man; namely evil words, as emanating from corrupt hearts. Comp. James iii. 6. He then traces the effects of both, in the principal vices which pollute man; all originating in evil concupiscence. Comp. James i. 14, 15. On the exact force of the terms διαλογισμοὶ πονηροὶ, φόνοι, μοιχεῖαι, πορνείαι, κλοπαί, ψευδομαρτυρίαι, βλασφημίαι, see Notes on Mark vii. 21, 23, where they are amplified and arranged in regular order.

19. γὰρ] 'exempli gratia, thus.' Comp. Gen. vi. 5. viii. 21.

21. εἰς τὰ μέρη Τύρου καὶ Σ.] Namely, the confines of Tyre and Sidon. As our Lord seems not to have actually entered into the Gentile territories, we may here (with Grot.) interpret εἰς versus, towards; as answering to our word in towards. Or, if that be thought too great a license, we may take μέρος as said for μεθόρια, which is used by Mark. Now μεθόριον denoted a strip of land which was between two countries, but properly belonged to neither; though sometimes reckoned to one or the other.

22. γυνὴ Χανααῖα.] Called by Mark Ἑλληνίς Συροφοίνισσα, i. e. a Gentile, a Phœnician of Syria. Συροφ. by way of distinction from the Phœnicians of Africa, or the Carthaginians. Kanaana here seems to have been used, and not the more precise term Φοιν., because in the earlier Syro-Chaldee original there was written ܡܕܢܚܐ. Indeed, it should seem that the word Φοιν. had not been introduced into the vulgar Hebrew; for the word no where occurs in the Hebrew of the O. T., but only in the Greek of the books of the Maccabees. That Canaan (as Gesenius observes in his Heb. Lex. in v. 722) was the domestic name of the same people whom the Greeks called Phœnicians, is evident from the Phœnician medals, on which we find the word ܡܕܢܚܐ. In the Sept. (as might be expected) the names Phœnicia and the land of Canaan; Phœnicians, and Canaanites, are used promiscuously.

The woman was a Gentile by birth, though probably not, as some have supposed, a proselyte. Yet it does not follow that she was an idolater for many Gentiles in those parts were believed the one true God, and felt much respect for Jewish worship, though they did not profess it. The word Κύριε, by which she addresses Christ, must, as is plain from the ὁ Δαυὶδ following, mean Lord, not Sir, or Master, as Abp. Newcomen and Campb. render. The woman might also have learnt both the doctrine of a Messiah, and appellation, from the Jews. Finally, for a particular explanation of this narrative, and a correct view thereof, showing the peculiar propriety of Lord's conduct, in making the manner in which he complied with the request of the Greek, then (ordained by the providence of God to one of the first Heathen proselytes) a type of mode in which the Gentiles should be received.

— ἐκραύγασεν.] This may, with most Expositors, be construed with λέγουσα; but with αὐτῷ, as thus yielding a stronger and definite sense; a mode also confirmed by similar expression, v. 23, κράζει ὀπισθεν and by another at Psalm cxlviii. 9, compare Job xxxviii. 41.

23. οὐκ ἀπεκρίθη αὐτῇ λόγον.] A neglect, but only intended to try the strength of her faith.

— ἀπόλυσον] 'dismiss;' viz., as it is with the grant of the favour she asks, as from vv. 24, 26.

24. ἀποκριθεὶς.] Not to the disciples woman. Οὐκ ἀπεισάλην, &c. As was first (see Acts xiii. 46.) to be proselytes, so our Lord might seem sent to them, and therefore is with reason to Paul, Rom. xv. 15, διάκονος τῆς περιτομῆς (meaning the Circumcised, the Jews) cordingly he never did extend his beyond the Jews, nor probably went boundaries of Judea. And during he caused the offer to be confined to them, in his injunctions to the Apostles to evangelize, he directs them (Matt. go to the Gentiles, but πορεύεσθε βατὰ τὰ ἀπολωλὸτα τοῦ Ἰσραὲλ called ἀπολωλὸτα (as at ix. 36. μὴ ἔχοντα ποιμένα) with referre neglect of all pastoral care by shepherds or chief priests.

— οἴκου Ἰσραὴλ.] The Article, Bp. Middleton shows, is dispensed with, because οἴκος Ἰσραὴλ may be regarded as a single noun, and that a proper name. [Comp. supra x. 5, 6. Acts viii. 46. Rom. xv. 8.] On the force of προσεκύνει here see Dr. P. Smith, Scr. Test. ii. 261.

26. κυναρίοις.] The word was here adopted after the manner of the Jews (though implying censure on them) in speaking of the Gentiles; yet it was also a term of reproach in common use with both. The diminutive is, as often, expressive of contempt.

27. ναὶ, κύριε.] The Commentators are not agreed as to the force of this formula. Most modern expositors (after Scalig. and Casaub.) assign to it the sense 'obsecro te,' as in Rev. xii. 20, and sometimes in the Classical writers. And so the Heb. נָא. But the ancients, and some moderns (as Grotius, Le Clerc, Eisan., Schleus., and others) take it to import assent; which, indeed, is most agreeable to the answer. And though ἀλλὰ does not follow,—as it properly should,—yet, in such pathetic sentences, regularity is overlooked. Here (as often) γὰρ has reference to a short clause omitted, to be thus supplied: 'True, Lord! [but extend a small portion of thy help and mercy towards me:] for even (καὶ) the dogs,' &c.

— τῶν ψιχίων σαρὰς. See Note on Luke xvi. 21. For ἀπὸ τῆς τραπέζης τῶν κυρίων Mark has ἀπὸ τῶν ψιχίων τῶν παιδίων, which is more suitable to τέκνων just before.

On this custom, which was common both to Jews and Gentiles, Wetst. cites Athen. 97, A., and Philostr. Vit. Ap. i. 19, in addition to which I would add Liban. 182. C. πρὸς τῆς τραπέζης (I conjecture τῇ τραπέζῃ) κύων ἐστὶ τῶν ἐπίσω σκαλῶν ἱζάνων, πρὸς αὐτὴν ἀνίσταται τὴν τραπέζην εἰσπράττει, δάκρυα εὐτραπείας ἔχει· τὸ στόμα πρὸς τὸ ρεπτοῦμαιον. Athen. 270. D. Κὰν ἰσφατισματὰ τινα ἔχη, δὲ τοῖς κυσίν. Iscorh. Cam. 607. sq. καὶ κρίμα χερῶν, κατ' ἰσφρίον τρίφος Μάχη σπάσσονται προσφίλις κωλύμενοι. These ψίχια were directed not to be gathered up. So Aristoph. ap. Diog. Laert. vii. 34, μὴ γίνεσθ' ἄντ' ἂν κατατίσῃ τῆς τραπέζης ἱκετοῖς.

29. εἰς τὸ ὄρος.] Not 'to a mountain,' but, 'to the mountain;' namely, the mountainous ridge, which skirts the lake on all sides.

— ἐκάθητο ἰκετοῖς] 'commoratus est ibidem,' as in John vi. 3, and Eccles. xxxvii. 18.

30. κυλλοὺς.] The Commentators have not made it clear what is meant by this term, and how it differs from χωλοὺς. In my Recens. Synop. and the two first Editions of the present work, I explained it (after Kypke) to mean a person with a distorted limb, like our club-foot. And that the word should have that sense, would seem probable from its derivation; it being cognate with κοῖλος. And that it in fact had such a sense is placed beyond doubt by the learned evidence adduced by Kypke, especially from Hippocrates. Yet the adoption of it here is precluded by the use of the word in the only other passages of the N. T., where it occurs, infra xviii. 8, xv. 31. Mark ix. 43, 45, where the sense in question was utterly inapplicable; and the term must plainly mean maimed, ἀνέπηρος, and, as appears from the latter, maimed in the hand. A sense equally applicable, and therefore certainly to be adopted, in the present case. To account for this strange variety of meaning, we may suppose (as in the case of some other words) that the two senses had originally two different terms to express them; and that these came at length, by corruption, to be merged into one. The two terms were, I apprehend, κυλλός, cognate with κοῖλος, and explained by Hesych. κάμπυλος, and κόλλων, or κόλος, which, as we learn from the Greek Lexicographers, meant κάλλυος or κόλλυος; and was equivalent to ἀνέπηρος: a sense which the word might well have, as being derived from κόλω, cognate with κολούω, to curtail. But to turn to the present case, as ὑγιεῖς follows, which would not be applicable to the supplying of a limb wanting, it is best to take the word as used, like our word maimed, of such a grievous hurt as deprives of the use of a limb.

31. κωφοὺς.] Meaning, both deaf and dumb; since those born deaf are naturally dumb also. Of this word one example only beyond the N. T. is adduced by Schleusner; namely, Habak. ii. 18,

32. ὅτι ἦδη ἡμέραι τρεῖς—μοι.] In this passage, while the sense is plain, the reading is disputable. The textus receptus and the bulk of the MSS. have ἡμέρας; while a considerable number of the most ancient and the best MSS., and some Fathers have ἡμέραι, which has been received by all the Critical Editors from Wets. to Scholz, on the ground of its being the more difficult reading. Yet this introduces an intolerable harshness; for, as Fritz. observes, who ever heard of ἡμέραι τρεῖς for ἡμέρας τρεῖς. This he would remove by inserting εἰσω, καὶ after τρεῖς, on the authority of two MSS., two Versions, and some Fathers. But, not to say that the authority is far too slender, we have thus only an exchange of one harshness for another, in the καὶ before προσμένουσιν, which followed by another καὶ, is scarcely to be tolerated. The difficulty may be better removed by supposing an ellipsis of εἰσω, and either regarding ἦδη τρεῖς ἡμέραι as an interposed clause, to be pointed off by commas; or, if that be thought too harsh, by taking προσμένουσιν as not a verb, but a participle pres. dat. The confounding of the two, one with the other, is not unfrequent. Thus, for instance, in Thucyd. iii. 31, it is only very recently that Critics have seen that ἐφορμῶσι (or rather, as I have shown ought there to be read, ἐφορμῶσι) is not a verb, but a participle. Thus the construction will be perfectly regular, and agreeable to a very frequent idiom (on which see Matth. Gr. Gr. § 390.), e. gr. Xen. Hist. ii. 1, 27, ἡμεῖς ἡμῶν πεμπτη ἐκπλήρουσι τοῖς Ἀθ. Thus the literal sense will be: 'There are now three days to them continuing with me,' &c. If, however, it should be thought that the verb substantive in this idiom cannot be dispensed with (though it would seem to be partly supplied by the ἦδη, which almost implies it), we may insert εἰσω after τρεῖς, on the authority of the above MSS., Versions, and Fathers, but reject the καὶ, as having been introduced by certain sciolists who were ignorant of the true construction. The εἰσω might be absorbed by the εἰς preceding. Finally, the ellipsis of αὐτοῖς is by no means harsh. It is in the passage of Thucydides expressed, at least according to the reading αὐτοῖς, approved by Poppo, and rightly received by Arnold.

—ἐκλυθῶσιν.] Schleus. lex. remarks that the word is used, 'speciatim de languore corporis e fame, siti, et laboribus orto.'

36. εὐχαριστήσας] scil. τῷ Θεῷ, expressed in Acts xxvii. 35. Rom. xiv. 6. See Note supra xiv. 19.

39. ἀνέβη.] So, for ἐνέβη, the Critical Editors from Wets. to Fritz. read, on the authority of many MSS., Versions, and early Edd.; Scholz alone retaining the vulg., but without any sufficient reason. External authority is nearly equally balanced for either; but internal, I apprehend, quite in favour of ἀνέβη, which, from its comparative uncommonness, might easily be changed to the ordinary term ἐνέβη; though it is of unexceptionable propriety, occurring in the N. T. infra at Mark vi. 51, and perhaps supra xiv. 32; in the Sept. at Jonas i. 3, ἀνέβη εἰς αὐτό scil. τὸ πλοῖον, also in the best Classical writers, Homer and Thucydides; though confined almost entirely to the earlier authors, the later writers using instead of this ἐμβάινω. Yet ἐνέβαίνω, as it was probably the original and appropriate term, so it always continued in use in the common dialect, and from thence was introduced into the Sept.

—εἰς τὰ ὄρια Μαγδαλά.] Mark says εἰς τὰ μέρη Δαλμανουθῆ. Yet there is no real discrepancy; since ὄρια here (as not unfrequently) means territory; and Dalmanutha was a small town about three or four miles south of Magdala, and therefore probably in its district. All the difference is, that Mark's account is the more definite, while both are equally true.

XVI. 1. πειράζοντες scil. αὐτὸν (expressed in Mark) for εἰς τὸ πειράζειν αὐτόν, 'in order to try him,' put to the proof his pretensions to be the Messiah. The term implies the false pretence which dictated the action. They had already resisted the clearest evidence of miracles, and they now demanded a sign from heaven, hoping thereby to throw Jesus into a dilemma, by asking what would have been not improper for him to grant. They had already resisted sufficient evidence; and they only asked for more to scoff the more. So the Jews, at his Crucifixion, asked him to come down from the cross, and then they would believe in him. But in such a case to grant the demand were as useless as the demand itself was unreasonable; since, thus hardened and impenitent, 'neither would they believe though one arose from the dead.'

By a sign from heaven was probably meant some peculiar manifestation from thence, as fire from heaven, 1 Kings xviii. 38, or a glorious appearance in the heaven. [Comp. supra xii. 38.]

— ἐπηρώτησαν.] Here is the same idiom as that by which we say, to ask (i.e. request) any person to do a thing. On the matter itself see supra xii. 38.

2. εὐδία] Sub. ἵσται. The Jews, and indeed the ancients in general, were attentive observers of all prognostics of weather, fair or foul; and many similar sayings are adduced from both the Rabbinical and Classical writers by the Commentators.

3. στυγνάζων] for καὶ στυγνάξει. The Commentators and Lexicographers say, that στυγνάζω signifies properly to grieve, and thence to be gloomy. The very reverse, however, is the truth. The verb (which is rarely met with, except in the N. T. and Sept.) is derived from στέγος, thick, from στυγνός, and that from στυώ, to huff up. See Wied. xvii. 5. εὐδία στυγνός.

— τὸ μὲν πρόσωπον, &c.] From this reproof it appears, that the refusal of the Jews, to acknowledge the Messiahship of Christ was owing neither to the want of evidence, nor to the want of capacity to judge of that evidence. The accomplishment of the ancient prophecies (Gen. xlix. 10, Is. xi. 1; xxxv. 5. Deut. ix. 24.) and the miracles which he performed, were proof sufficient, and much more easily discernible than the signs of the seasons. (Mackn.)

— τὰ δὲ σημεῖα.] meaning, as Robinson explains, 'the miraculous events which foreshadowed the coming of the Messiah in his kingdom.' Our Lord intends to intimate that the same sincere and honest attention, which made them usually good prognosticators of the weather,—might, had they not been hypocrites in their inquiries, have enabled them to have discerned, by the signs of the times, the truth of his pretensions. See Scott.

4. Vide supra xii. 39.

5. εἰς τὸ πέραν] i.e. to the territory of Bethsaida. Ἐπελάθοντο δὲ λαβεῖν. Meaning, by a popular idiom, 'they found they had forgotten to take bread.'

6. ὁράτε καὶ προσέχετε.] An emphatical phrase, signifying mind and studiously attend to. It is not so much a Hebraism, as an idiom common to the simple and colloquial style in all languages. The conjunction of the two verbs is intensive of the latter. So Arrian Epict. i. 3. ὁράτε καὶ προσέχετε μήτι, &c. ζύμης, meaning, their doctrines, as ἰδουμένη imports both doctrines and ordinances. See Lightfoot. [Comp. Luke xii. 1.]

7. λέγοντες.] Ὅτι Supply εἶπε or the like.

9. [Comp. supra xiv. 17. and John vi. 9.]

10. [Comp. supra xv. 34.]

11. ἄρτων.] So, for ἄρτων, all the most eminent Editors from very many MSS., of various families, and some versions.

13. τίνα με λέγουσι, &c.] For qualem, as v. 15. Mark viii. 27, 29. 1 Cor. iii. 5. James iv. 12. See Robinson's Lex. in v. Bp. Middleton has shown that the interpretation of Beza and others, which supposes a double interrogation ['whom do men say that I am? the Son of man?'], would involve an intolerable harshness, not to say solecism. Yet, as the common reading and construction is thought liable to some objection, he thinks the conjecture of Adler probable; that the received reading was made up of two, viz.: τίνα με λέγουσιν οἱ ἄνθρωποι εἶναι, (which is the reading of Mark and Luke) and of τίνα λέγουσιν οἱ ἄνθρωποι εἶναι τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, which is the supposed true reading of St. Matthew. The με is not found in the Vatican MS. and several Versions and Fathers. But this authority is very slight. In a single MS. the με might be omitted by accident,—as is occasionally the case with the pronouns με and σε. That the scribe of the Vatican (or of its Archetype) did unintentionally omit the με, is highly probable, since in the Cod. C. the με is put after λέγουσι. Hence it seems to have been first accidentally omitted, and then inserted after λέγουσι, not to spoil the calligraphy. And as to the Versions, they are only the less ancient and inferior ones; for the authority of the Vulg. is overbalanced by that of the Italic, which has the με. Besides, Versions in any passages of difficulty or controverted sense are, from the license of translation, but questionable evidence. Moreover, the με seems required by the με in the next verse. And there is surely nothing really objectionable in the common reading. The purpose of our Lord in asking his disciples 'what men thought of Him' was, to hear their sentiments of Him, and to remove their misconceptions. The various incongruous notions of people respecting the nature and office of the Messiah had, it should seem, perverted the minds of the Apostles, who stumbled at the doctrine of a suffering and dying Messiah. In order to remove these misconceptions, our Lord was pleased to enter into a conversation with them on the subject of his death and resurrection, prefacing it by inquiring into the opinions commonly entertained of him. Thus he asks: 'What sort of a person do men say that I, [who am] the Son of man, am?'

The people generally acknowledged him to be a very extraordinary person; but we find that even those who esteemed him most highly had very inadequate apprehensions of his real dignity. The highest (as it seems by the next verse) to which their faith then rose, was to think (as did Herod) that he was John the Baptist risen from the dead, or Elijah, or Jeremiah, or some other of the prophets, who were, they thought, in various ways to usher in the advent of the Messiah.

16. In this verse Peter, with his usual promptitude and characteristic zeal, answers in his own name, and that of his brethren: and his answer is the more remarkable, because every word is emphatic; q. d. Thou, and no other, art the [promised] Christ, the Son of the living God.

16. ὁ Υἱὸς—ζῶντος.] There was, as Whitty remarks, this difference between ὁ Χριστὸς and ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, that the former referred to his office, the latter to his Divine original; though he admits that neither Nathanael (John i. 49.) nor the other Jews, nor even the Apostles, used it in that sublime sense in which Christians always take it. Ζῶντος denotes 'the (only) living and true [God]', as distinguished from αἰδωλα ἐψύχα, (Wisd. xiv. 29.) and fictitious deities; and because he alone 'hath life in himself,' and is the Giver of life. (Comp. John vi. 69. Acts viii. 37. ix. 20; 1 John iv. 15. v. 5.)

17. σὰρξ καὶ αἷμα] i. e. according to the sense of the expression in the N. T. and the Rabbinical writers (for it does not occur in the Sept.), Man, as composed of flesh and blood; by a circumlocution, which (as Fritz observes) always involves the idea of weakness and frailty. The sense is, 'Man [in his greatest wisdom], (alluding to the Scribes) hath not taught thee this, but God [by whose Providence thou becamest my disciple]. We are not, however, by this to understand any particular communication, by revelation, to Peter; but only the effect of that conviction, which resulted from the evidence afforded by the miracles, and confirmed by the precepts and doctrines taught by Christ. (Comp. 1 Cor. ii. 10.)

18, 19. We are now advanced to a passage on which, as the Church of Rome mainly rests its doctrines, of the supremacy and infallibility of the Pope, and the power of the Church, we are bound to discuss the sense with especial care. Let us, then, examine the words and clauses in order, as they offer themselves. First, from the very form of expression in Καὶ σοὶ λέγω, it is plain, that what is here said by Christ is meant to correspond to what had been just said by Peter. As he had declared to Jesus: Σὺ εἰ—Χύριος, so Jesus says to him: Καὶ σοὶ λέγω: 'Moreover I also say to thee.' On the next clause ὅτι σὺ εἰ Πέτρος, we are to bear in mind that Peter, or Cephas (for Πέτρος is only Cephas Grecized), was not the original name of this disciple, but a surname, given to him (as was customary with the Jewish Rabbis at the baptism of proselytes) at his conversion, by anticipative reference to his character, as a Christian professor. And as those names were often given with allusion to some peculiar quality of disposition; so, in the case of Simon, it had reference to that zeal and firmness which he displayed, as well in first making this confession of faith in Christ, as in afterwards building up the Church, and establishing the religion of Christ. So our Lord, in like manner, surnamed James and John Bonaverages, sons of thunder, Mark iii. 17. For examples of this kind of Paronomasia in giving names, see Gen. xvii. 5. xxxii. 27, 28, and compare Gen. xxvii. 36. Eurip. Phœn. 645. Æschyl. Prom. 472. Theb. 401. Agam. 670. Πέτρος, or Κηφᾶς means, not stone (as some affirm), but Rock, as πίτρος not unfrequently does in the Classical writers, as Herodot. ix. 53. Soph. Œd. T. 334. Callim. Hymn. in Apoll. 22. So Juvenius Hist. Ev. iii. 275, who well expresses the sense thus: 'Tu nomen Petri dignâ virtute tuæ. Hac in mole mihi, Sarigue in robore ponam Semper mansuras æternis monibus ædes.' So, by a similar figure, the Author of the Night Thoughts:

'On reason build resolve,
That columns of true majesty in man.'

But, to proceed, Commentators, both ancient and modern, are not agreed as to what is meant by ἐνὶ ταύτῃ τῇ πέτρᾳ. Now this must depend upon the reference; which some suppose to be Christ himself, as a rock (Is. xxviii. 16. 1 Pet. ii. 6, 7, 8.); others, the confession of faith just made by Peter (q. d. 'on the truth thus confessed, and similar confessions, as the test of piety, will my Church stand'); while others, again, (and indeed almost every modern Expositor of note,) refer it to Peter himself: and with reason; for certainly, as it is observed by Bp. Marsh (Comp. View. App. p. 27.) 'it would be a desperate undertaking to prove that Christ meant any other than Peter.'

In fact, they can indicate no other, consistently with the rules of correct exegesis; for, not to mention that the confession was not Peter's only; since, in making it, he spoke not for himself alone, but for all the Apostles; (and in that quality returned answer to a question which had been addressed to them collectively: 'Whom say ye that I am?' &c.) the connection subsisting in the name given for the surname which had been bestowed on Simon, confines it to that alone; as also does the parallelism between Christ's reply to Peter, and the answer which he had given. And when the Expositors above alluded to, in the second place, conjecture that, in pronouncing the words, Christ pointed to himself, (as the great foundation) they argue upon a wholly gratuitous and very improbable supposition. Not to say that the words following καὶ δώσω σοι, &c. imply that there had been some previous gift or distinction. Indeed, both that and the preceding interpretation, however plausible, seem to have been forced upon the passage, to avoid the difficulty which appeared to arise from taking it in its obvious sense, which is: 'Thou art by name Rock (i. e. thy name means Rock); and suitably to that will be thy work and office; for upon thee (i. e. upon thy preaching, as upon a rock) shall the foundation of the Church be laid.' It may, indeed, seem strange, that so natural an interpretation should have been passed over by any. But that may be attributed partly to the causeless fears into which Protestants have been betrayed, lest, by admitting it, they should give a countenance to the Papal claim of supremacy; and partly to an idea, that such a sense would be contrary to what is elsewhere said in Scripture,—namely, that Christ is the only foundation. See 1 Cor. iii. 11. But as to the first, the fear is groundless: it being (as Bp. Middleton observes) 'difficult to see what advantage could be gained; unless we could evade the meaning of δώσω σοι τὰς κλεῖς, which follows.' And as to the latter fear, it is equally without foundation; since the two expressions are employed in two very different senses. In St. Peter's case it was very applicable; for, as he was the first Apostle called to the ministry, so he was the first who preached the Gospel to the Jews, and also the first who preached it to the Gentiles. So that, to use the words of Bp. Pearson on the Creed, 'the promise made here was punctually fulfilled, by Christ's using Peter's ministry in laying the foundation of the Christian Church among both Jews and Gentiles, and in his being the first preacher to them of that faith which he here confesses, and making the first proselytes to it: for St. Peter laid the first foundations of a church among the Jews, by the conversion of 3000 souls, Acts ii. 41, who, when they gladly had embraced St. Peter's doctrine, were all baptized; and then, ver. 47, we first find mention of a Christian Church. St. Peter also laid the first foundation of a Church among the Gentiles, by the conversion of Cornelius and his friends, Acts x.' 'If (as observes Bp. Taylor, Works, vol. viii. p. 56.) St. Peter was chief of the Apostles, and head of the Church, he might fairly enough be the representative of the whole college of Apostles, and receive this promise in their right, as well as his own;—that promise, I say, which did not pertain to Peter principally and by origination, and to the rest by communication, society, and adherence; but that promise which was made to Peter first; yet not for himself, but for all the college, and for all their successors: and then made a second time to them all, without representation, but in diffusion, and performed to all alike in presence, except St. Thomas.' See also Dr. Barrow's Works, iv. 47. In fact, the Apostles

8. 9. δεδεμένον ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς· καὶ ὁ ἐὰν λύσῃ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, 30 21 ἔσται λελυμένον ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς. Τότε διεστείλατο τοῖς 20

generally are in other parts of the N. T. called the foundation on which the Church is built, as in Eph. ii. 20. and Rev. xxi. 14, as being the persons employed in erecting the Church by their preaching. And what they all, more or less, did, —Peter commenced the doing thereof, and might therefore be said to be the first foundation; though in matters of doctrine, the Christian Church rests on the testimony, not of one, but of all.

But to proceed to the clause καὶ πῦλαι ἔδωκεν οὐ κατασχέουσιν αὐτῇ, here πῦλαι is the same debate as to the reference in αὐτῇ; some referring it to πίστεα, as meaning either Peter's confession of faith, or the rock of the Gospel: both methods alike harsh and gratuitous, and in violation of the laws of exegesis. Almost all Expositors of note are agreed in referring it to ἐκκλησίαν, both as it is the nearer antecedent, and because there thus arises a better sense. As to what is urged by some, that 'the grammatical construction is against it,' the persons who make this assertion show that they know as little of grammar as of criticism. And when they urge that the sense yielded by ἐκκλ. is wholly untenable on the ground of historical fact—this proceeds wholly upon a misconception of the force of ἐκκλ., on which see Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. IX., where he explains the different modes of using the word. To understand the exact import of this promise, it is especially necessary to attend to the important expression πῦλαι ἔδωκεν. Now this, (notwithstanding certain plausible, but far-fetched senses which have been propounded) the constant import of the phrase both in the Greek Classical writers, the Old Testament, and the Rabbinical writers (where it constantly denotes the grave, or the entrance to it, the state of the dead) must determine to mean simply death, i. e. the entrance into a new state of being: for the Hebrews as well as the Greeks and Romans, ascribed gates to Sheol, or Hades. Thus the clause in question contains a promise, either of perpetual stability to the Church Catholic, or Church of Christ (on which see Bp. Horsley, as cited in D'Oyly and Mant, and Vitringa de Synag. p. 86.), or, taking ἐκκλ., as the best Commentators direct, to denote the members of it individually,—that 'not even death shall prevail over the [faithful] members of it, but that they shall be raised to a happy resurrection.'

Let us now proceed to examine the true import of the words which contain the second privilege conferred on St. Peter; namely, δώσω σοι τὰς κλεῖς τῆς βασιλείας τῶν οὐρανῶν. These words are a continuation of the image by which the Church was compared to an edifice founded on a rock. And as a key is used for the purpose of locking or unlocking the door of a house; and he who possesses that, has the power of admission to or exclusion from the house, and may be said to have the general care and superintendence of it; so a key was an usual symbol of power and authority for any work (see Is. xxii. 2.); and presenting with a key was a form of investing with that authority. Thus the words seem intended to further explain what was meant by founding the Church upon Peter, as a foundation; figuratively denoting that Peter should be the person by whose instrumentality the Gospel edifice,—the kingdom of heaven,—should be first opened to both Jews and Gentiles; which was verified by the event. See Acts x. 44. compared with xv. 7. Now this surely cannot be supposed to give Peter any supremacy over the rest of the Apostles (for see xviii. 18. John xx. 23.), much less any paramount authority to the Bishops of Rome in after ages.

The words ὁ ἐὰν λύσῃ—οὐρανοῖς are explanatory of the former. And some think, that as the Church of Christ is compared to an edifice, of which the Apostles have the keys (comp. Is. xxii. 22. and Rev. iii. 7.), and according as they open or shut the door to any one on earth, he shall be admitted to or excluded from heaven. But it is to be observed, that we have here, not ἂν, but ὅ. It should rather seem that, though this clause be explanatory of the former, yet that it contains, not a continuation of the image taken from the keys (i. e. of opening and shutting), but a fuller development of the notions of trust and power, of which keys were a symbol; and that the power meant is of a more general and extensive kind, namely (as the natural force of the words demands) over the things adverted to in the context, i. e. those which respected the Christian Church. And accordingly the verbs δέω and λύω must be modified in sense suitably thereto. So Lightfoot, Selden, Hammond, Whitby, Kuinoel, Wahl, Fritz., and most recent Commentators are of opinion that δέω corresponds to the Heb. רצה which signifies retare, interdicere, not only in the Rabbinical writings, but in Dan. vi. 7, 8, as also in the Chaldee Paraphrase on Numb. xi. 28, and that λύω (answering to the Heb. פתח and פרח) ex vi oppositi, denotes to pronounce lawful, concede, permit, direct, constitute, &c.: a sense which, though exceedingly rare in the Greek writers, yet is not quite unprecedented. One example is adduced by Selden from Diod. Sic. l. 27. ὅσα γὰρ ἐγὼ θῆσω, οὐδεὶς δύναται λύσαι. Yet even this is but the literal Greek version of an Oriental Inscription. The following example, therefore, among several which I have noted from Classical writers, may be not unacceptable. Soph. Antig. 39. sq. (which passage ought to be thus pointed): τί δ', ὦ παλαίφρων, εἰ τὰδ' ἐν τούτοις, ἐγὼ λύσω· ἂν ἢ φάπτοσσα προσθεμένην κλέω· where the Schol. and Brunck well explain λύω ἢ φάπτοσσα by λύωσα τὸν νόμον, ἢ ἐπιβιβαιοῦσα. And though the ellipsis be somewhat anomalous, yet we have here evidence of the existence of the phrase, as applied to the observing or neglecting any injunction; by a metaphor taken from opening or shutting a door, or rather locking or unlocking a door. For it must be remembered, that the doors of the ancients were fastened with bands (to which there is an allusion in ἐφάπτοσσα) or chains, to which a padlock was suspended.

The sense, then, of the words in question will be: 'Whatsoever thou shalt forbid to be done, or whatsoever thou shalt declare lawful, and constitute in the Church, shall be ratified, and held good with God; including all the measures necessary for the establishment and government of the Church.' (See Vitringa de Synag. p. 764. sq.) That the above powers were exercised by Peter, in conjunction with the other Apostles, is indisputable. We need only advert to the decisions of the Council held at Jerusalem, when nearly the whole of the Mosaic ritual law was loosed, given up, and abrogated, while part of it was bound and still held obligatory. See also Acts x. 28. & xxi. 24.

Whatever may be thought of the dignity thus conferred, it will certainly by no means justify the assertion of any peculiar prerogative to the Roman Pontiff: nor affect the question at issue between Protestants and Romanists upon the power of the Church. Whatever foundation Peter might be to the Church, it is clear that the very image excludes all notion of a succession of persons similarly circumstanced. Nor, if the superiority of Peter had been permanent, could it afford a shadow of reason for deducing from it the supremacy of the first Bishop of Rome in the persons of his successors. At the same time, it must be observed that the authority of binding and loosing, first communicated to St. Peter and the other Apostles, was exercised by their immediate successors; and indeed has been continued, as far as altered circumstances would permit, by their successors, the Bishops of the Church, to the present day.

20. μὴδ. εἰρ. meaning, 'before his resurrection,' as being premature, and pernicious in its consequences. The most eminent Critics are agreed, that Ἰησοῦς, found in the common text, is to be cancelled, on the authority of 54 MSS. and several Versions and Fathers.

21. Having now, by the power of his miracles, convinced his disciples that he was the Christ, the promised Messiah, obtained their declaration of faith in him, and exercised the power of Messiah by committing paramount authority to Peter and the other Apostles, our Lord proceeds to correct the misapprehensions of his followers as to the true nature of his kingdom, and his proper character as Messiah. Well knowing the secular views by which they were not a little swayed, he checks their vain expectations of worldly aggrandisement, by disclosing the real object of his incarnation; which made it necessary that he should go to Jerusalem, and there encounter insult, scorn, rejection, and death. He, moreover, apprizes them of the necessity for their taking up the cross likewise, and sacrificing, if need should be, their lives for the Gospel's sake. At the same time he comforts them with the assurance, that though he must now leave them, yet he would come again in the glory of his Father, and, in the administration of his spiritual kingdom, would amply reward their faithful devotion to him by glory, and honour, and immortality.

— πρεσβυτέρων.] The members of the great Sanhedrim called at Luke xxii. 66, πρεσβυτέρων. 22. προσλαμβάνουσ αὐτόν] 'taking him aside,' q. d. 'by the hand;' an action naturally accompanying advice, remonstrance, or censure. Schleus. adduces an example of this sense from Plutarch; in addition to which I have noted one from Aristoph. Lysist. 1128, λαμβάνει δ' ὅμῃς, λοιδορῆσαι βούλομαι. Ἐπιτιμᾶν here only denotes affectionate chiding.

— Ἰλέως σοι.] Sub. Θεὸς εἴη, expressed in 1 Chron. xi. 19. Equivalent to our 'God forbid!' and common in the Sept., Philo, and Josephus. The words following, οὐ μὴ ἔσται σοι τοῦτο, are explanatory of Ἰλέως σοι and Grot. regards them as equivalent to the Classical μὴ γίνωιτο; while Fritz., more properly, makes this distinction between them,—that the former is a formula malum omen avertentis; the latter, precurrentis et evadendi sperantis rem aliter eventurum esse; i. e. Di meliora, Domine! non credo hoc tibi accidit.

23. σατανᾶ.] Adversary, or evil counsellor. The words σκάνδαλον, &c. are exegetical of the preceding, and signify, 'thou art an obstacle to the great work of atonement by thy death;' namely, by fostering that natural horror of his painful and ignominious death, which occasionally harassed our Saviour.

— οὐ φρονεῖς.] Φρονεῖν τί τινας properly signifies, 'to be well affected to any one, to take his part.' Here it denotes caring for, being devoted to, as 1 Macc. x. 20.

24. ὀπίσω μου ἔλθειν] i. e. 'become my follower or disciple.'

— ἀπαρνησάσθω ἑαυτόν] 'let him neglect his preservation, not value his life.' Comp. Luke xiv. 26, and see note on Matt. x. 38, sq.

26. τί γὰρ ὠφελεῖται — ψυχῆς αὐτοῦ:] This seems to be a proverbial saying, but transferred from temporal to spiritual application, there being an allusion to the double sense of ψυχὴ, — life and soul. q. d. 'If we think an earthly and temporary life cheaply bought, at whatever price, how much more a heavenly and eternal one.' At ζημιωθῇ τὴν ψυχὴν sub. etc., which is sometimes expressed in the Classical writers, though they generally use the Dative without a preposition. Τί δώσει, &c. Another proverbial expression. Comp. John xii. 25. Ἀντάλλαγμα signifies 'a thing given in exchange for, or in compensation for the loss of any other thing;' viz. as a ransom for it. Thus it may very well carry with it a Genitive, as here and in Ecclus. vi. 15, φίλου πιστοῦ οὐκ ἔστ' ἀντάλλαγμα. In this case the Genit. is governed not of the noun ἀντάλλαγμα, but of the ἀντι in composition. So Pollux Onom. iii. 13, (de avaro) τὴν ψυχὴν ἀν' ἀντάλλαγος τοῦ χρυσίου.

27. μήλλαι γὰρ, &c.] The Commentators are not agreed as to the reference in this and the next verse. The ancient, and the earlier modern ones in general, refer the former of them to the final advent of Christ at the day of judgment; the latter, to the second advent of Christ at the destruction of Jerusalem, about 40 years afterwards. Most recent Expositors, however, since the time of Whitby, refer the former verse also to the same period. And indeed they make out, as far as regards the connection with the preceding verses, a tolerably good case. Not so, as regards the words and phrases of the verse itself; which though they be not wholly unsuitable to the first advent, yet are, far more naturally, to be understood (according to their use elsewhere) of the final advent. And as to the connection, the γὰρ may be referred, not to the verses immediately preceding, but to the injunction at v. 24; vv. 25, 26 being parenthetical. Nor is the course of argument injured; which may be preserved by supplying mentally a few words of connection between v. 27 and 28, q. d. [Of his power and determination to judge and punish the impenitent, he will, ere long, give a specimen on the unbelieving and persecuting Jews;] for 'verily I say,' &c. See more in Whitby. And as this coming ἐν βασιλ. (i. e., as Fritz, rightly explains, in medio regni splendore) is elsewhere described in terms bearing a strong resemblance to those which designate Christ's final advent, there was the greater propriety in introducing them as a just ground to expect and prepare for it. And although it has been urged that it would be harsh to understand the times of one person; and St. John alone of the bystanders is known to have lived to see the destruction of Jerusalem, yet that argument is very inconclusive; for it is highly probable that others of the by-standers, as well as St. John, might live forty years. And certainly the air of the words suggests a somewhat distant even not one close at hand, as would be the case, if we were to take this, with Mackn. and others, of the Transfiguration. But although the words themselves are sufficiently applicable to the advent of Christ at the destruction of Jerusalem, yet the application is forbidden by the parallel passage of Mark viii. 38. ix. 1. Luke ix. 26, 27, which remove the sole difficulty that involves this passage, by enabling us to trace the real connexion of the verse, which is not with the preceding one but with v. 24; vv. 25, 26 being in some measure parenthetical, and v. 27, not contained in Mat and Luke totidem verbis, but included in Mat. Thus, then, by the coming of the Son of man seems simply meant the coming of his Kingdom prayed for in the Lord's Prayer (see Note Matt. vi. 18), which, it is certain, did come, as Mark says 'in power,' in the lifetime of us then present. In these words, then, the disciples are encouraged to take up their cross and follow Christ, by the argument, that though his kingdom be now despised, yet the time was not far dis when it would be established in power. The parenthetical portion intimates the awful consequence of the opposite course,—namely, utter rejection. Comp. Matt. x. 89. John xii. 25, and not

28. ἰσθηκότων.] Many MSS. and some others have ἰσθῶτων, which is edited by B. Griesb., Knapp, Vater, and Scholz. Other ἰσθῶτες, which is adopted by Wets., and by Fritz., as being the more difficult. But it seems to have come from the many to have been a conjecture of those who to read εἰσὶ τινες ὧς ἰσθῶτες. As to mentioned reading, it may be the true; the evidence is not so strong as to des change in the text; and the common is defended by Mark ix. 1. Luke ix. 27.

— γεύεσθαι θάνατον is a Hebrew Σιωπεῖν θάνατον. John viii. 51; and Luke ii. 26), by which verbs of sense the metaphorical signification to experience also not unfrequent in the Classical writers γεύεσθαι is joined not, indeed, with but with nouns denoting trouble, &c. Trach. 1108. μόχθων μυρίων ἐγεύετο as draws back for a moment the veil from the invisible world; on the circumstances, manner, and probable purposes of which, a brief notice must here suffice. For further particulars, the reader is referred to Bp. Hall's Contemplations, Whitby, Mackn., Porteus, and Townsend. The transaction itself may be considered as a figurative representation of Christ's final advent, in glory, to judge the world. I. To advert to some of the particulars,—why three disciples, and no more, were admitted, seems to have been, because that number was the number of witnesses necessary to establish the legal proof of any transaction. The three particular disciples taken were selected, as being the most attached and confidential of the disciples. That the presence of Moses and Elias was a bodily, and not, as some say, a visionary appearance, there is no reason to doubt; especially as it involves no difficulty, but such as Omnipotence will vanquish at the general Resurrection; though the nature of the change in question is incomprehensible to us, with our present faculties. As to supposing, with some sceptical foreign theologians, the whole to have been a vision, that is still less defensible; for though the disciples had been asleep (or rather heavy for sleep), the transaction, it seems, taking place in the night (see Luke ix. 32), they are distinctly said to have been awake when they saw and heard Moses and Elias conversing with Jesus. II. With respect to the purposes of this transaction, it seems to have been intended, 1. to loosen the prejudices of the Apostles as to the performance of the Mosaic Law, by a figurative and symbolical representation of the expiration of the Jewish, and the commencement of the Christian dispensation: 2. to reconcile their minds to the sufferings and death of Christ: 3. to strengthen their faith, by affording an additional proof, as it were by a sign from heaven, of the Divine mission of Jesus. For it is probable that as the Jews supposed the Messiah would, at his coming, be seen literally descending from the heavens, and arrayed in glory; so our Lord was pleased to give his Apostles this decisive proof of his Messiahship, by showing himself in his glory, such as that with which he would appear at the final Advent. The representation was, no doubt, also intended to comfort and support the Apostles under their present and future trials and tribulations, by a prospect of the glory which should be revealed in their Saviour, and, through him, in themselves.

—ὄρος.] This mountain is, from ancient tradition, supposed to have been Tabor. Lightfoot, however, questions the truth of the tradition; but, as far as respects the distance of the mountain from Caesarea Philippi, on insufficient grounds; for it is only about 45 miles from that place, a distance easily accomplished in six days. But neither on the other hand, will the words of v. 2, and Mark ix. 30, as is alleged, prove what those who maintain that the mountain was Tabor, aver; namely, that a journey was taken through Galilee just before the Transfiguration. As to the former passage, see the note there; and as to the latter, it only proves that a journey to Caper-naum was taken after the Transfiguration; and therefore it is highly improbable that there should have been so long a journey taken just before it. And although the expressions used by St. Matthew and St. Mark do not specify any particular mountain, yet the context evidently points at some mountain in the neighbourhood of Caesarea. And this probability is converted into certainty by the words of St. Luke, ἀνέβη εἰς τὸ ὄρος (as it is found in all the MSS., confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version), where the Article limits the sense to some mountain, which might be called the mountain in respect to Caesarea; and that cannot well be any other than some part of the ridge of Hermion, most probably that part of it which runs out into the plain of the Jordan, within six miles of Caesarea, called the mons Pancon. The tradition above mentioned seems to have arisen from the confounding of the two Mounts Hermion; one very near Tabor, the other near Caesarea. It should seem that after it had been preserved by ancient tradition, that Mount Hermion was the scene of the Transfiguration, those who lived in later ages supposed the Hermion to be that near Tabor, as was natural; since the two were often associated. So Ps. lxxix. 12. 'Tabor and Hermion shall rejoice in Him'; and others afterwards fixed on Tabor itself, on account of its very close contiguity, and its being most κατ' ἰδίαν, in their mistaken view of the expression, referring it to the mountain; for Mr. Maundrell, in his Travels, remarks that it stands 'apart'; and all travellers describe it as being of a conical form, detached from the neighbouring mountain, and terminating in a point.

2. μετεμορφώθη] 'was transfigured.' The word (which sometimes imports a change of substance) here denotes only a change in external appearance (as in Ælian V. II. i. 1.), agreeably to the sense of its primitive μορφή in the Old and New Testament. Thus, in the plainer words of Luke ix. 29, τὸ εἶδος τοῦ προσώπου αὐτοῦ ἔταρον ἰγνίετο. A similar appearance is ascribed to Moses, when he came down from Sinai, after receiving the Tables of the covenant, Exod. xxxiv. 29, sq., where it is said that his face shone, εἰδύξαται, namely, with a kind of glory, as it were an ἀπαύγασμα τὴν δόξης τοῦ Θεοῦ.

3. μετ' αὐτοῦ συλλαλοῦντες.] Namely, as we learn from two added verses of Luke (ix. 31, 32.) on the subject of the death which he was about to undergo at Jerusalem, and doubtless the redemption thereby effected for the world; things into which, St. Peter says, 'the angels desire to look.'

4. ἀποκριθεὶς] 'addressing himself,' ὡς εἶναι, 'to remain here.'

4. σκηνάς.] Booths composed of branches of trees, such as were hastily raised for temporary purposes by travellers, and such as were reared at the feast of tabernacles.

5. ἔτι α. λαλ.] 'while he was yet speaking.'

— φωτεινῇ.] Griesbach and Fritz edit φωτόν, on account of its being the more difficult reading. But that Critical canon has its exceptions. One is, when the reading involves a violation of the usus loquendi. Now νεφ. φωτός, as Knittel and Fritz. remark, 'repugnantiam quandam continet, (comp. Mark ix. 7.) nec facile dici potest,' whereas φωτεινῇ is supported by vi. 22, see Luke xi. 34, 36. Another is, when the external evidence for a reading is exceedingly slight; which is the case here; for it is found only in a very few inferior MSS. The cloud here mentioned, called at 2 Pet. i. 17, the 'excellent glory,' is supposed to have been the Shechinah, or symbol of the Divine presence, in which the Divine Majesty often appeared to the Jews.

— ἐπισκιάσεν.] Not, overshadowed, but diffused itself around, circumfudit. Comp. Virg. Æn. i. 586. An Hellenistic use found in the Sept. The αὐτοὺς may be understood of all present.

— φωνή, &c.] This is one of the three instances in the Gospels, of God's personally interposing and bearing testimony in favour of his Son. Αὐτοῦ is to be taken emphatically, 'him alone,' and no longer Moses and the Prophets. [Comp. supra iii. 17. 2 Pet. i. 17. Mark i. 11. John i. 34. Is. xlii. 1.]

6. ἔκιστον ἐπὶ πρόσωπον.] A posture naturally assumed by those to whom visions and Divine revelations were vouchsafed; and to be accounted for not so much on a principle of fear (it being the general persuasion that the sight of a supernatural being must destroy life), as of reverence. [Comp. Dan. viii. 18. ix. 21. x. 10, 18.]

9. ἐκ τοῦ ὄρους] i. e. that mentioned, supra xvi. 20. For ἀπὸ Matthew, Griesbach, Fritz., and Scholz edit ἐκ, from very many MSS., early Editions, and Fathers. And internal evidence is quite in favour of the reading. The same diversity exists in a kindred passage of Exod. xxiv. 29, the ἐκ being in the text. recep., and ἀπὸ in the Alex. and other MSS.

— τὸ ὄραμα] 'what they had seen,' & ἰδόν, as Mark phrases it. This term quite excludes the notion that it was a mere vision. In the very same sense, indeed, ἄραμα is used at Acts vii. 31 (of the burning bush), ὁ δὲ Μωϋσῆς ἰδὼν ἰθαύμασι τὸ ὄραμα.

10. τί οὖν οἱ Γραμματεῖς—πρῶτον.] q. d. 'How, then, if thou be the Christ, can the declaration of the scribes (founded on the prophecy of Mal. iv. 5.) hold good, that Elias must precede the Messiah, to announce his coming, and restore all things, &c., when we see the Messiah already come, and no Elias performing any of the office in question?'

11. Ἠλίας μὲν ἔρχεται—πάντα] i. e. ἔλθ is, indeed, first to come, ' &c. The future tense used, because our Lord here adopts the language which was generally applied to the Messiah q. d. 'It was true, which the Scribes taught, 'Elijah would appear before the coming of the Messiah.' Καὶ ἀποκαταστήσει πάντα. By ἀ is properly meant to restore a thing to its original state; and, by implication, to reform and arrange it. From the manner in which the text brought forward (namely, in repeating the words of others), it will appear that the sense must be pressed on, but must be explained agreeably to what was to be expected from the nature of the ministry; which was that of preaching a testimony of repentance, correcting men's carnal and notions of the Messiah, and preparing the way for his coming by a moral reformation as well as could be expected from so preparatory a try (see Matt. iii. 3.) as John's was,—in to be considered the purpose rather than the means though that was not inconsiderable. By expression it is said, Rev. xxi. 3, Behold all things new.'

they did not recognise him in that character of forerunner to the Messiah.

— ἐν αὐτῷ.] This is not so much a Hebraism, as rather a popular idiom, similar to one in our own language. Ποιεῖν is adapted to denote treatment of every kind, whether good or bad. In ἐποίησαν ὅσα ἠθέλησαν we have a popular idiom, usually implying violence. We may compare the Classical phrase χρῆσθαι ὅτι βούλεται or βούλονται, occurring in Thucyd. vii. 85, and elsewhere. So also Xen. Cyr. ii. 4, 19 (cited by Middleton), where an eagle having caught a hare, ἀπελαλὼς ἐπὶ λόφον τινα, ἐχρῆτο τῇ ἀγρᾷ αὐτῇ ἠθέλει. By a similar expression it is said, Luke xxiii. 25, τὸν δὲ Ἰησοῦς παρίδωκε τῷ Σαλῆματι αὐτῶν.

14. ἐλθόντων] for καταλθόντων, used by Mark. — αὐτόν.] So all the Editors from Wetstein downwards read, for αὐτῷ, on the strongest evidence both of MSS. and Fathers, and the usage of Scripture, as Mark i. 40. x. 17.

— γονυπετῶν.] The action was that of the deepest reverence, and suitable to the humblest supplication.

15. σεληνιάζεται] literally, 'he is moon-struck.' From the symptoms mentioned here and at Mark ix. 18, this disorder is supposed to have been epilepsy; under whose paroxysms those afflicted with it are deprived of all sense, bodily and mental, and nearly all articulation. And as we find, in the ancient medical writers, epileptic patients are said to be moonstruck, agreeably to the common notion, of the influence of the moon in producing the disorder, it is very possible that the disorder in question was epilepsy. Be that, however, as it may, the symptoms are all reconcilable with demoniacal influence.

17. αἱ γενεὲ ἀπίστοι.] Who are the persons to be understood has been much debated. Some understand the father and the relations. Others, the Jews, i. e. the Scribes who might be present on the occasion. Others, again, the disciples; which seems from the context to be the most probable. But it is better (with Doddridge, Kypke, Kuinoel, &c.) to suppose the reproof meant for all present, each as they each deserved it. Γενεὰ ἀπίστος may be referred to the disciples, and perhaps the father; διεστρ. to the Scribes; the first ὑμῶν to the disciples and the second to the scribes. Here there seems an allusion to what Moses says of the Jews, Deut. xxxii. 5, γενεὰ σκληρὰ καὶ διεστραμμένη.

— διεστραμμένος signifies, literally, crumpled, and, metaphorically, perverse. There is a similar metaphor in our word wrinkle, from the part. past wrinkled, from wrink, to twist. In both terms there is a tacit reference to what is straight. So also εὐθύς for upright, occurring in Ps. vii. 12. Acts viii. 21, & al.

— ἕως πότε—ὑμῶν] render, 'How long must I be with you,' i. e. 'how long must my presence be necessary to you?'

18. καὶ ἐπετίμησεν—δαιμόνιον.] Some refer the αὐτῷ to the sick person; others, far more correctly, to the dæmon. In fact, the passage is to be taken as if written καὶ ἐπετίμησε τῷ δαιμόνι, καὶ ἐξῆλθε. Mark adds the address of Jesus to the demon.

— καὶ ἐξῆλθεν ἀπ' αὐτοῦ τὸ δ.] Mark adds: καὶ ἐγένετο ὡσαύτως νεκρός· ὥστα πολλοὶς λέγειν ὅτι ἀπὸ θανάτου.

— καὶ ἰθὺραπέμην, &c.] I would bring in here, and not after verse 21, the words of Luke, ix. 43, ἐξῆλθοντες δὲ πάντες ἐπὶ τῇ μεγαλειότητι τοῦ Θεοῦ.

20. διὰ τὴν ἀπιστίαν ὑμῶν.] Render, 'because of your want of faith, or deficiency in faith;' for, as Mr. Greswell observes, (vol. i. 160.) 'it cannot be inferred from the words following that the Apostles did not possess any kind or degree of the faith in question, but simply not that kind or degree of faith which is represented by the mustard-seed.'

Nor is it necessary, since (as Chrys., Euthym., and also some modern Commentators have seen,) the sense may be: 'this kind of beings, namely demons. Similar expressions might be adduced both from the Greek and Latin, and modern languages.

— ἐν προσευχῇ καὶ νηστείᾳ. viz., says Campbell, as necessary to the attainment of that faith, without which the demons could not be expelled; and, therefore, prayer and fasting might be said to be the cause, as being the cause of the cause.

22. παραδίδοσθαι. To be delivered up. [Comp. supra xvi. 21. infra xx. 18.]

— ἀναστρεφόμενων ἐν τῇ Γαλιλαίᾳ. This should not be rendered, 'while they abode in Galilee'; nor, 'while they returned to Galilee'; nor, even 'while they passed through.' For though it may seem to be required by Mark ix. 30. παρεπορεύοντο διὰ τῆς Γαλιλαίας, yet there is no authority for such a sense; nor do the words of St. Mark require it; for παρεστ. there means, 'they passed along through' (as in ii. 23.) i. e. travelled through. And that is the very sense of ἀναστρέφεισθαι here, of which Wets. will supply examples. Render, 'as they were travelling in Galilee,' i. e., as we find from verse 24, on their way to Capernaum. [Comp. John vii. 1.]

24. τὰ δίδραχμα. 'the didrachms.' A collective name for the tax so called. The plural is used with reference to the many persons from whom it was collected, each paying one. The tax was doubtless the half shekel, the sacred tribute, which was paid by every Israelite from his 20th year, even if resident out of Judaea.

25. ὅτε εἰσῆλθεν εἰς τὴν οἰκίαν. The person here meant is not clear. Almost all the Commentators suppose Jesus. We may, however, understand it with the Syriac, Euthym., L. Brug., and Kuinöel, of Peter. The sense may be thus expressed; 'When he (i. e. Peter) had entered into the house, [whither Jesus had already gone, while the tax-gatherers were applying to Peter for the contribution,] and was just about to ask him whether he would not pay the contribution, Jesus was beforehand with his question, by asking him one, namely, τί σοι, &c.

— τέλη ἢ κῆνσον. By the former are denoted the customs, or tax on eatables or drinkables: by the latter, the ἐπικεφάλαιος, head-money, or poll-tax, laid on the provincials.

26. ἄραγε ἐλεύθεροί ε. οἱ υἱοί. Of these words the simplest and most probable interpretation is that of Chrysost. and Euthym. (approved by Fritz.), namely, 'Then this tribute, paid to God for his temple, I ought not to pay, inasmuch as I am his Son.' There is an argument a fortiori. 'If such be the case with an earthly king's son, how much more the heavenly,' &c.

27. Ἵνα μὴ σκανδαλίσωμεν αὐτοὺς i. e. that we may not make them suppose, that we understand the temple; which might cause them to stumble at, and reject my pretensions.

— τὸν ἀναβάντα ἰχθύν 'that which rises [to, or meets the hook].' As to the piece of money here mentioned, we need not, with Schmidt, suppose it created on purpose; but that it had fallen into the sea, and been swallowed by the fish. Many instances are on record of jewels, coins, &c. being found in the bellies of fishes. See Herodot. iii. 42.

XVIII. On the transaction now recorded, there is some discrepancy in the accounts of the Evangelists; of which the best solution appears to be that of Mr. Greswell, who supposes that the transaction took place twice on the same day, and in the same house. The disciples, it seems, had all of them been of late expecting that Jesus (whose fame had been recently fast increasing) would speedily enter on his temporal kingdom; and with minds bent on secular advantage, they had been, no doubt, conversing one with another about the different posts they should respectively hold about his person, or in his court. This had, it seems, formed the subject of especial disputation to Peter, James, and John, on their way back to Capernaum from the Mount of Transfiguration: and no wonder, since the preference which had been thus shown them by Jesus, would naturally excite their expectations of high advancement. On their reaching the house, Jesus inquired of them what they had been disputing about: for it seems their conversation was aside: and they were silent from shame. Whereupon our Lord gave them the lesson they so much needed, on humility, unambitiousness, &c.; and that by action as well as precept. See Mark ix. 33—50. Luke ix. 46—50. Afterwards, however, on the return of Peter from procuring miraculously and paying the Tribute-money, not the Apostles only, but the disciples generally (see Mark ix. 35.) (all of whom probably had been intent on the same subject as Peter, James, and John) agreed to refer to Jesus the subject of their mutual disputation τίς μείζων, &c.; whereupon our Lord gave them the same instruction, in the same striking manner, as he had done to the Apostles only; on this occasion, however, entering into more particular explanations. According to the foregoing view, the formula ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ὥρᾳ will denote 'about that time,' viz. the payment of the tribute-money.

1. μείζων for μείγιστος, say the Commentators. But the disciples seem to have desired to know, not who should be the greatest, but who should be great, i. e. fill the more considerable posts in the court of the Messiah. Thus James and John, as we learn from Mark x. 35, went to our Lord and asked, not each of them to be μείγιστος, but μείζων, namely, to occupy his right and left hand, and his regal state.

2. ἔστησεν αὐτὸ ἐν μ. α.] The more forcibly to impress on their minds the truth he wishes to inculcate, our Lord employs the aid of example; here adopting a method of instruction always prevalent in the East,—that by emblems and symbolical actions; a mode of conveying one's meaning, which having first been resorted to from the poverty of early language, was afterwards continued, from the advantage it possessed of forcible and vivid illustration; since none of the conceptions of the mind are so distinct as the direct impressions of the senses. Of these symbolical and significant actions the writings of the Old Test. supply numerous examples; nor are they wanting in the New. Those of the former are generally of a prophetic character; those of the latter, partly vehicles of prophecy, partly of counsel and instruction. Those of our Lord are generally of the latter description; as when he washed his disciples' feet, broke the bread at the institution of the Eucharist, and breathed on them when communicating the Holy Ghost. With respect to the touching so often mentioned in the Gospels, as prelude to the working of miracles, such actions may rather be regarded as significant than symbolical ones. The present was plainly the latter, and was intended to supply the place of a direct answer at the time, and to impart force to the instruction when directly communicated. See more in Mr. Greswell on Parab. vol. ii. p. 276—283.

3. ὡς τὰ παιδιά i. e. in respect to unambitiousness, humility, docility, and absence of a worldly-minded spirit; dispositions the very reverse to those which they were then indulging, (comp. infra xix. 14. 1 Cor. xiv. 20), and from which they needed to be turned and changed in their minds. Our Lord proceeds to show, verse 4, that he who evinces the dispositions thus inculcated, shall be distinguished in the spiritual kingdom which he came to establish.

— οὐ μὴ εἰσέλθῃτε, &c.] q. d. 'ye will not only attain no honour in the kingdom of heaven, but ye will not even gain admittance into it.'

4. ταπεινώσῃ.] Lachman and Scholz edit, from many ancient MSS., ταπεινώσαι. But there is not sufficient evidence to justify any change. If the propriety of the Greek be objected to, we might answer, with Matthæi, 'In Nov. Test. non Græcitas sed Codices valent.' However, the propriety has been fully established by Fritz.

— οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ μείζων, &c.] Meaning the character they were inquiring after under the name μείζων.

5. καὶ ὡς ἐὰν δέξεται, &c.] The preceding verse is evidently directed to the Apostles; while this and the following seem not applicable to them, but were probably addressed to the by-standers. [Comp. supra x. 42.]

— ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματί μου i. e. in the character of being my disciples, 'because he belongs to Christ,' as it is explained Mark ix. 41.

6. σκανδαλίσῃ.] Σκανδαλίξω always denotes either the giving, or the being the cause of, a σκάνδαλον, or offence.

6. μικρῶν.] Meaning, Christians in general, namely, those of ordinary capacity and attainments; honest and sincere, though not highly gifted believers. Comp. 1 Cor. i. 26, seqq.

— συμφέρει αὐτῷ, &c.] i. e. rather than he should commit such a crime as is implied in the context. So Clem. Rom. ad Corinth. Ep. i. 46. adda, ἢ ἕνα τῶν μικρῶν μου σκανδαλίσαι. Thus we have in the passage of Luke: ἢ ἵνα σκανδαλίσῃ ἕνα τῶν μικρῶν τούτων.

— μύλος ὀνικός] for λίθος ὀνικός, the expression used by Mark. Here, then, we have an example of the synecdoche, i. e. part for the whole, or a whole for a part. And the expression is a figurative one for an immense stone, as in Virg. Æn. viii. 250. Omniaque arma Advocat, et ramis vastique molivibus instat. In συμφέρει—καταποντισθῇ there seems to be a proverbial manner of speaking, to denote the enormity of a crime. The punishment here alluded to, though not in use among the Jews themselves, was so among the surrounding nations; where it was inflicted on criminals of the worst sort, especially parricides and those guilty of sacrilege.

— πελάγει τῆς θαλάσσης.] A somewhat rare phrase, which preserves the primitive sense of πέλαγος, namely, a depth. The very same occurs in Apollon. Rhod. ii. 608. For ἐπὶ before τὸν τράχ. very many MSS. have εἰς, which is edited by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, Fritz, and Scholz; perhaps upon just grounds. Nevertheless, I am more inclined to agree with Kuinoel, that the ἐπὶ arose from the Grammatici, who wished to make a Hebrew construction Greek. 'Εν τῷ πελάγει is for εἰς τὸ πέλαγος, hellenistic.

7. σκανδάλων.] We are to understand those scandals just adverted to, arising from the calamities and persecutions that awaited the professors of Christianity, and which are supposed to have been present to the mind of our Lord.

— ἀνάγκη γάρ, &c.] The necessity here mentioned is to be understood as conditional: 'it cannot but happen (ἀνινδακτόν ἐστι, Luke xvii. 1.) that offences (σκανδάλα) circumstances which obstruct the reception, or occasion the abandonment of the faith, should occur; whether occasioned by persecution, denial of the common offices of humanity, contempt, &c. The argument is, that from the corruption of human nature, and the abuse of man's free agency, offences must needs arise; yet, so terrible are the consequences of those offences, that it is better to endure the greatest deprivation or corporeal pain, than occasion them. On which subject see Bp. Taylor, Works, vol. iii. 221. sq. and Bp. Sanderson, Serm. p. 473. fin.

8. See supra v. 30. sq. and Notes. With respect to the consequētia, it should seem that, together with cautions against the σκανδάλα which draw others into sin, our Lord intermixes one (intended for his disciples) against throwing any σκανδάλον in our own way, by yielding to worldly-mindedness, or sensuality and inordinate affection. In short, the best comment on these verses are those of 1 John ii. 15, 16. Μὴ ἀγαπᾶτε τὸν κόσμον, &c.

9. See supra v. 29. and Note. On αἰώνιον see Pearson on the Creed, i. 592.

10. ὁράτε μὴ καταφρονήσητε, &c.] Reverting back to the subject treated of at vv. 6, 7, our Lord, from persecution in general, proceeds to warn his hearers against contumely towards the persons in question, and that on two grounds: 1. from the care with which God, by his angels, watches over his meanest servants; 2. from the love of Christ shown equally unto them, by his laying down his life for their sakes, as well as their more honoured brethren. It is plain that this admonition is intended for such as had become disciples. In the first, we have an argumentum ad hominem, founded on the general belief of the Jews (as well as the Greeks and Romans, at least popularly) retained among the early Christians, and possessed by the Fathers generally) that every person, or at least the good, had his attendant guardian angel. A belief strongly countenanced by what is said at Heb. i. 14. of there being 'ministering spirits to those who shall be heirs of salvation.' This angelic attendant was regarded as the representative of the person: nay, even as bearing a personal resemblance to him (see Acts xii. 15.), and also as standing in the same favour with God as the person himself. See more in Gresswell on Parab. ii. 329.

11. ἦλθε γὰρ—ἀπολωλός.] Here another argument,—both of the intrinsic value of a little one, and of the duty incumbent on their spiritual pastors, to protect them from all danger to their salvation,—is proposed in the example of our Lord himself, who came to seek and to save that which was lost, i. e. ruined man without distinction. (Greswell.)

Thus the connection here seems to be with the former part of the verse; q. d. ‘Despise not any fellow-Christians, however humble; for the Son of Man came to save lost and ruined men, without exception or distinction;’ showing that God willeth not the death of such, but that all should be saved. (Comp. Luke xix. 10.) The verse, however, is rejected by Kuin., and cancelled by Griesbach and Lachman; but rashly: for external evidence is, upon the whole, in its favour (only 5 MSS. and 3 inferior Versions being without it), and internal decidedly so; it being so much easier to account for its omission, than for its insertion from Luke xix. 10. So few, indeed, are the MSS. in which it is not found, that we might almost suppose it to have been omitted from the negligence of the scribes. But it should rather seem that the Alexandrian Critics (who throughout the whole of the New Test. took such unwarrantable liberties with the text) here threw out the verse, for no better reason than that they could not trace its connection. But the very difficulty of tracing that connection is the best of all reasons why we should not suppose the verse to be an insertion; for the kind of persons who used to insert clauses from one Gospel into another would never have thought of making the insertion here.

12, 13. The connection seems to be this: [You may figure to yourselves the grief and anger which the Almighty feels at one of his faithful being led away, by the joy which he feels at the recovery of one that had gone astray:] which is like that of the shepherd, who, &c. Τί ὑμῖν δοκεῖ (where the ὑμῖν is emphatic) is a formula, showing that the thing may be illustrated by what takes place among themselves, and in the ordinary transactions of life. At τὸ πλανώμενον supply πρόβατον. With respect to ὄρη, it is by some construed with περιουσία; by others, with ἀφίεις; which is the more natural construction, and, as being confirmed by the parallel passage of Luke xv. 4. Καταλείπειν ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ is preferable. To advert to its sense, it seems intended to denote those mountain pastures, which abounded in Judæa, and were chiefly grazed by sheep. So Ezek. xxxiv. 6. ‘my sheep wandered through all the mountains.’ 2 Chron. xviii. 16, &c. Nor is this to be considered as any discrepancy with the ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ of Luke; since the deserts of Judæa were chiefly mountainous, and were only ἐρημα, as being,—like the mountain districts of Scotland,—abandoned to common pasturage, and accordingly very thinly peopled.

14. Σίλημα] συριγμα, or counsel; as in John vi. 39. Acts xxii. 14. and equivalent to εὐδοκία at xi. 26. Οὐκ ἔστι Σίλημα ἔμπροσθεν, &c. is a formula loquendi (like that supra xi. 26. οὕτως ἐγένετο εὐδοκία ἔμπροσθέν σου) in which ἔμπροσθέν σου is a Hebraism (answering to ante) for the Classical Greek σοι; a dative of person being required by the nature of the phrase. This dative is, however, sometimes left understood, as in 1 Cor. xvi. 12. οὐκ ἦν Σίλημα (scil. αὐτῷ) ἵνα νῦν ἔλθῃ. And hence may be seen the true reason why the Article is here not used, (to account for which the learned Fritz, puzzles himself and his readers to little purpose), namely, because it is not needed. If the Genit. were used, then the Article would be required; though, if left understood, it might be dispensed with.

15—17. These verses relate to the resentment of injuries, and the methods of procuring their redress; v. 18. to the validity of spiritual censures, when lawfully inflicted; 19 & 20. to the efficacy of common prayer, and the presence of Christ with his Church under particular circumstances. As to the connexion of these several topics, we may account for them by the relation subsisting between special applications and a general case. (Greswell.)

—ἁμαρτήσῃ] i. o. ‘wilfully injure;’ a sense of the word frequent in the best writers. Comp. Luke xvii. 3, 4. In μεταξὺ σοῦ καὶ αὐτοῦ there is an allusion to the injunctions of the Mosaic law, Levit. xix. 17. Deut. xix. 15, on which the canons of the primitive Church were founded. Ἐκέρδησας may be understood either, with Euthymius, of gaining him over, and recovering him to brotherhood; or, with Grotius and most Expositors, of recovering him to a right mind, and to the path of duty. Both senses, indeed, may be united; the latter, as suspended on the former.

16. δύο μαρτύρων ἢ τριῶν.] In allusion to the injunction of Deut. xix. 15, also adverted to at John viii. 17, and 2 Cor. xiii. 1; and, as appears from the Talmud, constantly acted upon by the Jews. ῥῆμα, matter, as often in the New Test.

17. τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ] i. e. 'to the particular congregation to which you both respectively belong;' namely, in order that he may be publicly admonished to lay aside his unchristian spirit.

— ἔστω σοι ὡς περὶ οὗ ἐθν. καὶ οὗ τελ.] i. e. 'account him as a person whose intercourse is to be avoided, as that of heathens and publicans;' implying, en dernier ressort, excommunication. So Rom. xvi. 17. ἐκκλίνατε ἀπ' αὐτῶν, and compare 2 Thess. iii. 14. Ὁ ἐθν. and ὁ τελωνῆς are to be taken generically for heathens and publicans.

18. ὅσα ἔάν δήσητε, &c.] On the sense of these words see Note supra xvi. 19. The general import of τ. 18—20 is: 'Whatever ye determine, as to the regulation of the Church, shall be approved by the Divine will. Whatsoever ye shall determine respecting such an offender,—whether as to his removal from the Christian society, if obdurate and incorrigible, or his re-admission into it on repentance, I will ratify; and whatever guidance ye ask from heaven in forming these determinations, shall be granted you; so that there be two or three who shall unite in the determination, or in the prayer.'

19. ἔάν δύο ὑμῶν συμφωνήσωσιν, &c.] q. d. 'There is, however, no need of the whole of you to give validity to what you shall do in such a case; for where even one or two of you shall agree as to such a matter, it shall be enough.'

— περὶ παντός πράγματος] 'de quacunque re;' by Hebraism.

20. οὐ γάρ εἰσι, &c.] A general assertion, in confirmation of the particular authority given to the Apostles.

— δύο ἢ τρεῖς.] Meaning very few. A certain for an uncertain, but very small number. So the Rabbinical writers say, that 'wherever two are sitting conversing on the law, there the Schechinah is among them.' Εἰς τὸ ἐμὸν ὄνομα,

i. e. 'on my behalf, in my service and in my cause.' Ἐν μέσῳ αὐτῶν, viz. spiritually, by my assistance to speed their petitions.

21. On the connexion here see Mr. Groswell, Parab. vol. ii. 367 seqq.

— ποσάκις ἁμαρτήσῃ, &c.] This comes under Winer's rule (Gr. Gr. Nov. Test. § 39. 5.) 'Two finite verbs are sometimes so connected that the first one is to be taken as a participle which is accounted a Hebraism, but is, in fact common to all languages, in the early periods of the popular style. Ἐπτάκις. The number seven was called the complete or full number, and was therefore well selected by Peter for the ἑπτὰ.'

22. ἰβδομηκοντάκις ἑπτὰ.] A high certain an uncertain and unlimited number. The meaning is, 'as often as he offend,' and, as is implied (and, indeed, expressed in Luke) is repentant.

23. διὰ τοῦτο.] This is not (as Kuin. considers a mere formula transitionis; but is put elliptically, q. d. 'Wherefore, accordingly (because pari injuria is to be unlimitedly granted to the repentant offender), the Gospel dispensation, conduct of God therein, may be compared that of a king in the following parable. God deal with the members of his Church, as a king did with his servants. He will to a strict account, and to the unmerciful show no mercy.'

— δούλων.] Not slaves, but ministers in the receipt or disbursement of stewards, governors of provinces, or other.

24. μυριάων ταλάντων.] Namely, 'for in all numbers occurring in ancient gold is never to be supposed, unless; Yet a vast sum in comparison with and therefore well denoting the immensity between our sins against God and the selves one against another.'

25. ἔχοντος] for δυναμίσου, as of the New Test. and the Classics.

1 XIX. Καὶ ἐγένετο, ὅτε ἐτέλεσεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς τοὺς λόγους τούτους, μετῆρεν ἀπὸ τῆς Γαλιλαίας, καὶ ἦλθεν εἰς

— πραθῆναι, &c.] According to the custom of all the nations of early antiquity. Among the Jews, however, this bondage only extended to six years. At ἀποδοθῆναι supply τὸ ὀφειλόμενον from the subject-matter.

26. μακροθύμησον ἐπ' ἐμοί] 'have patience with me;' as the Latin indulge, expecta; lit. 'wait a little longer for me,' i. e. for payment from me. So Luke xviii. 7. μακροθυμῶν ἐπ' αὐτούς. In this sense the word is used Artemid. iv. 11. μακροθυμεῖν κελεύει (to wait longer for the debt). The word occurs also, with ἐπὶ, in Eccles. xxxv. 19.

28. κρατήσας ἐπνιγε] 'he seized him by the throat.' Both πνίγειν and ἀγγχειν often occur in the Classical writers, of the seizing of debtors by creditors, to drag them before a magistrate, and compel them to pay a debt. So Pollux iii. 116. ἀποπνίγειν τοὺς ὀφειλοντας.

— εἴ τι.] There is the strongest authority, both external and internal, for this reading; which is preferred by almost every Editor and Commentator of note. The common one, ὅ τι, is doubtless a gloss. The sense however is the same, for the εἴ is not conditional. Of this phrase there are many examples in the Classical writers, as Diog. Laert. cited by Wetstein, εἴ τι μοι ὀφείλει ἀφίημι ἐστίν. See my Note on Thucyd. II. 72.

29. πάντα.] There is very strong evidence in MSS., early Editions, Versions, and Fathers, against this word; which is rejected by Mill and Wetstein, and cancelled by Matthiæ, Griesbach, and Scholz. Yet it is found in the Pesch. Syriac Version, and its genuineness is, not unsuccessfully, defended by Fritz.

31. ἐλυπήθησαν.] The word imports a mixture of grief and indignation.

34. βασανισταῖς.] Since the object in view was not torture, but the security of his person,—it is plain that the sense is not tormentors, but jaegers, πράκτορες, Luke xii. 58, δισμοφύλακες, Acts xvi. 23, 24; (for βάσανος and βασανιστήριον sometimes signify a juil.) It is literally correctors, with allusion to their harshness.

— ἕως οὗ ἀποδῶ π. τ. ὀφ.] Which, from its great amount, it could never be. Consequently, as Gresswell observes, the punishment was eternal, so far as that which can never cease to be inflicted while it is capable of being endured, may be said to be so.

35. τὰ παραπτώματα αὐτῶν.] These words are cancelled by Griesbach and others, but on slender authority; and, indeed (as Scholz and Fritz. have proved) they are necessary to the sense. See supra vi. 14. Mark xi. 26.

XIX. I. μετῆρεν ἀπὸ τ. Γ.] This was our Lord's final departure from Galilee for Jerusalem previous to his crucifixion.

— εἰς τὰ ἔρια—Ἰερδάνου.] There is here a difficulty; for, according to the sense at first offering itself, it would be tantamount to making the country beyond the Jordan a part of Judea;

which we know it was not. Some Expositors attempt to remove this difficulty, by supposing the πέραν to mean 'on this side,' or alongside of: both interpretations against the usus loquendi, and at variance with Mark x. 1. The best mode of obviating it is to take πέραν τοῦ Ἰ. for διὰ τοῦ πέραν, thus: καὶ ἦλθεν πέραν τοῦ Ἰ. εἰς τὰ ὅρια τῆς Ἰ. Fritz, indeed, denies this to be Greek. And he proposes to connect πέραν τοῦ Ἰ. with μετῆρυν ἁ. τ. Γ. (taking the words as put, per attractionem, for 'movens a Galilæa, transit fluvium.') Thus regarding the words καὶ ἦλθεν εἰς τὰ ὅρια τῆς Ἰ. as parenthetical. But the violence thus done to the construction is worse than the liberty supposed to be taken with the usus loquendi, as the words stand; for to say it is not Greek, is surely too hypercritical, and is making no distinction between Attic and Hellenistic Greek. The former mode is therefore preferable; which, indeed, is required by the passage of Mark x. 1, κακῶθην ἀναστὰς, ἔρχεται εἰς τὰ ὅρια τῆς Ἰουδαίας διὰ τοῦ πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου, i. e. 'having passed through the country beyond Jordan,' as Fritz, himself there interprets; where, in like manner, exception might be taken to the Greek, though the sense is clear. Jesus, it seems, purposely chose the longer course through Peræa, (the country beyond Jordan,) to the shorter one, through Samaria.

3. οἱ Φαρισαῖοι.] Meaning those of the neighbouring district. In λέγοντες αὐτῷ, εἰ, &c., there is a blending of the oratio directa and indirecta, not unfrequent in the New Testament.

— εἰ ἔξεστιν, &c.] The insidious motive of this question is apparent by a comparison of this with the parallel passage in Luke xvi. 18, where the judgment of Christ respecting the unlawfulness of divorce is given in illustration of his assurance, that the law should endure for ever. The interrogators hoped, by inducing Jesus to again deliver his judgment on this point, to embroil him with the school of Hillel, which taught that divorces were allowable even on trivial grounds. But Christ's wisdom frustrated their cunning, and he effectually thwarted their aims by an appeal to their great Lawgiver.

— κατὰ 'propter.' Not a Hebraism, since examples of this signification are found not only in the Sept., but in the best Greek writers.

— πᾶσαν 'any whatever.' A use of πᾶς occurring in Rom. iii. 20. I Cor. x. 25, and occasionally in the Classical writers, as Hom. Od. Γ. 71. Herod. v. 39.

— αἰτίαν.] The word here simply means cause (which, indeed, is its primitive signification), not fault, as some Expositors explain; a misconception productive of the gloss (for such it is) which in some MSS. was introduced in the place of αἰτίαν, namely, ἀμαρτίαν.

4. ὁ ποιήσας.] The Commentators take this as Participle for Noun, i. e. the Creator; a frequent idiom in Scripture, but not necessary to be supposed here; since ἄνθρωπον in a collective sense (in reference to which we have αὐτοὺς just after) must be supplied from the preceding ἀνθρώπων. However, ἐποίησεν and εἶπεν are to be closely connected; for the inference against divorce is founded on what God said (by Adam). Thus the sense is, 'Have ye not read what the Creator, after having at the first made them male and female, said,' &c. (See Gen. i. 27.) The argument is strengthened by ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, and ἀρσὴν καὶ θῆλυ (sub. γίνος and κατά); the latter of which,—meaning man and woman,—implying that only two persons, one male and one female, were created, plainly intimates the intention of God, that marriage should be in pairs, and indissoluble except by death or adultery.

5. προσκολληθήσεται.] Render, 'shall closely connect or attach himself;' for in this tense, as in the Aor. 1. Pass., there is a middle sense. See Buttm. Gr. § 136. 2. A forcible metaphor often occurring in the New Test., and sometimes in the Classics, and also found in the Heb. רַבַּח, and the Latin agglutinare. The var. lect. κολληθήσεται (found in many MSS. and Fathers, and edited by Fritz. and Scholz) may be the true reading. But there is not sufficient evidence to authorize any change. For both external and internal evidence are in favour of the old reading, which is supported by Ephes. v. 31, and the Septuagint; from which the citation is made.

— εἰς σάρκα μίαν.] A Hebraism for σὰρξ μία, 'one and the same person.' So Plato says ὥστε δύο ὄντας ἓνα γιγνόμεναι. It has been thought remarkable, that there is nothing corresponding to οἱ δύο in the Hebrew. But the truth is, that the Septuagint Translators supplied οὗο to strengthen the sense by the aid of antithesis. And, indeed, in the Hebrew something is left to be supplied mentally, such as 'the man and his wife.'

6. ὁ οὖν.] There seems to be a tacit reference to γίνος before implied.

— συνέθεξεν.] The sense is 'constituted co-sociant;' by a metaphor taken from the yoking of oxen, and common to both the Greek and Latin, may, perhaps all languages.

7. ἐνετείλατο, &c.] Moses does not command them to divorce their wives; but, when they do divorce them, to give them a writing of divorcement. An objection is here proposed: 'If the bond of matrimony be perpetual, why did Moses permit divorce, and why did he permit her that was divorced to be married again?' [Deut. xxiv. 1.] Ans. 'But every thing permitted by the law of the land is not just and equitable.' On this and the two following verses see Notes on Matt. v. 31, seq., and Bp. Warburton's Serm. xii. on v. 6, p. 354, seq.

8. Μωϋσῆς.] i. e. not God; so that it is, as Jerome says, a consilium hominis, not imperium Dei. 'Moses (observes Grotius) is named as the promulgator, not of a common, primeval, and perpetual law, but of one only Jewish, and given in reference to the times.' The sum of Christ's words, (Theophylact observes,) is this: 'Moses wisely restrained by civil regulations your licentiousness, and permitted divorce only under certain conditions, because of your brutality, lest you should perpetrate something worse, namely, make away with them by sword or poison.'

— πρὸς τὴν σκληροκαρδίαν pertinacia vestra ratione habita, with reference to your unyielding, unforgiving spirit.

9. εἰ μὴ.] The εἰ is not found in very many ancient MSS. and several early Versions, and is cancelled by Griesbach, Vater, Matthiæ, and Fritz; but retained by Scholz; though the genuineness of the word may be strongly suspected. [Comp. supra v. 32. Luke xvi. 18. 1 Cor. vii. 11.]

10. εἰ οὕτως ἐστίν, &c.] 'This use of εἰ with the indicative implies possibility without the impression of uncertainty, a condition or contingency as to which there is no doubt.' (Robinson.)

— ἡ αἰτία—γυναικὸς.] 'the case or condition of men with their wives.' So Latin causa. Both words have the Article, as being Correlatives. (Middleton.) This use of αἰτία is forensic, and like the Latin causa.

11. χωρεῖται χωρεῖν is properly said of capacitas, i. e. to HOLD; but it is sometimes used of capability, whether of mind (as Plutarch Cat. οὐδὲ τὸ Κάτωνος φρόνημα χωροῦσι. Philo, p. 884. φύσεις ὑπερβολαῖς, ὅς ἡ πατρις οὐκ ἰχώρει,) or (as here) of action. Thus the sense is, 'all are not capable of practising this maxim,' or as the best Commentators render, 'this thing,' namely, οὐ γαμήσαι. [Comp. 1 Cor. vii. 2, 7.]

— οἷς δίδεται.] scil. ἐκ Θεοῦ, as in 1 Cor. vii. 7. Yet not without the co-operation of man, as appears from the words following.

12. εἰς γὰρ, &c.] The construction is elliptical; and, expressed at full length, would stand thus: Yet some there are who can; for [example] there are some who, &c.

— εὐνούχισαν &c.] A strongly figurative expression (akin to that of ἐκκόπτειν τὴν δεξιάν, vv. 29, 30. xviii. 8, 9), found also in the Rabbinical writers, and meant of the suppression of the desire, said with reference to those who, from a desire to further the interests of religion, live in celibacy; probably with allusion to the Escaves, who did not marry. The Commentators compare a similar expression from Julian, to which may be added Max. Tyr. Diss. 34, ἀφελε τὴν αἰδολίαν ἐπιθυμίαν, καὶ δέκοψας τὸ ἡρώδιον.

— χωρεῖτω.] 'qui capere, h. e. viribus suis sustinere possit, sustineat.' Here the Imperative has rather the force of permission than injunction; or, at any rate, the admonition must, like that of 1 Cor. vii. 26, have reference chiefly to the circumstances under which it was delivered. q. d. (in the words of Abp. Newcome) 'He who, by constitution or self-command, is able to refrain from marriage, let him dedicate himself, at this time, to preaching that kingdom.' [Comp. 1 Cor. vii. 32, 34. ix. 5, 15.]

13. ἵνα τὰς χεῖρας ἐπιθῇ.] Imposition of hands was a rite which from the earliest ages, see Gen. xlviii. 14, had been in use among the Jews on imploring God's blessing upon any person, and was especially employed by the Prophets (Numb. xxvii. 18. 2 Kings v. 11), but sometimes by elders, or men noted for piety. These children, therefore, were brought to Christ for his blessing; and, it should seem, to be admitted into his discipleship; though not by baptism; for the rite was not yet introduced; and if it had, our Lord did not himself perform it. Yet there may be, as some suppose, an anticipated reference thereto. That they were not brought to be healed of any disorder, but to obtain spiritual benefit, is plain; and that they were not only considered capable of receiving them by the people, but also by our Lord himself, is equally clear. And as they had already entered into covenant with God by circumcision, they might justly be considered capable of participating in the spiritual blessings of the Christian covenant. They were surely as fit to be admitted into the Christian Church as the Jewish. How strongly this confirms the propriety of Infant Baptism, is obvious; inasmuch that the ancient Divines regarded this passage as a sufficient authority for it. So Tertull. de Baptismo, c. 18. Const. Ap. vi. 15. βαπτίζετε ὅμων καὶ νήπια. Ἀφετε γάρ, φησί, τὰ παῖδια ἔρχεσθαι πρὸς με.

— ἐπιτίμωσαν αὐτοῖς.] Meaning τοῖς προσφύρονται, as it is added in Mark and Luke. The disciples reproved them either for unseasonable intrusion, or for taking too great a liberty with one so exalted above Prophets.

14. τῶν τοιούτων] namely, such as have these dispositions; i. e. humility, docility, and simplicity. For Christ meant what he said for his disciples—namely, to inculcate the same lesson as he had done a little before (supra xviii. 3.) when in answer to an inquiry of the disciples, which of them should be greatest in the kingdom of heaven, he placed a young child in the midst. See also the note on Luke xviii. 15. In the passages of Mark and Luke it is added. δε ἰδὼν μὴ δέχεται τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ ὡς παιδίον, οὐ μὴ ἐστὶν εἰς αὐτήν.

15. καὶ ἐπιθείς α. τὰς χεῖρας.] Implying, what is added in Mark, ἠλόγους αὐτά.

— ἐκεῖθεν] i. e. from that town of Perza, where he had been stopping on his road to Jerusalem. See Mark x. 17, and supra v. 1.

16. εἰς] for τις. This was (as we find from v. 22.) a young man; and, as we learn from Luke xviii. 18, a ruler; by which is probably meant a ruler of the Synagogue. His conduct seems to have been dictated by a real desire to be put into the way of salvation, and a sincere intention of following Christ's injunctions; which, however, proved too severe for a disposition in which avarice prevailed over piety.

— προσελθὼν.] And that most reverently. So it is added in Mark, γονυπετήσας αὐτός.

— τί ἀγαθὸν—αἰώνιον.] This question is thought to have reference to the Pharisees' division of the precepts of the law into the weighty and the light. The young man, it seems, was puzzled by the nice distinctions which were made in classing those precepts; and wished to have some clear information as to what was pre-eminently promotive of salvation.

17. τί με λέγεις ἀγαθόν;) 'why stylest thou me good?' as Mark xv. 12, ὅν λέγεις βασιλεία τῶν Ἰουδαίων. In this and the preceding verse there are some remarkable varr. lectt. In 6 MSS., some later Versions, and some Fathers, the ἀγαθὸν at v. 16, and the ὁ Θεός at v. 17, are not found; and for τί με λέγεις ἀγαθόν, we have τί με ἰσχυρᾶς περὶ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ; these readings were preferred by Erasmus, Grotius, Mill, and Bengel, and were received into the text by Griesbach and Lachman; but entirely without reason. The external evidence for them is very slender; and the internal by no means strong. Besides, the answer of our Lord would thus be deprived of all its simplicity, and nearly all its propriety. It would, in fact, be no answer to the inquiry; for the young man did not (as appears from the words following, εἰ δὲ θεός—ἐπιτολᾷς) inquire what was naturally, or essentially good, but what good should be done by him. And if the words be, as Griesbach directs, referred to what follows, there is, as Fritz. proves, quite as great an inconsistency. Thus that the readings in question are false, is plain. How they originated, is not so obvious. Matthei thinks that they arose from the conjecture of Origen. But that, as Fritz. has shown, involves a great improbability. At all events, it is more important to inquire what induced the persons (whoever they were) to make the alterations in question. Matthei and Nolan (Gr. Vulg. p. 474.) ascribe it to a groundless fear lest the words should be brought forward against the divinity of Christ. Such charges, however, are not rashly to be made, nor lightly to be credited. If the alterations were all introduced designedly, it is more probable that, as Wetstein suggests, they arose from those who thought that the answer would be more suitably made to the QUESTION ITSELF ('what good thing shall I do?') than to the title 'good master.' Yet how could any persons, who had sufficient influence to materially alter the text, fail to see that the answer to the question itself is given in the words following? There seems far more reason to suppose, with Fritz., that no original intention existed to alter the passage, from any scruples doctrinal or otherwise; but that the alterations arose at first from accident; namely, in the omission of ἀγαθὸν propter homocoteleuton. Whereupon the words of the next verse, τί με λέγεις having become quite unsuitable, would, as he says, be altered to τί με ἰσχυρᾶς περὶ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ; I am, however, inclined to think that the alteration was not made all at once; but that, at first, a suitable sense was endeavoured to be elicited, by taking λέγεις for ἰσχυρᾶς, (as in the Sept. and elsewhere in the New Test. See Schl. Lex. in v. § 5.) and then by the slight alteration ἀγαθοῦ, and supposing an ellipsis of περὶ. Comp. Mark i. 30, with Luke iv. 38. And, indeed, ἀγαθὸν without the Article is cited by Origen himself, at

p. 664, C. Thus would arise a gloss, or marginal Scholium, τί με ἰρῶταε παρὶ ἀγ. or τοῦ ἀγ.; which, it seems, was admitted into the text in six MSS., and possibly those which were used by the framers of the ancient Versions above mentioned. I say possibly, since it is extremely doubtful whether the reading was really in their MSS.; for their chief aim is to give the sense; and, therefore, in passages of this kind, the ancient Versions afford no certain evidence as to the readings of their MSS. Thus the genuineness of the common reading is, I trust, fully established. The propriety of the answer, according to that reading, is quite as demonstrable. The young man accosts our Lord by a title usually employed by the Jews to their most eminent Rabbis, and of which they were very proud. Hence, before he replies to his inquiry, he takes occasion (without rejecting the title good) to indirectly censure the adulation of the persons addressing, and the arrogance of those addressed. At the same time, he proceeds upon the notion entertained of him by the young man; who evidently only regarded him in the light of an eminent teacher. Moreover, when our Lord adds, οὐδεὶς ἀγαθός, εἰ μὴ ὁ Θεός, we are to understand (with Bps. Pearson and Bull,) the sense to be, that 'there is no Being originally, essentially, and independently good, but God.' Thus the Father, being the fountain of the whole Deity must, in some sense, be the fountain of the goodness of the Son. Accordingly, the Ante-Nicene Fathers were generally agreed, that ἀγαθός essentially and strictly applied only to God the Father: and to Christ only by reason of the goodness derived to him as being very God of very God. This use of ἀγαθός will establish and illustrate the ratio significandi of the expressive word employed, with slight variations, by all the Northern nations, to denote the Supreme Being, GOD. Finally, something very similar to the present, both in thought and expression, occurs in Phocylides, Frag. xiii. 47. Edit. Gaisf. Μὴ γαυροῦ σοφίῃ, μήτ' ἀλκῇ, μήτ' ἰσὶ (I conjecture ἰσὶ) πλοῦτιν. Εἰς Θεός ἐστι σοφός, δυνατός θ' ἔμα, καὶ πολυβόλος. Some Editors (and among the rest Scholz) point εἰ μὴ εἰς ὁ Θεός, which, indeed, yields a good sense ('except God only'; and the idiom is found at Mark ii. 7), but not, I think, so good a one as that of the usual punctuation. Moreover, the other introduces a use of εἰς very rarely found; while this is frequent. So Matt. xxiii. 8, εἰς γὰρ ἵσταν ἑμῶν ὁ καθηγγητής, ὁ Χριστός.

— ταῖς ἐντολάς; namely, of God in the Decalogue: for though our Lord adduces his instances only from the laws of the second Table, yet he virtually confirms all of them.

18. ποίας) for τίνας, as often in the Sept.

— τό· οὐ φονεύσεις.] See Exod. xx. 13. Deut. v. 17. Levit. xix. 18. Though the whole law be meant, yet, as often in the New Test. (see Rom. xiii. 8. and James ii. 8.) the commandments of the second table alone are adduced in exemplification; not that they are of greater importance than those of the first table; but because there is a necessary connection between the duties towards God, and those towards man; and because the latter are not so easily counterfeited as the former. That the terms of salvation here offered are not at all different from those stated in other parts of Scripture, has been evinced by the Commentators. See Lightfoot, Whitby, and Macknight. On the use of the neuter Article, thus employed absolutely, with reference to a whole clause, see Matth. (Gr. Gr. § 279.

— οὐ κλέψεις.] Instead of the more usual κλέψῃ. See Buttman and Winor.

20. ἐκ νεότητός μου.] As this was a young man, it must be rendered, 'from my childhood,' like the Classical ἐκ παιδός. So at 2 Tim. iii. 15. we have ἀπὸ βρέφους.

— τί ἔτι ὑστερῶ;] At τί sub. κατὰ, 'In what am I yet behindhand, or wanting?' This readiness to undertake more than he had yet done, showed at least that he was well disposed,—and caused our Lord, as we learn from Mark, to be pleased with him. So a Rabbinical writer, cited by Wets.: 'There is a Pharisee, who says, "What ought I to do, and I will do it." That is good. But there is also a Pharisee who says, "What ought I to do besides, and I will do it." That is better.'

21. τέλειος.] The term is here used, not in the moral sense, by which God is said to be perfect, but in that comparative sense by which a thing is perfect so far as the constitution of its nature permits. It therefore denotes a true Christian, and such as will be accepted by God. See Note, supra v. 48. and Luke xii. 33. Rom. xii. 2. Phil. iii. 13. Col. i. 28. & iv. 12. James iii. 2.

— πώλησόν σου τὰ ὑπάρχοντα] q. d. 'show your love to God and obedience to me his Messenger, by selling your goods, and following my cause.' Comp. supra vi. 20, 21. The injunction, (meant to lower the pride and try the sincerity of the convert,) was only binding on the individual thus addressed, or on those similarly circumstanced, as in the Apostolic age; and has no relation to Christians of the present or any other period. See Lightfoot, Whitby, and Macknight.

The use of ὑπάγε just before is like that at xviii. 15. Mark x. 21, and is said by some Commentators to be pleonastic. But it rather carries an intensive force, and may be rendered 'begone!'

— δεῦρο.] Said to be put for ἐλθεῖ, but there is rather an ellipsis of ἐλθεῖ. The full expression often occurs in Homer.

22. ἦν ἔχων.] Not 'he chanced to possess,' (as some render), but, 'he was in the possession of.' So Luke ἦν πλούσιος.

23. δυσκόλως] For χαλεπῶν. 'He will scarcely be persuaded to become a Christian.'

— πλούσιος.] That is, if he place his trust in his riches, and make them his summum bonum; a necessary limitation, as appears from the parallel passage at Mark x. 24. At the same time, considering how many impediments to good, and how many incitements to evil attend riches; how the cares of the world, and the deceitfulness of riches choke the word (see 1 Tim. vi. 9.), this limitation scarcely lessens the difficulty; since it is the very nature and effect of riches to cause men to trust in them, and to seek their happiness in them. So that, although the words of this and the next verse be primarily referred to the extreme difficulty (represented by a proverbial mode of expressing what is next to impossible) with which the rich would be converted; yet they are applicable to, and were doubtless intended to supply, an awful warning of the danger of trusting in uncertain riches, and the necessity of a true conversion; without which men do not really belong to the kingdom of Christ on earth, and therefore will not be admitted to his kingdom in heaven.

24. κάμηλον.] Some ancient and modern Commentators would read κάμιλον, a camel, rope; or take κάμηλον in that sense. But for the former there is little or no manuscript authority; and for the latter no support from the usus loquendi.

— διελθεῖν.] For this many MSS., several Versions, and some Fathers read εἰσελθεῖν, which is preferred by Wetstein, and edited by Matthæi, Knapp, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz; while the Vulg. is retained by Tittm. and Fritz. But though the evidence of MSS. and Versions be somewhat in favour of the new reading, yet internal evidence is rather in favour of the common one, which is found in Mark x. 25. and several MSS., in Luke xviii. 25.

— ραφίδος.] Literally, 'a sewing-tool,' (from ράπτω), and later Greek for βελόνης.

25. αὐτοῦ.] This is omitted in many MSS. of various Recensions, and some Versions and Fathers, and is cancelled by Griesbach, Fritz., and Scholz.

— τίς δύναται σ.] This is generally interpreted, 'Who then can be saved? [since all men are either rich, or desire to be so.]' A mode of interpretation not a little harsh; and therefore it is better, with Euthymius and Markland, to suppose an ellipsis, and interpret, 'what [rich man.] then, can be saved?' There is, however, properly speaking, no εἰς; but the τίς is supposed to be mentally referred to πλούσιος, which preceded. And the Apostles may have meant to express, by inference, the difficulty with which men in general, as well as the rich, would be saved.

26. ἐμβλέψας] 'fixing his eyes upon them.' There is a similar use at Mark x. 21, 27. xiv. 67. Luke xx. 17. and elsewhere; in which places the word must not (with many recent Commentators), be regarded as merely pleonastic, or as having the sense turning towards, but must retain its full force,—denoting extreme earnestness, as in Mark x. 21, 27. Luke xx. 17. John i. 36. and Xenoph. Cyrop. i. 3. 2. ἐμβλέπων αὐτῷ ἔλεγε. also Acts xvi. 18. ἐπιστρίψας εἶπε.

— παρὰ ἀνθρώποις.] This use of παρὰ is said to be Hebraic, and the Commentators tell us that the Classical writers use the simple dative with δυνατόν or ἀδύνατόν ἐστι. But the meaning is somewhat different, being, 'as far as regards [the power of] man.'

— ἀδύνατον.] Le Clerc, and most recent Commentators (as Kuinoel and Fritz.) take the word in the qualified sense, extremely difficult, as also at Luke xviii. 27. and Heb. vi. 4. But I agree with Mr. Roese on Parkhurst, p. 16, that 'the affixing of this sense to passages [like this], containing a doctrine, which is altered by the translation, is improper.' We are therefore to leave the full sense; as intimating that, in the work of salvation, human nature is quite insufficient of itself, and stands in the utmost need of the aids of Divine grace.

Ἔστι is omitted in very many MSS. of various recensions, and is cancelled by Griesbach, Tittman, Fritz., and Scholz. [Comp. Luke i. 37.]

27. ἡμεῖς ἀφήκαμεν—ἡμῖν.] This inquiry does not appear to have been suggested by disappointment, but simply from the wish of ascertaining the reward which he and the other Apostles would have for giving up their all in the cause of the Gospel. That all was indeed slender; but it was yielded up unhesitatingly. And hence our Lord, who did not estimate their value from the amount of the sacrifices, but from the disposition with which they had been made, kindly cherished their hopes; pointing to the fruition of them in an immortality of bliss.

— τί ἄρα ἔσται ἡμῖν;] 'what, then, shall be our reward?' namely, in heaven. Said with reference to the preceding ἔξεις θησαυρόν ἐν οὐρανῷ.

28. ἐν τῇ παλιγγενεσίᾳ.] The sense contained in these words depends very much upon the construction. Some, as the early modern Commentators in general, construe the words with the preceding of ἀκολουθ. μοι, understanding by παλ. the great change of morals and doctrines which arose from the preaching of John the Baptist, or from the moral regeneration consequent upon the first preaching of the Gospel. This, however, is harsh and forced. There is no doubt that the words following contain a fuller description of this παλιγγενεσία, and relate, not to time past, but future. Indeed, it is now generally admitted, that the words must be referred to what follows; though Expositors are not agreed as to the nature of the promise, or the time of its fulfilment. Whitby fixes the time at the close of the world, and after the fall of Antichrist; and he understands, by παλιγγ., not a resurrection of their persons, but a revival of their spirit, by admitting the Gospel to govern their faith and practice. Adopting which view, others consider the time in question to be the Millennium. Others, again, understand παλιγγ. to refer either to the resurrection, or new state of things, which took place at the promulgation of Christianity, after the ascension and resurrection of Christ; or to the regeneration which was then effected by the Gospel. And they understand 'the throne of his glory' to apply to his mediatorial kingdom. And the sitting on thrones, and judging, &c. they interpret of the ministerial authority, with which the Apostles had been invested by our Lord. Thus they take the general sense to be, that 'the Apostles were to rule the Christian Church by the laws of the Gospel, which they were authorized and inspired to preach, and by the infallible decisions respecting faith and practice which he enabled them to give.' An interpretation which, however specious, will no more bear examination than the foregoing one. For though we may grant that παλιγγ. admits of either of these senses, yet the words following cannot, without great violence, be made to yield any sense at all suitable thereto. Not to say that what is thus assigned as the sense would not be sufficiently suitable to the purpose for which the words were pronounced; namely, to hold out to the disciples an ample compensation for all their sacrifices and sufferings in the cause of the Gospel. Under these circumstances I can scarcely hesitate to prefer to all others the sense assigned to the passage by the ancient Expositors in general, and of the modern ones by Kuinoel and Fritz, confirmed by the Syriac, Persian, Arabic, Æthiopic, and Italic Versions; by which παλιγγ. is understood of the resurrection to judgment, and a new state of being in the next world. This is very agreeable to, nay, is required by what follows, ὅταν καθίσῃ ἐπὶ θρόνου δόξης αὐτοῦ, for in the only other passage where Christ is so spoken of (Matt. xxv. 31.), the words relate indisputably to the day of judgment. And as regards the term itself, it is, from the nature of the context, far more likely to have been used in its proper sense and ordinary acceptation, than in any figurative one whatsoever. While, on the other hand, it was likely that the adjunct to this substantial and definite assurance in the form of promise, should be denoted by a figurative expression to signify high exaltation and supreme felicity. See 1 Cor. vi. 2. Luke xxii. 30.

Of the truth of this interpretation there cannot be a stronger proof than the fact, that the most powerful supporters of the other are compelled to engraft this, and so include both. Nay, Campb. grants that 'the principal completion of the promise will be at the general resurrection.' If, however, the other interpretation be at all admitted, it can only be as a kind of subordinate adjunct, by way of allusion, to the principal idea. Compare Acts iii. 21. ἀπὸ χρόνων ἀποκαταστάσεως πάντων. Luke xxii. 29, 30.

29. ὅς.] Several MSS. have ὅστις, which is received by Knapp, Tittman, Vater, and Griesb. in his two first Editions, though it has been rejected in his third. The common reading is retained by Fritz, and Scholz; and rightly, since ὅστις, though better Greek, seems to be a correction of the Alexandrian Critics. It is, moreover, confirmed by Luke xii. 8, 10. and Acts ii. 21.

— ἑκατ. λήψ.] This is by most Commentators understood of a temporal recompense,—as that suggested in the parallel passage of Mark,—namely, in the support and comfort they would receive at the hands of their richer brethren. But there is no reason here so to limit the term ἑκατ., which is only a strong mode of expressing that they shall, upon the whole, receive back very far more in value than they parted with. And although it is not expressly said whether that remuneration is to be temporal or spiritual,—yet, notwithstanding that what follows in the next verse seems to fix it to temporal blessings, still we are justified in including spiritual ones; even the inward satisfactions of a good conscience, and the inexpressible consolations of the Gospel (far exceeding in value all that is most precious of earthly goods, however great), which would be their support under all persecutions and troubles. Compare 2 Cor. vi. 8. seqq., which passage affords both a comment upon our Lord's declaration, and a fulfilment of the prediction contained in it.

30. πολλοὶ δὲ—πρῶτοι.] A sort of proverbial mode of expression, not unfrequently employed by our Lord to check the presumption of the Apostles; the sense of which is, that 'many who, in the order of time, were last (brought in last) in the kingdom, shall be first in the rewards; and those who claim to be first, shall be last;' i. e. that many of the Jews, to whom the blessings of Christ's kingdom were first offered, would be the last to partake of them; and that many of the Gentiles, to whom they were to be offered after the Jews, would be the first to enjoy them. In order to illustrate and apply this declaration, our Lord subjoined the parable at the beginning of the next chapter; in which, however, as I have shown in Recens. Synop., the application is not to be limited to the Jews, but left general; being meant for the instruction of all Christians of all ages. [Comp. infra xx. 16. Luke xiii. 30.]

XX. 1. ὁμοία γάρ, &c.] The sense is: 'Thus for example, the same thing will take place in the Christian dispensation as that which occurred in the management of a certain master of a family.'

This Parable is found, though with a widely extended application, in the Jerusalem Talmud. 'Here it is meant (as observes Waterland) to represent God's dealings with mankind in respect to their outward call to the means of grace, as well as to the retribution in a state of glory.' In this Parable, as in many others, some parts of the simile only regard the ornament, and do not affect the scope of the Parable; as the labourers waiting to be hired, and the murmurings, &c. of the labourers after the distribution of the wages. The main point of similarity is the rejection of those who were first, and the admission of those who seemed last.

—ἀνθρώπων οἰκοδ. The Commentators remark on the pleonasm in ἀνθρώπων, of which there are several similar examples in Scripture, and which they regard as Hebraistic. But instances of the idiom may be found in the Greek Classical writers, especially Herodotus. It may therefore be better regarded as a vestige of the wordiness of primitive phraseology.

—μισθῶσασθαι ἐργ.] Μισθῶσι signifies to hire or let out to others; μισθῶσασθαι, to hire for oneself, to take to hire.

—ἅμα πρῶτῳ.] This is regarded by the Commentators as an elliptical expression, for ἅμα σὺν π. But though that phrase occurs in the Sept., it is not found in the Greek Classical writers. Whereas ἅμα and similar words are of frequent occurrence with nouns of time. I know of no example with πρῶτῳ, which may be regarded (with Scheid on Lennep), as properly a Dative of the old noun πρῶτις (as the Latin heri is of heri), which properly denoted the point of time when the sun appears in the horizon, as δύσι (also an old dative from the obsolete noun δύσις, from δύω) its disappearance, or the period which accompanies it.

2. ἐκ δηναρίου] 'at or for a denarius.' The denarius, which was equivalent to the Greek drachma, was then the usual wages of a labourer, and the pay of a soldier. See Greswell, vol. v. 383.

3. τῆν.] This is omitted in very many of the MSS., including all the most ancient ones, and some Fathers. It is cancelled by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, Fritz., and Scholz; and rightly: for in such common phrases the Article, being easily understood, was usually omitted. Indeed, ordinals are usually anarthrous.

—ἐστῶτας—ἀργούς.] The very place where (from its being used for buying and selling, and all public business) the greatest number of persons assembled, especially the idle or the unemployed. So Ælian. V. H. xix. 25. (cited by Grotius) μετακίπτετο τοῦτο ἐν ταῖς ἀγοραῖς ἀποσχολεύοντα. The time here mentioned was equivalent to what was called the triduum æγορᾶς.

4. ἐὰν] for ἐν. In which use with the Subjunctive (rare in the Classical writers) it answers to the Latin cumque and our sooner.

—δίκαιον] i. e. what, according to all circumstances, and in proportion to the degree of exertion called forth, was equitable or reasonable.

6. ἀργούς.] This word (not found in a few of the most ancient MSS. and several Versions) is cancelled by Griesbach and Vater, while it is defended by Fritz, as being necessary to the sense. This, however, is scarcely the case. The best defence is to say, that the MSS. which have it not are but four out of 500; and therefore the omission was most probably accidental, and arose in copying from a common archetype, in which was written ἄλλους ἀργοὺς ἰσθῶτας; and thus the omission would be caused by homoioteleuton.

8. ὁψίας δὲ γενομένης.] At which time the law of Moses strictly required the day's wages of a labourer to be paid. See Deut. xxiv. 15.

— τῷ ἐπιτρόπῳ.] A servant generally answering to the Roman procurator; but as said of agricultore, corresponding to the Latin villicus, and our baillif.

— ἀρξάμενος ἀπὸ τῶν ἰσχ. &c.] A phrase to denote the terminus a quo, the point of departure in a narrative; as in Luke xxiii. 5. xxiv. 27. John viii. 9. Acts i. 22. The construction of this passage has been mistaken by Kypko and Kuinoel; but is correctly laid down by Fritz, as follows: ἀπόδος αὐτοῖς τὸν μισθὸν ὡς τῶν πρῶτων, ἀρξάμενος ἀπὸ τῶν ἰσχύων. It is observable that the order of payment is here introduced, to give opportunity for the remarks which follow.

10. ἐνόμισαν ὅτι πλείονα λήψ. Render, 'they expected they should receive'; imagining that he would pay them, not according to contract, but in proportion to the time they had worked. For πλείονα several very ancient MSS., Origen, and the ancient Versions have πλείον; which is edited by Fritz, and Lachman; perhaps rightly; for it would be difficult to justify the common reading, which might easily arise from A of the word following being conjoined with this, and taken for A.

11. ἐνὶ αὐτῶν.] This is said by the Commentators to be put adverbially. And they refer to a plena locutio in Rev. xxi. 21, ἐνὶ αὐτοῖς ἐκαστος. There is, in fact, an ellipsis of ἐκαστος.

12. ἐγόγγυζον.] Some render conspicuerunt, perceperunt. But although examples are adduced proving the sense of conspicere and the Latin facere with nouns of time, yet it is better, with most Commentators, to take it for arguere, as a Hebraism formed on עָרַב, as in Ruth ii. 19. Matt. xxi. 28. And so facere argum in Columella.

— ἴσους.] for ισομοίρου, of which examples are given by Wetstein. A similar expression occurs in Plin. Paneg. 25, æquati sunt cæteris illis quibus non erat promissum.

— βαστάσαι τὸ βάρος τ. ἡ.] 'which have borne the burden of the day, and [endured] the heat.' Καύσων (which is of the same form with δάσων, φάσων, σείσων, ἄξων, μύξων, &c.) literally signifies the burner, the burning (wind) Eurus; and is often to be found in the Sept. Here it may be explained simply heat, as in Gen. xxxi. 40, ἐγγίνονμην τῆς ἡμέρας συγκαίμενος τῷ καύσωνι, where in the Hebrew it is שָׂרַח, i. e. the shriveller, the drier. It is to be remembered that in the East, though the air be cool by night and in the early part of the day, yet during the remainder of it the heat of the sun is exceedingly scorching. See Gen. xxxi. 40, and comp. Liban. Epist. 245, περὶ ἦν οὗτος πολὺ καῦμα, πολὺν δὲ καπνὸν ἠνέσχετο.

13. ἐταῖρα.] An idiom found in the Heb. שָׂר, the Greek ὁ ἀγαθὸς, or φίλος, the Latin domus vir, and Eng. my friend. It was a familiar form of address, and consequently often used to inferiors, and sometimes to strangers or indifferent persons.

— οὐκ ἀδικῶ σε.] Much ingenuity has been exerted (see Wetstein and Waterland) to discover a reason why all the labourers should have had the same wages. It is sufficient to say, that the circumstance was not so improbable but that it may often have happened; nay, as appears from the Rabbinical writers, did. And we may suppose it to have been introduced into the story by way of illustrating the unfettered will and pleasure of the Almighty Ruler to distribute his benefits as he thinks proper, well expressed by the emphatic τίλω δοῦναι, I choose to give.

14. ἄρον τὸ σόν.] Literally, 'take up.' Probably the foremost grumbler had thrown down his denarius; as it is said Matt. xxvii. 3, εἰψας τὰ ἀργύρια.

— ἡ ὁ ὀφθαλμός σου πονηρός ἐ.] A figurative expression, importing, 'art thou envious? The eyes being (observes Fritz.) indicators, as of all other passions of the mind, so especially of envy. Hence the Hebrews called an envious man one of evil eye. See Prov. xxiii. 6.

16. οὕτως] i. e. as it was in the case of the labourers last hired by the master.

— πολλοὶ γὰρ—ἐκλεκτοί.] On the important terms κλητοὶ and ἐκλεκτοί, it may be proper to offer a few observations. These are supposed to have been originally Jewish forms of expression, applied (like many others) by Christ to similar distinctions in the Gospel Dispensation. In the Sept. κλητοὶ often denotes those chosen to receive especial favours, or called to execute peculiar trusts. Hence it is, both in the Old and New Test., applied to the Jews; who had been chosen from the nations, and called to peculiar privileges. Thus at Ps. civ. 6, they are called ἐκλεκτοί. In the New Test. κλησις is often used to denote the peculiar favour first vouchsafed to the Jews. More frequently, however, both κλητοὶ and κλησις are used of that shown to Christians. As to ἐκλεκτοί, it may be questioned whether it ever be (as some say) synonymous with κλητοί, at least in the New Test. The terms are properly distinct, and have reference to two different stages in the Christian course. Thus, in the present passage, and at xxii. 14, they are put in opposition; and in the former, by κλητοὶ are denoted those who have been invited into, and have entered into, the service of Christ; and by ἐκλ., those who have approved themselves therein. In the latter, ἐκλ. means those who are invited to the blessings and privileges of the Gospel; and ἐκλ. those who, having accepted the invitation, approve themselves worthy of their high calling in Christ. It is true, that in both these parables, by the κλητοὶ are especially designated the Jews, who were invited to the marriage feast of the Gospel, but who almost wholly rejected the invitation (see Luke xiv. 18.); by the ἐκλ., those of them who accepted it, and who are termed by St. Paul, Rom. xi. 5, 'the remnant κατ' ἐκλογὴν.' However, the saying admits of, and was doubtless intended for, a general application; by which ἐκλ. will denote those who have accepted the invitation, and are professedly members of the Christian Church; ἐκλ., those who have approved themselves not unworthy of the blessing, and have not 'received the grace of God in vain.' The general sense, as Mr. Groswell observes, is that 'in the dispensations of Divine grace for the good of mankind, the offer of such and such privileges, subject to such and such conditions, is indiscriminate, and made to all; but the acceptance of the offer, subject to the conditions in question, is not indiscriminate, nor equally characteristic of all. Consequently, neither is the actual enjoyment of the promised blessing or privilege alike characteristic of all, nor are the benefits of the offer as general as the intention thereof.'

17. The fourth passover now drew near, and our Lord's time was come; and his whole conduct during the brief remainder of his course was such as to show that his kingdom was not of this world.

— ἀναβαίνων εἰς Ἱ.] Said with reference to the elevated situation of Jerusalem; by a mode of speaking frequent in Josephus and the Sept. Nay, we have in Hom. Od. α. 210, εἰς Τροίην ἀναβ.

— εἶπεν αὐτοῖς, &c.] Meaning, it should seem, that he spoke out (as we say) and positively; though from the time when he made a distinct intimation of his Messiahship, at Peter's confession, he had, as we find from xvi. 22, begun to disclose it.

18. Our Lord now gives them to understand, that what they had heretofore feared was now immediately to come to pass. [Comp. John xviii. 32.]

— κατακρινοῦσιν αὐτὸν θανάτῳ.] This is to be taken improprie (for the Jews had no power of life and death), and is more definitely expressed by Mark xiv. 64, κατάκριναι αὐτὸν εἶναι ἰσχυρὸν θανάτου ἐσθί. Or the expression rather signifies, by a blending of two senses, to condemn any one, so that he shall be delivered to death. By ἔθνεσι the Romans are plainly meant; for crucifixion was a Roman punishment. The minute particularity of this prediction is astonishing; and, as Doddridge observes, is a remarkable proof of the prophetic spirit with which Christ was endued; for, humanly speaking, it was far more probable that he should have been either assassinated, in a transport of popular fury, or stoned, by the orders of the Sanhedrim; especially as Pilate had given them permission to judge him according to their own law. But 'all this was done that the Scripture might be fulfilled.'

19. εἰς τὸ ἐμπαῖξαι.] This (as Grotius remarks) is to be taken ἐκβατικῶς: q. d. The

20. ἡ μήτηρ, &c.] Namely, Salome, mother of James and John, Mark xv. 40. xvi. 1. She had doubtless followed him from Galilee, with other pious women who attended on our Lord in his journeys. The request she made seems to have originated in the promise just before given to the Apostles, of sitting on twelve thrones, &c.

— μετὰ τῶν υἱῶν α.) This shows that they participated in the petition; and, indeed, though they preferred it through the medium of their mother, yet it should seem that they were the principal movers of the affair. Thus Mark is justified in representing them as asking it. And, indeed, that Jesus regarded them as the principals, is clear from his addressing the answer to them.

— αἰτοῦσά τι παρ' αὐτοῦ] or, as it is more precisely stated by St. Mark, they said, Θέλομεν, ὡς ὁ ἰσὺς αἰτήσῃ, ποιῆσαι ἡμῖν.

21. εἰς ἐκ δεξιῶν—ἐξ ὑψωνύμων.] Said in allusion to the Eastern custom, by which sitting next to the throne denotes the next degree of dignity; and consequently the first situations on the right and left denote the highest dignities. See 1 Kings ii. 19. Ps. xlv. 9. and comp. Herodot. ii. 30, οἱ ἐξ ἐριστηρίῃ χειρὶ παριστάμενοι βασιλεῖ. Soph. Ed. Tyr. 399. Ἐρόνοι παρασταῖσιν τοῖς ἑρ.

— σου.] This is added in almost all the best MSS., and Versions, and is, with reason, received by Wetstein, Matthie, Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, Vater, Fritz., and Scholz.

22. οὐκ οἴδατε τί αἰτέισθε] i. e. 'ye do not comprehend the nature of my kingdom;' which will rather call you to suffer with me than to enjoy honour or temporal advantage under me. See infra xxvi. 39, 42. John xviii. 11. Our Lord graciously overlooks the faul implied in their presumptuous request; and is pleased to take their words in such an acceptation as, though capable of, they were not intended to convey; and then founds on them such instructions as were calculated to counteract the corruption of heart, which had suggested their presumptuous request. Suitably thereto, he speaks to them of the kingdom he was really come to establish in the world, and also of spiritual advancement, showing the mode in which it is to be attained, and to what persons it would ultimately be given.

— δύνασθε πίνειν—πίνουν.] A figure frequent with the Hebrews; who thus compared whatever was done out to men by the Almighty (whether good or evil) to a cup of wine. See John xviii. 11. Ps. xvi. 5. xiii. 5. Nor was this confined to the Hebrews; for, as it was customary among the ancients in general to assign to each guest at a feast a particular cup as well as dish; and since by the quality and quantity of the liquor contained in it, the respect of the entertainer was expressed; hence cup came in general to signify a portion assigned, whether of pleasure or sorrow (as Hom. Il. ω. 524, where see Heyne); though, for an obvious reason, the expression was more frequently used of evil than of good.

— καὶ τὸ βάπτισμα—βαπτισθῆναι.] This metaphor, of immersion in water, as expressive of being overwhelmed by affliction, is frequent both in the Scriptural and Classical writers; with this difference, however, that in the latter there is usually added some word expressive of the evil or affliction, as in Plutarch de Educ. C. 13, 3. ψυχὴ τοῖς μὲν συμμέτροις αἰσθεται πόνοις, τοῖς δὲ υπερβάλλουσιν βαπτίζεται. Synes. Epist. 57, καὶ τὴν ψυχὴν ἐμβαπτίζει μερίμναις. The clauses καὶ τὸ βάπτισμα—βαπτισθῆναι and καὶ τὸ βάπτισμα—βαπτισθήσεσθε are not found in some MSS., Versions, and Fathers; and are rejected by Grotius and Mill, and are cancelled by Griesbach and Fritz.

23. οὐκ ἔστιν ἐμὸν.] Sub. ἔργον, which is often supplied, as Eurip. Phœn. 454.

— ἀλλ' οἷς ἡτοίμασται.] The early Commentators and Translators (misled by some of the ancient Versions) here supposed an ellipsis of δοθήσεται; which would afford some colour to the Arian and Socinian doctrines; since (as Whitby and Campbell observe) 'in the distribution of future rewards, Christ might seem to acknowledge his inferiority to the Father, inasmuch as there would be some power reserved by the Father to himself, and not committed to the Son.' Others of the ancients supposed an ellipsis of ἐκείνων ἔστιν, interpreting the clause οὐκ ἐμὸν δοῦναι, not with relation to our Lord's power, but with respect to his justice and equity; or referring the phrase only to his human nature. Others again understand, from the context, ἐμῶν, which even crept into the text of the Vulgate. And thus, indeed, all difficulty is removed; but in a manner little warrantable. In fact, all these ellipses are very irregular and inadmissible. It is better to suppose no ellipsis at all; but only to take ἀλλὰ in the somewhat unusual sense of εἰ μὴ, as in Mark ix. 8, (where ἀλλὰ corresponds to εἰ μὴ in Matt. xvii. 8.) Examples from the Classical writers are by no means rare. (See Rec. Synop.) This mode of interpretation is supported by the authority of the Pesh. Syr., Arabic, Persian, and Æthiopic Versions; and, of Commentators, is adopted by Casaub., Grotius, Gatak., Gusset, Hackspan, Koecher, Starck, Raphael, Palaiet, Bengel, Rosenm., Kuinoel, and Prof. Turton. Indeed, it may be observed, the Sept. sometimes renders the Heb. עַבְדִּי by ἀλλὰ. Ἡοὺ ἀλλὰ comes to have this sense, seems to be from its being thus put for ἀλλ' ἢ, otherwise than. Thus all difficulty, both as regards words and things, is entirely removed; for, as observes Whitby, 'the expression argues no defect in the power of Christ, but merely a perfect conformity to the will of his Father.' 'Our Lord (says Bp. Horsley, Sermon V. v. p. 281.) does not deny his power to give, but only declares who they are who shall receive this honour. His answer, far from intimating any thing of that kind, concludes as strongly against it as a negative argument can be supposed to do. Thus the meaning is, "I cannot arbitrarily give happiness, but must bestow it on those alone for whom, in reward of holiness and obedience, it is prepared, according to God's just decrees."'

24. [Comp. Luke xxii. 24.]

25. οἱ ἄρχοντες—αὐτῶν.] Comp. Luke xxii. 25. Erasmus, Grotius, Wetstein, Rosenm., and Fritz. take κατακ. and κατεξ. to denote tyrannical and arbitrary power (of course hinting a censure thereon); in which sense the words do occur in the Sept. But as it is scarcely to be supposed that the governors in question were always tyrants; and as the simple verbs are used in Luke, it is better, with many good Commentators, to suppose the sense to be, 'exercise authority over.' Thus the κατὰ is not so much intensive, as it promotes definiteness. The Commentators first adverted to, with even less reason, suppose the first αὐτῶν to refer to the people, the second to the kings; which is harsh, and inconsistent with the parallel passage in Luke. There is, in fact, a repetition of the same sentiment in different words (as also at ver. 27.) for greater emphasis. See Bp. Jebb's Sac. Lit. p. 288 seqq.

26. δέ.] This is omitted in many MSS., some Versions, and Theophyl., and was cancelled by Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz; but restored by Fritz.; and rightly; for, it is supported not only by high authority here and in Mark, but is so suitable to the passage, that it can hardly be dispensed with.

—διάκονος—δούλος.] There is properly a difference between these terms; the former signifying a servant, like our footman, or valet, and usually a free man; the latter, a servant of all work, and also a slave. The terms were, however, sometimes interchanged. So Aristid. vol. iii. 360, οὕτως φαῦλος ἦν τοῦτε τρόπου, καὶ αὐτό-χρημα διάκονος.

28. οὐκ ἦλθε διακ., ἀλλὰ διακονῆσαι.] As διακονηθῆναι and διακονῆσαι are here opposed, so in Xenoph. de Rep. Att. i. 13, there is a similar opposition, χορηγεῖται μὲν οἱ πλούσιοι, χορηγεῖται δὲ ὁ δῆμος. To turn from the word to the things,—as Christ here says he came διακονῆσαι, so at Luke xxii. 27, he says to his disciples ἐγὼ εἰμι ἐν μέσῳ ὑμῶν ὡς ὁ διακονῶν, and at Phil. ii. 7, He is described as μορφὴν δούλου λαβών.

—δοῦναι—ἀντὶ πολλῶν.] In order to determine the sense of this passage (so important, by its connection with the distinguishing doctrine of the Gospel, the ATONEMENT), it is proper carefully to attend to its scope,—and then to ascertain the force of its principal terms, λύτρον, ἀντὶ, and πολλῶν. The scope of the passage evidently is, to point out the purpose of Christ's coming into the world. It was δοῦναι—πολλῶν. On the sense of ψυχὴ here there has never been any doubt. It plainly signifies (as often in the Scriptures, and even the Classical writers) life. Christ came to give up his life as a λύτρον. Now λύτρον properly denotes the ransom paid, in order to deliver any one from death, or its equivalent, captivity, or from punishment in general. More frequently it denotes the piacular victim, ῥῖπ, sometimes expressed by ἐξίλασμα; which Hesych. explains ἀντίλυτρον. It has been satisfactorily proved that, among both the Jews and the Gentiles, piacular victims were accepted as a ransom for the life of an offender, and to atone for his offence. The heathens believed that no atonement was so complete or effectual as that whereby the piacular victim should be a human being; whose life was thus given ἀντὶ, instead of the life of the other. Hence such victims were called ἀντίψυχοι, and the atonement made by them as ἀντίλυτρον. And Aristides, Sac. v. has an oracular response, where, with allusion to this belief, there is demanded ψυχὴ ἀντὶ ψυχῆς. So also Eurip. Phœn. 1012, ψυχὴν δὲ δώσω τῇδε ὑπερβανεῖν χθονός. Indeed, on this very notion, that the life of one person was, in some cases, to be given and accepted for the life of another, the whole of the Alcestis of Euripides is founded. The true idea, indeed, of atonement was unknown to the Heathens; though they felt the necessity for it. See Horne's Introd. vol. i. 8, 146, 147. The very term ἀντὶ, too, is the strongest that can be imagined; it being, (as derived from the ancient word ἀντ, which signifies change,) for ἐν ἀντ, in mutatione, per mutationem.

The sense, then, of this passage can be no other than that which has been assigned to it by every Interpreter of any consideration in every age, namely, that 'our Lord was to give up his life as a piacular victim, a ransom for mankind, that they might not suffer spiritual death.' And thus it harmonizes with the doctrine of Scripture elsewhere. So in Dan. ix. 24, it is predicted, that the Messiah 'shall make reconciliation for iniquity;' whence he is called by the Jewish Rabbins עֲדָנָה, אֲדָנָה לְטָרוֹן. Comp. Matt. xxvi. 28. John xi. 52. Eph. v. 2. 1 Tim. ii. 6. Heb. ix. 14, 28, (and the Notes on those passages), all declaring the same doctrine, that Christ's death was a sacrifice for the sins of mankind; even that true and substantial sacrifice, which those of the law but faintly shadowed forth in types, symbols, and figures.

I cannot, however, leave this passage, without removing a stumbling-block which has been found here by serious, but misjudging or timid believers; who have been too ready to conclude, that from πολλῶν it may be implied that redemption is not universal. But utterly without reason; for the best Expositors, ancient and modern, are agreed, that πολλῶν is here to be taken for πάντων; of which they adduce many examples. And although not a few of them are inapposite, yet some others fully establish the point. Thus comp. Dan. xii. 2. with John v. 28. sq. and Rom. v. 12, 15, 18, 19, with 1 Cor. xv. 22, not to mention some examples in the Classical writers. Yet, even in these instances, it may be doubted whether πολλοί can ever be said to be, strictly speaking, propter πάντας. It should seem that, in such cases, an idiom subsists, unperceived by Philologists, where there is, by an apposition, either expressed or implied, a comparison of πολλοί, with some other very small number (usually one), which remains after deducting it from a total. In such a case, πολλοί may be said to be equivalent to πάντες; being, in a manner, the whole of the number in question; though it cannot strictly be said to signify that; the literal sense being 'the remainder of a large number,' after a very small one has been subtracted. This principle will apply to all the passages alleged in proof that πολλοί is used for πάντες. I mean to all that are justly alleged; for Matt. xx. 16. has quite another bearing (see the note there); and in places like 1 Cor. x. 33, where the ARTICLE is used, the principle cannot be admitted. There the meaning is, either 'the majority,' or 'the rest.' And such is the case in almost all the passages adduced from the Classical writers; where the sense is, 'very many,' or 'ever so many.' And so in a passage of Tyrtæus ap. Plat. de Repub. 772. οὐτ' εἰ πολλὰ ἀγαθὰ κεκτημένοι, on which Plato remarks: εἰπὼν σχεδὸν πάντας. Also in Thucyd. i. 133. τοῖς πολλοῖς, as appears from a comparison with 134. § 5. must mean [all] the rest; and at i. 38. we have τοῖς πλείοσι (for πολλοῖς) opposed to τοῖς μόνοις. As examples of the same comparison above ad-verted to, we may adduce Rom. viii. 29. εἰς τὸ εἶναι αὐτὸν πρωτότοκον ἐν πολλοῖς ἀδελφοῖς (where the εἰς is implied in πρωτ.) Matt. xxvi. 28. and Mark xiv. 24. τοῦτο γὰρ ἐστὶ τὸ αἷμά μου, τὸ τῆς καινῆς διαθήκης, τὸ περὶ πολλῶν ἐκχυνόμενον εἰς ἄφαισιν ἁμαρτιῶν. (where τὸ περὶ πολλῶν is for τὸ ἰνὸς περὶ πολλῶν, with allusion to the μου just before) Heb. ix. 28. οὕτως ὁ Χριστὸς ἅπασι προσενιχθεὶς εἰς τὸ πολλῶν ἀνινεγκεῖν ἁμαρτίας, &c. The same principle will also apply to some passages where the Article is found, namely, where it does not exert its definite force. So Rom. xii. 5. οὕτως οἱ πολλοί, ὡς σῶμα ἓμιν ἐν Χριστῷ. In Rom. v. 15, 18, 19, the Article is used both to εἰς and πολλοί, the Articles there coming under the head of 'Insertions in reference' (see Middleton in loc.) and renewed mention; the reference being to v. 12, where ὥσπερ δι' ἑνὸς ἀνθρώπου is opposed to εἰς πάντας ἀνθρώπους. And thus it is the same as if neither had the Article, as in Ia. 53. 12. (where the comparison is direct) ἐν τοῖς ἀνόμοις ἠλογίσθη, καὶ αὐτὸς ἁμαρτίας πολλῶν ἀπήνεγκες. Upon the whole, in such a case we may render 'all the rest.' And this may be done in the only Classical passage, not having the Article, that is here apposite, namely, Eurip. Hec. 284. Ἡδ' ἀντὶ πολλῶν ἐστὶ μοι παραψυχή. Compare also Virgil, Æn. v. 815. UNUM PRO MULTIS DABITUR CAPUT.

30. δύο τυφλοὶ, &c.] There is a considerable variation in the accounts of this miracle by the three Evangelists. Mark and Luke notice only one blind man, Matthew two; Luke represents the miracle as performed 'when Jesus was drawing nigh to Jericho,' before he entered it; Matthew and Mark after he had left Jericho. The joint testimony, however, of Matthew and Mark as to the time, seems to outweigh that of Luke, who is not so observant of chronological order; and as all agree that Christ was then attended by a 'multitude,' who 'led the way,' and who 'followed him' towards Jerusalem, it is more probable that the incident took place after he left Jericho, where this multitude seems to have been collected. For he came privately from Ephraim to Jericho, attended only by the twelve. (Hales.) The minute discrepancies in this narrative, compared with those of Mark and Luke, involve no real contradiction; since, though those Evangelists mention one blind man as healed, yet they do not say that only one was healed; and Mark and Luke, in mentioning one, might mean to point out that one who was the more known. Again, the apparent difference between Matthew and Mark, as compared with Luke, with regard to the place where the miracle was performed, may, it is thought, be removed by reading in Luke 'when, or while, Jesus was near Jericho.' Perhaps, however, it may be better, with Mr. Greenwell, to consider the account of Luke, and that of Matthew and Mark, as distinct, and relating to two different miracles; one, that recounted by Luke,—worked on a blind man, at the entrance to Jericho; the other, recounted by Matthew and Mark, on another blind man, named Bartimeus, on leaving Jericho. ever, blends both together. If, however, the trifling discrepancy in question were real and irreconcilable, still they would not weaken the credit of the Evangelists, being such as are found in the best historians; nay, they may be rather thought to strengthen their authority as independent witnesses.

31. ἐπετίμησεν, ἵνα. Campbell translates, 'charged them, that,' &c. But though that be sometimes the signification of the term, as Matt. xii. 16, yet it is here unnecessary to deviate from the usual sense, 'rebuke,' which is indeed more suitable. The full sense (in which we have a sort of sensus prænans) may be expressed by 'rebuken, charging them,' &c. The most probable reason assigned for the rebuke is, that they were unwilling that our Lord's course should be interrupted, or his discourse rendered inaudible. Thus, it should seem, the people only blamed the importunity, as being unseasonable; as in a kindred passage at xii. 16. ἐπετίμησεν αὐτοῖς, ἵνα μὴ, &c.

34. ἀνέβλεψαν α. οἱ ὀφθ. A phrase not easy to be paralleled with others in the Greek Classical authors; in which ἀναβλέπω is used only of persons. Hence, and because it is not found in Mark and Luke, the Alexandrian Critics removed the irregularity, by cancelling αὐτῶν οἱ ὀφθαλμοί.

XXI. Several events intervened between that which terminated the last Chapter, and the one recorded in this,—namely, the visit to Zacchæus, and thence to Bethany, at the house of Simon the Leper and Mary, which he made his abode.

1. Greswell prefixes to v. 1. John xii. 12, 13.

— εἰς Βηθφαγὴν. Mark xi. 1. and Luke xix. 29. add καὶ Βηθανίαν. We may therefore suppose that the territories of the two villages were contiguous; yet that Bethphage came first in travelling from Jericho to Jerusalem. Hence Calmet and others are wrong in describing Bethphage as being a village between Bethany and Jerusalem. So Epiphanius. adv. Hæres. p. 340, cited by Reland, Palæst. 629. testifies that there was an old road to Jerusalem from Jericho through Bethphage and Bethany, and the Mount of Olives. Nay, Calmet himself describes Bethany as situated at the foot of the Mount of Olives (and so all accounts represent it—see Reland); but from the words πρὸς τὸ ὄρος τ. ἐλ. being here conjoined with Βηθφ., it is probable that Bethphage was situated on some part of the lower ridge, or ἀκρόρεια, of the mountain, and Bethany just below it, at the foot of it: and, consequently, it could not be between Bethany and Jerusalem. This is supported by the testimony of Jerome and Origen, the former of whom describes Bethphage as 'sacerdotum viculus, situs in monte Olivæ.' And the latter, in his Annot. on Matt., says it was situated on Mount Olivet.

2. πῶλον 'a colt.' Mark and Luke add, 'on which no man had ever sat.' Animals which had never borne the yoke, or been employed for ordinary purposes, were (by a custom common to all the ancients, whether Jews or Gentiles) employed for sacred uses. See Deut. xxi. 3. 1 Sam. vi. 7. Horat. Epod. 9. 22. Ovid. Met. 3. 11. Virg. Georg. 4. 540, 551. Mark and Luke mention the sending for the colt only, as being that whereon alone our Lord rode; not mentioning the ass, though also brought (agreeable to the prophecy of Zecharias), because they do not mention that prophecy. There is plainly in the latter assertion no negation of the former. Whitby notices the minuteness of the matters predicted, and rightly infers from thence Christ's supernatural prescience.

3. εἴπῃ τι. A popular mode of expressing 'if he shall make objection,' which is found in Mark and Luke.

— ὁ κύριος not 'the Lord,' but 'the master,' Rabbi, as at vii. 21. and viii. 25. John xi. 12. xiii. 13, 14. See Doddridge, Campbell, and Schleusner.

— ἀποστείλαι. Many MSS., Versions, and Fathers have ἀποστείλλαι, which is preferred by Mill and Wetstein, and edited by Matthæi, Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, and Scholz, but without reason. In so minute a variation manuscript authority is of little weight; and yet there is far more of it for the old reading than for the new one; which cannot be admitted without violating the usus loquendi; for the Present cannot (as Knin. imagines) be here taken for the Future. The common reading is rightly defended by Schulz. (who observes that the new reading arose from an error of pronunciation), and has been restored to the text by Fritz.

4. ὄλον.] This is suspected not to be genuine by Griesbach and Gratz, and is cancelled by Lachman, but wholly without cause; for external evidence is almost entirely in favour of the word, and internal nearly as much so,—since it is almost necessary to the sense (tolā hō: res), and was more likely to have been omitted, by accident, in three or four MSS., than have been foisted into the text of as many hundreds. Besides, the word occurs without any var. lect. in passages exactly similar, supra i. 22. xxvi. 56.

5. τῇ θυγατρὶ Σιών] i. e. Jerusalem, by a poetical personification usual in the prophetic writings. That city might be called the daughter of Zion, being situated at the foot, and, as it were, under the wing of that fortified mount. The quotation is from Zech. ix. 9. (with the exception of the introductory words, which are from Is. lxii. 11.), and agrees (at least all that is meant to be adduced for a short clause, χαῖρε σφόδρα, is omitted, as unimportant), with both the Sept. and the Hebrew. In John xii. 15. we have the equivalent phrase μὴ φοβοῦ. For ῥ, the true reading is thought by Dr. Randolph to be ῥ. But there is no occasion for any such change; since ῥ may mean lowly, and is so interpreted by Griesenius in his Lexicon. There is, indeed, a variation in the last words between Matthew and the Sept. But there is some reason to think that formerly the Sept. was read nearly as in Matthew. At any rate, the Evangelist's text closely agrees with the Hebrew.

—πραῦς.] The words δικαίος καὶ σώζων are omitted; and indeed πραῦς may well include the notion of δικ., especially in the sense it there bears,—where the idea of mildness and clemency is comprehended, as in Matt. i. 19. See Note. Thus it means 'mild, or peaceful, and tender,' as opposed to the haughtiness and tyranny of earthly monarchs. Simil. Pind. Pyth. iii. 124. βασιλεὺς πραῖς ἀστοῖς, οὐ φθονίων ἀγαθοῖς, εἰσὶναι δὲ θυμιαστός, πατήρ. For so the passage should be pointed. Such a king was called by the Romans by the title Pater patriæ; but he could not be pater with respect to foreigners. Θαυμαστός is there used in its primitive sense (as a verbal) admirandus.

—ὄνον καὶ πῶλον.] Several eminent Commentators would render the καὶ even. But this is doing violence to the plain sense expressed, and would destroy the coincidence as to fulfilment of prophecy. Nor is there any necessity for it in order to reconcile the Evangelists; for St. Matthew does not say that our Lord rode on the ass, but only that it was prepared for him. Neither will it follow from St. Matthew's saying, 'thus was fulfilled,' For the prophecy was sufficiently fulfilled by the ass and colt being both get ready. Not to say, that even the words of the Prophet are not inconsistent with this view; for any one who goes on horseback, accompanied by a lead horse, may be not improperly described as ἐπιβεβηκὼς, with respect to both.

—ὑποζυγίου.] Scil. κτάνου. The word properly signifies any load of burden. But as the ass was the one commonly so used, it came of itself to denote that animal.

6. What is found in this verse contains the sum of what is circumstantially detailed in Mark xi. 4—6. Luke xix. 32—34.

7. ἐπεκάθισεν.] The reading here is not a little controverted. Ἐπεκάθισεν is found in all the early Edd.; which was altered by the Elzevir Editor, to ἐπεκάθισαν. But ἐπεκάθισαν has been restored by Wetstein, Matthæi, Knapp, Griesbach, Tittman, Fritz., and Scholz. Ἐπεκάθισαν is, indeed, supported by St. Luke's ἐπεβίβασαν. It is also preferred by several Commentators, as Beza, Camerar., Pisc., Wakefield, and Schleusner; and if we were to follow the proprietas lingue, it ought to be adopted. Yet as the verb is often in the Sept. used in the sense 'to sit,' or 'ride,' so the reading ἐπεκάθισεν may deserve the preference, especially as it is supported by Mark's ἐκάθισεν. If ἐπεκάθισαν be read, αὐτῶν will, if understood of the ass and the colt, be unsuitable; and if of the garments, it will be very jejune. We might, indeed, conjecture αὐτόν, supposing ἐπάνω to be taken absolutely for thereon. This would be confirmed by the parallel passage of Luke, and not be at variance with that of Mark. But the mention of the ass and colt at v. 2. and 7. greatly supports the reading αὐτῶν. The people would put the trappings on both the ass and the colt, to do the more honour to Jesus; and as not knowing on which he would ride. Thus, though there is a minute diversity in Matthew and Mark, as compared with Luke, yet it is no real discrepancy, since it does not involve any contradiction. 'Matthew (as is observed in the British Crit. and Quart. Theol. II. 371.) tells us all that happened, because he saw and knew all: Mark and Luke received the facts at secondhand, and mentioned only the material fact.' As to the αὐτῶν, it must not, with many Commentators, be taken, per enallagen, as plural for singular; or τινός be supplied, with others; but, with Euthymius, Theophylact, Beza, Homberg, Schleusner, Wahl, and Fritz., must be referred to the garments, not the ass and colt.

8. ὁ πλείστος ὄχλος] 'the bulk of the people,' consisting both of those who were going to keep the Passover, and of those who, after Lazarus's resurrection, had come out of the city to meet Christ. See John xii. 9.

— ἑστρώσαν ἑαυτῶν τὰ ἱμάτια.] An Oriental custom employed on the public entry of kings, also in use among the Greeks. So Joseph. Ant. ix. 6, 2. ἑκαστὸς ἑστρώννουν αὐτῷ τὸ ἱμάτιον. See 2 Kings ix. 13.

— ἑκοπτον κλάδους.] Meant as a symbol of joy, and employed at the feast of tabernacles and other public rejoicings among the Jews; though in use also among the Greeks and Romans.

9. Ὡσαννά] Heb. וְשַׁנְנִי. Save us now, or we beseech thee! from Ps. cxvii. 25.

— ὁ ἐρχόμενος.] A title of the Messiah, as was also υἱὸς Δαυὶδ. The clause εὐλ.—Κυρ. occurs also infra xxiii. 39.

— Ὡσαννά ἐν τοῖς υψίστοις] Kuin. thinks there is here an ellipse of ὁ ὢν; and Grotius takes the ἐν τοῖς υψίστοις adverbially, for summē. But it is better, with others, to supply μέγιστοι, treating it as a periphrasis for ἐν οὐρανοῖς. Thus in Heb. i. 3. and viii. 1. ἐν ὑψηλοῖς, is interchanged with ἐν οὐρανοῖς. As to the ellipse after Ὡσαννά, it is rather ἵστα; Ὡσαννά being regarded as a noun.

10. εἰσέσθη] for ἐκινήθη, Acts xxi. 30. 'was in commotion, agitated with hope, fear, wonder, or disapprobation, according as each person stood affected. Comp. Pind. Pyth. iv. 484. σεισας τὴν πόλιν.

11. ὁ προφήτης.] The force of the Article is expressed by the [celebrated] prophet. [See supra ii. 23.]

12. τὸ ἱερόν.] A general name for the whole edifice, with all its courts: as distinguished from the ναὸς, or temple properly so called; which comprehended only the vestibule, the sanctuary, and the holy of holies. See Horne's Introd.

— ἐξέβαλε—ἱερῷ.] It appears from Mark xi. 11. that Jesus did not perform this on the day of his entry into Jerusalem (though it is there said that he entered into the temple, and looked round the whole of it), but the day after; spending the night at Bethany, and returning to Jerusalem in the morning; and in the way thither working the miracle of the fig-tree. As Mark is so positive and particular in his account, and as Matth. does not expressly connect our Lord's driving out the traders with the events of the day,—we ought, it should seem, to adopt Mark's account. To do which, there cannot be a greater inducement than the consideration, that those who adopt the other hypothesis are compelled to suppose that the circumstances in question happened twice on two successive days. Indeed our Lord had done much the same thing in the first year of his ministry (John ii. 14). The reason why he did not then do it at his first entry, was (as we learn from Mark), because, it being evening, the buyers and sellers had most of them retired. Mark adds another circumstance, καὶ οὐκ ἔβριον ἵνα τίς διενέγκῃ σκύβος διὰ τοῦ ἱεροῦ, which simply means that he forbade the action in question.

— κολλυβιστῶν] from κόλλυβος, a petty coin, signifies those who exchanged foreign coin into Jewish, or the larger into the smaller coin, for the convenience of the purchasers of the commodities sold in the temple. These κολλυβισταί, or, as they are elsewhere called, κερματισταί, may be paralleled with our money-brokers. The reason why such persons should be found in the outer court of the temple is well explained by Mr. Greswell ubi supra.

13. γέγραπται, &c.] This quotation is from Isa. lvi. 7, where it exactly agrees with the Sept. and Hebrew; except that after κληθήσεται follows πᾶσι τοῖς ἔθνεσι, which is added in the passage of Mark, though not in that of Luke. In the latter clause of the sentence there is not, as the Commentators imagine, a quotation, but only the saying is formed on a similar one at Jerem. vii. 11. In μὴ σπήλαιον ληστῶν ὁ οἶκός μου there is an allusion to the custom (common to all countries, but especially Judaea) for robbers to make their abode in caves. See Joseph. Ant. xv. 10. 1.

— ληστῶν.] Not literally thieves, but extortioners and cheats, at least persons devoted to base lucre. An interpretation which seems required by the expression of John, οἶκος ἱερο- ρίων. Otherwise the assertion might be justified, in its full sense, by what is found in Joseph. B. J. vii. 11. ἰκδοχάσιον κλειπτῶν, φονίων ἀρπάγων τὸ ἱερὸν γέγονε. v. 9, 4. οὐ τὰ κρυπτά μὲν τῶν ἀμαρτημάτων ἠδοξήκατε, κλωπὰς λέγω καὶ ἰσίδρας καὶ μοιχίας, — ἀρπαγαῖς δ' ἐρίζετε καὶ φόνοις. See also iv. 5, 1, 4, and Antiq. xx. 7, 5.

14. I have placed Luke xix. 47. in parallel with this verse, since it seems necessary to be prefixed to this, to make the representation complete.

15. τὰ θαυμάσια] scil. ἔργα, miranda et inaudita. So at Ecclesi. xliii. 25. we have θαυμάσια καὶ παράδοξα.

16. ἐκ στόματος—αἶνον:] An application to the present case of a passage of Ps. viii. 2. Sept. (which speaks of the existence and providence of God, as so clearly appearing from the works of nature, that even the most simple must see) where the Hebrew says, 'thou hast ordained strength'; the Sept. 'thou hast perfected praise,' i. e. accomplished a grand effect by weak means; for the divine praise is perfected even by the silence of the suckling, and the artless cry of the babe. Thus there is no real discrepancy in sentiment, whatever there be in expression, between the Heb. and the Sept. That the whole Psalm has a prophetic reference to the Messiah, is plain from there being three other passages in the New Test. where it is applied to him: 1 Cor. xv. 27. Eph. i. 22. Heb. ii. 6.

17. ῥηλίσθη ἐκεῖ] 'lodged or spent the night there.' A sense found in 3 Esdr. ix. 2. Eccl. xiv. 7. Jesus left the city, and returned to Bethany for the night; not so much to avoid the noise that might be laid for his life, as to avoid all suspicion of affecting temporal power; the night being a season favourable for popular commotion. See Thucyd. ii. 3, 4, φυλάσσοντας νύκτα, κ. τ. λ.

18. ῥηλίσθη, &c.] Supply ῥηλίσθη, expressed in Lucian. Amor. 39. The Article is omitted on account of the participle οδῶν understood. On the chronology of the Passion Week, the reader is referred to Townson, Hales, Townsend, and Gresswell.

19. This action was emblematic; according to the usual custom of the sages of the East to express things by symbolical actions. It was also prophetic. Our Lord intended to prove that his power to punish the disobedient was as great as that to confer benefits. It was, moreover, to prefigure the destruction of the perverse Jews,—because in the time of fruits they had borne none (see vv. 33, 41.); and, likewise, to read a very important lesson to all his disciples of every age,—that if the opportunities God gives for the approving themselves virtuous be neglected, nought will remain but to be withered by the fiat which shall consign them to everlasting destruction.

—μηκέτι ἐκ σοῦ καρπὸς, &c.] A cursing, as Henry observes, the very opposite to the primeval blessing, be fruitful! And accordingly equivalent to 'to be barren!'

21. καὶ μὴ διακριθῆτε.] This negative expression is the very same with the positive one ἐὰν ἔχητε πίστιν, the two being united for the sake of emphasis, as at xiii. 34, and elsewhere. (Kuini.) In διακρ. there is the same metaphor as in δυστάξ. and the Latin diffido.

—τὸ τῆς συκῆς.] An elliptical expression for τὸ παρὶ τῆς συκῆς γεγενῶς ἔργον.

—τῷ ὄρει τοῦτῳ.] Spoken δακτυλῶς, with reference, it is supposed, to the Mount of Olives. For mountain, Luke says ycamore tree. But there is, in fact, no discrepancy; because Jesus might make use of both examples. On the force of these adagial sayings see Note on Matt. xvii. 20. It is implied in the foregoing promise, that they shall pray for the power. And accordingly there is here subjoined an encouragement to prayer, by the assurance that whatever they shall ask in faith they shall receive.

22. καὶ] yea, all things, &c.

22. [Comp. supra vii. 7. Luke xi. 9. John xv. 7. I John iii. 22. v. 14.]

23. ἰλθόντι αὐτῷ.] These are Datives put for Genitives of consequence.

— ἐν ποίᾳ ἐξουσίᾳ.] Ἐν, Heb. 3, 'by virtue of.' This they were authorized to ask, because they had the power of inquiring into the pretensions of a prophet; and the permission of preaching in the temple was derived from them. The interrogators expected, no doubt, that he would answer, 'By virtue of my right as Messiah,' and thus enable them to fix upon him at once the charge of blasphemy. But our Lord forbore to directly reply to his malevolent interrogators; not through fear (as appears from the boldness evinced in the parables immediately following), but from deliberation; and according to a method familiar to Hebrew, nay to Grecian disputants, he answers by interrogation, replying to question by question, and that propounded with consummate wisdom; for while the Pharisees were not disposed, nay were even afraid, to dispute John's claim to be a prophet, they would thereby, on their own principles, admit the claims of Jesus, to whose Divine mission John had borne repeated and unequivocal testimony.

25. τὸ βάπτισμα—ἦν;] The sense is, 'whence had John authority to baptize?' Βάπτισμα is put, by synecdoche, for the whole ministry of John to preach repentance, and the doctrines he taught; because baptism was its most prominent feature, being a symbol of the purity which he enjoined. See Campbell.

— ἐξ οὐρανοῦ,] for ἐκ Θεοῦ, or οὐράνιον, of heavenly origin; a use which sometimes occurs in the LXX., but rarely in the Classical writers.

— διατί οὖν οὐκ ἔρ. α.] 'why, then, have ye not believed him?' i. e. in his testimony of me.

26. φοβούμεθα.] This is not (as Kuinoel and other Philologists suppose) of the middle voice, signifying to terrify oneself, but a deponent formed from what had originally been of the passive voice; just as our neuter or deponent verb, to be afraid, was formed from the old passive to be afraid, to be struck with fear. Fritz. ably remarks on that brevity of expression in the present passage, by which a clause is omitted after ἐξ ἀνθρώπων (equivalent to 'that will not be for our good'), to which the γὰρ following refers, and which γὰρ is put for two γάρ's. I have edited as the sense seems to require, ἐξ ἀνθρώπων, to intimate the apostrophe.

— ὡς προφήτην.] Ὡς is wrongly taken by Kuinoel, as put for ὅτι; though ὅτι is found in the parallel passage of Mark. It is either elegantly pleonastic (by which the expression will be equivalent to that of Luke) or somewhat diminishes the force of the assertion. [Comp. xiv. 5.]

27. οὐκ οἶδαμεν.] Hence our Lord rightly infers their unfitness to be judges in this matter, or to claim to have their authority revered.

28. τί δὲ ὑμῖν δοκεῖ;] 'What think ye? Give me your opinion of what I am about to say.' A mode of speaking meant to refer the matter to themselves, that they might ultimately be self-condemned.

— ἀνθρωπος—δύο.] By ἀνθρ. is plainly meant God; but it is not so clear what is meant by τέκνα δύο, on which there has been some diversity of opinion. The best Commentators, however, are agreed that the words designate two different classes of the Jewish nation; 1. the profane and irreligious generally, but who were brought to repentance by John, and to reformation by Christ; 2. the Scribes and Pharisees, whether priests or laymen, who, though professedly anxious to do the will of God, were, in reality, the greatest enemies to religion, and especially that of the Gospel.

29. μεταμεληθεὶς.] A passive form with a middle signification, 'having changed his mind.'

30. δευτέρῳ.] Many MSS. and some Versions and Fathers have ἑτέρῳ, which was approved by Mill and Bengel, and has been adopted by Wetstein, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz. While Matthæi and Fritz retain the common reading; and rightly; for it is supported by greater authority, and the other reading is evidently a conjectura. The two words, however, are often confounded; as in Thucyd. iii. 49. where see my note.

— ἐγὼ, κύριε.] The best Commentators are agreed that this phrase answers to the Heb. אני ה' אלהיך which is, by ellipse, a phrase of responsive assent, rendered by the LXX. ἰδοὺ ἐγὼ, in 1 Sam. iii. 4. They rightly observe, that 'the Hebrews answer by pronouns, where the Latins use verbs and adverbs, as etiam Domine.' Thus it may be paralleled by our own idiom, 'aye, sir.'

31. οἱ τελῶναι καὶ αἱ πόρναι] i. e. even the worst of those profane and dissolute persons.

— προάγουσι.] Render, not 'go before,' preceed; but 'are preceding you.' [Comp. Luke vii. 29, 30.]

32. ἐν ὁδῷ δικ.] A Hebrew form of expression for 'he came to you in the practice of, i. e. practising righteousness;' and, by implication, leading others into the same course. [See supra iii. 1, 2.]

— τοῦ πιστεῦσαι] for eis to πιστ., i. e. ὥστε πιστ. [See Luke iii. 12, 13.]

33. τις.] This is not found in many of the best MSS. and some Versions and Fathers, and was cancelled by Griesbach, Knapp, Vater, Tittman, Fritz, and Scholz, but retained by Matthæi; yet, if we may judge from supra v. 28, without reason. Nay, Fritz pronounces, somewhat hypercritically, that even the construction requires its absence.

— ὠρυξεν—ληνόν.] Ληνός properly denoted the large vat (called the wine-press) into which the grapes were thrown, to be expressed; in which sense it often occurs in the Sept. But as this vessel had connected with it on the side, or under it (to check, by the coolness of the situation, too great fermentation) a cistern, into which the expressed juice flowed; so, by synecdoche, ληνός came to denote (as here) that cistern itself; which, as it was necessarily subterranean, and generally under the vat, so it was often called holston, as in the parallel passages at Mark

xii. 1, and Ia. xvi. 10. Now every vineyard had its ληνός, or tircular, and its ὕποληνον, or lucus, which received the must; and which St. Mark states to have been dug beneath the press. These cisterns (which are even yet in use in the East), bore some resemblance to the λάκκοι of the Greeks, which the Scholiast on Aristoph. Eccl. 154 (cited by Wetstein), explains ὀρύγματα ποιοῦντες αὐρύχωρα, καὶ στρογγύλα τετράγωνα (I conjecture καὶ στρογγύλα καὶ τετράγωνα) καὶ ταῦτα κοιῶντας (plastering) οἶνον ὑπιδέχοντο καὶ ἔλαιον eis αὐτά. In this parable, according to a common practice in Judæa, it is presumed that the owner did not himself cultivate his vineyard, but entrusted its cultivation to others. Accordingly, the owner expected, by covenant, to receive the fruits, by way of rent for his vineyard; and so καρπός and the Latin fructus are continually used.

— πύργον.] This was built partly as a place of temporary abode for the occupier, while the produce was collecting; and partly for security to the servants stationed there as guards over the place. In the application, however, of the parable, such circumstances as this are to be considered as only serving for ornament; or only express generally, that every thing was provided both for pleasure and security.

— ἐξέδοτο] for ἐξεμισθώσας, as in Polyb. vi. 17, 2, and Herodian, i. 6, 8, cited by the Commentators; to which I add Thucyd. iii. 68, τὴν γῆν ἀμεισθώσαν ἐπὶ δίκῃ ἐτη. The word may here be rendered 'let it out,'—understanding, however, the rent to be not in money, but (agreeably to the most ancient usage, yet retained in the East, and even in some parts of the West) in a certain portion of the produce. Thus τοὺς καρποὺς just after should be rendered 'his fruit, or produce, the portion which fell to him.' The expression let out implies agreement; and in the moral of the parable, has correspondent to the covenant entered into by God with the Jews (comp. Ia. v. 1. Ps. lxxx. 8), on which see Greswell, vol. v. 56, 58.

34. καιρὸς τῶν καρπῶν.] 'the time for gathering the fruits,' as Mark xi. 13. This, too, appears from the researches of Mr. Greswell, to have been the time commonly appropriated by landlords to receiving the rents. Indeed it must, if, as in the present case, the rent be supposed to have been paid in produce. By the servants are plainly meant, in the moral, the prophets; on which see Greswell, p. 83, sqq.

35. ἔδειραν.] Δείρειν signifies properly to flay or skin; but as words denoting great violence come at length, by the abuse of them, to bear a milder sense, it was at length used to signify beat severely. [Comp. 2 Chron. xxiv. 21.]

37. ἐντραπήσονται] 'they will treat with reverence.' Ἐντροπίσθαι signifies, 1. to turn upon oneself; 2. from the adjunct, to be afraid; 3. to regard with reverence. The expression is to be understood, not as excluding prescience, but as denoting that the contingency of an event is viewed in its causes.

38. Thus returning the very answer, than which no other, consistently with the customs of men, could be returned; which was what our Lord wished, in order to prove to them the justice of God while punishing the failure of the Jews in their covenanted engagements, by taking away their national privileges. [Comp. infra xxvi. 3. xxvii. 1. John xi. 53.]

41. κακοὺς κακῶς ἀπ.] Meaning, as Campb. renders, 'he will bring these wretches to a wretched death.' A forcible phrase frequent in the Greek writers from Homer downwards.

— ἀποδώσουσιν αὐτῶν.] The most ancient, and in the time of our Lord a not unusual, mode of paying RENT, namely, by rendering a certain proportion of the produce; of which I have adduced several examples, with illustrations, in Recens. Synop. The most apposite is Plato de Legg. viii. γεωργίαι δὲ ἐκδοδόμεναι δούλοις, ἀπαρχὴν τῶν ἐκ τῆς γῆς ἀποτιλοῦσιν.

42. λέγει αὐτοῖς.] In Luke it is more definitely expressed ὅ δὲ ἐμβλέψας αὐτοῖς εἶπε. [Comp. Matt. xix. 26. Luke xxii. 61.]

— λίθον—γωνίας.] Taken from Ps. cxvii. 22. Sept., to which there is also a reference in other passages of Scripture (see Isaiah xxviii. 16.) All of them show that the words, though very applicable to David, are, in their highest sense, to be referred to the Messiah; as indeed the Jews themselves acknowledge. Λίθον ὃν for λίθον ὃν is not (as Glass. imagines) a Hebraism; but an idiom (namely by inverted attraction) frequent both in the Greek and Latin. See Matt. Gr. Gr. § 474. c.

— κεφαλὴν γωνίας.] Both the Jewish and Christian dispensations are often designated by the figure of a building; and of the latter Christ is represented as the corner-stone, and, by its importance in sustaining and defending the building, the head-stone. See 1 Cor. iii. 11. Eph. ii. 21. However, the nature of the metaphor is not very obvious, nor are Expositors agreed what this ἐμφ. γων. was. Bp. Middleton, with most probability, thinks that, from this passage, it appears to have been, 1. something which might be added when the building was complete; 2. that it was so situated, that a passer by might fall against it; and also 3. that it might fall upon him. So that, says he, 'it exactly answers to an upright stone or buttress, added for the purpose of protecting the corner of a building, where it is most exposed to external violence.'

— αὕτη—θαυμαστή.] Feminines for neuter, Hebraic. An idiom often adopted by the LXX. The construction ἐγενήθη αὕτη is Hebraic, as also is θαυμαστή ἐν ὀφθ. ἡμῶν; for though the Commentators adduce many examples of the phrase ἐν ὀφθ. with a verb, yet not one with an adjective.

43. Meaning, 'Because ye have rejected this stone, the benefits of the Messiah's kingdom and religion shall not be communicated to you; but imparted to a nation, or race of persons (whether Jews or Gentiles), all obedient followers of Jesus, who shall, &c. i. e. the Jewish nation shall no longer be the peculiar people of God; but that nation or race shall be so, which (of whatever country) embraces the plan of salvation now promulgated.

44. καὶ ὁ πεσὼν—αὐτόν.] Almost all Critics are agreed that this verse should properly follow ver. 42; and indeed that it has probably no place here, but was introduced from the parallel passage of Luke. The MSS. and Versions, however, give not the slightest countenance to the first surmise; and the second is very slenderly supported.

With respect to the words themselves, there is an allusion to Is. viii. 14, 15; and the verbs are terms denoting greater or less degrees of injury: the first being to bruise and crush; the second, to beat to pieces, and destroy utterly. The full sense is, 'will crush him to pieces and scatter him as chaff before the λικμὴ, or winnowing fork.' Here Wetstein and others suppose an allusion to the different ways of stoning among the Jews, whereby, a scaffold being erected, twice the height of the person to suffer the punishment, the criminal was violently pushed from it. If, then, he died by coming in contact with some stone nothing further was done; if not, a heavy stone was hurled upon him, which despatched him at once.' But the real allusion, I should rather say, is to that stone spoken of by the Prophet Dan. ii. 34, 'Thou smitest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and brake them to pieces. Then were the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floor,' similar to what is here said, λικμήσει αὐτόν. See also Dan. ii. 44. Is. lx. 12.

Our Lord, then, having, v. 42, made an allusion to himself as a stone, or rock, proceeds to intimate the consequences of coming in contact with it. He that falls upon it shall be broken; he that runs against it—a corner-stone, standing out from the other parts of the foundation,—shall be injured, or broken in his limbs, or bruised in his body. He that is offended with my being the foundation, or opposes me, shall, by the act, injure himself; make himself miserable by so doing, even were there nothing worse. But there is something farther: 'On whom this stone falls, it will grind him to powder,' i. e. will reduce him to dust, so that it may be scattered by the winds. The difference is between those who decline to receive Jesus as the Messiah, and those who oppose him, or rather who continue impenitent and unbelieving. On those the rock, at which they at first stumbled to their great harm, will eventually fall, and crush them in irretrievable ruin.

46. ὡς προφ.] The ὡς is thought to be put for ὅπως, scilicet. Comp. Mark xi. 32, and Luke xx. 6. But, however this sense may have place in other passages, it would here seem sufficient to render miracle.

XXII. Our Lord now proceeds to set forth to the priests and people their criminality, and the consequences of their contumacy, by another parable, peculiar to St. Matthew, and doubtless pronounced immediately after the preceding (as being further illustrative thereof), namely, as soon as the Priests and Pharisees had withdrawn. The object of the Parable was, it should seem, twofold; 1., as being partly historical and partly prophetic, to shadow forth the general fortunes of the Gospel in its earthly stage. Thus it represents, 1. the invitation given to the Jews to embrace the Gospel; the rejection of that offer, the severe punishment to be inflicted on them for their disobedience, and the admission of the Gentiles, in their stead, to the privileges of Christianity: 2. It was meant to represent the peculiar nature of the Gospel, as a dispensation of grace through faith; and thus to afford instruction for every age of the Church; when multitudes who were bidden to the marriage feast of life and immortality would refuse to come, and others who accepted the invitation would come irreverently and profanely, and, so far from complying with the terms, both expressed and implied, would affix terms of their own, and thus be self-excluded.

1. ἐν παραβολαῖς.] For the more elegant διὰ παραβολῶν; occ. in Aristoph. Ran. 61, σοὶ δὲ ἀνιγμῶν ἔρω. Ἀποκριθεὶς here simply denotes addressing; unless there be, as some suppose, an answer to the thoughts of the Pharisees.

2. ὁμοιωθῇ] i. e. 'the same thing will take place as that represented in the parable of a king,' &c.

—γάμους.] This is by most Commentators taken to signify a marriage-feast; though, as the word (correspondently to the Heb. תּוֹסַת) often signifies a feast in general, some Expositors assign that sense here (agreeably, as they think, to the moral purport of the parable); while others, (as Rosenmüller, Kuinoel, and Schleusner) understand an inauguration feast, when the Oriental kings were considered as it were affianced to their country. See Luke xii. 36. xiv. 8. Esth. ii. 18. ix. 22. 1 Kings i. 5—9. But there is no reason to abandon the common interpretation. In the comparison to a marriage-feast there is a peculiar propriety; since in Scripture the Jewish Covenant, as well as the Christian, is represented under the figure of a marriage-contract between God and his people. See Is. liv. 5. Jerem. iii. 8.

 Matt. xxv. 5. John iii. 29. 2 Cor. xi. 2. Revel.
 xix. 7-9. Moreover, the nature of the story and its scope in the application (namely, to the mystical union between Christ and his Church) requires us to suppose a festival of the most magnificent kind, and to which the greatest numbers would be expected to attend. Now certain it is, that the most remarkable instances on record of magnificent entertainments among the ancients, are matrimonial festivities, and especially those of monarchs. And how usual it was to have very great numbers present, we may imagine from the question proposed for discussion in Plutarch, Sympos. iv. 3. *διατὶ πλείστοις ἐν γάμοις ἐπὶ
 δαίπνον καλοῦσιν*;

3. καλεῖσαι) generally signifies 'to invite'; like the Latin vocare and the Heb. קָרָא. Here it rather denotes to summon, since, as Grotius and Kuhl. have shown, among the ancients guests were first invited some time before; and then summoned, within a short time of the feast, that they might be ready. See Groswell.

4. τὸ ἄριστον.] This was, in early times, the name given to breakfast: afterwards it denoted the noonday meal; and at length it was applied to the chief meal (dinner), taken at the close of the day. Hence it came to signify a banquet in general. See Kypke on John xxi. 12. and Mureti Var. Lect. iv. 12.

—τὰ σιτιστὰ.] The term properly denotes animals put up to fatten; and as we had mention made just before of ταῦροι, it must denote calves, lambs, sheep, &c.

—τεθυμένα.] Θύω properly signified suffice (whence θύος and θύωμα), and at first denoted to make those offerings of incense, fruits, and flowers, for which sacrifices of animals were afterwards substituted. But as θύειν still continued to be used, it then denoted to sacrifice; and at length generally to slaughter for eating; a process found in the Heb. קָטַל (Grotius and Hemsterh.)

5. τῶν ὁδῶν] for αὐτοῦ. Ἀγρόν, properly land; but here farm, i. e. estate, or (as the words following require) farming business; for ἐμπορίαν, from the antithesis, must denote other sorts of business, as trade or manufactures.

6. οἱ λοιποί.] Meaning, as Mr. Groswell observes, the remainder of the same number, distinct from these, and consequently a third class among the body of guests. The persons had in view are the Jews of the Apostolic age.

7. καὶ ἀκούσας—ὠργίσθη.] On this clause several varieties of reading exist. Many MSS., Versions, and Fathers for καὶ ἀκούσας have ἀκούσας δὲ, and after βασιλεὺς add ἐκείνος.
 And so Matthæi, Gricebach, and Scholz edit. But although there is considerable external evidence for the readings in question, yet internal evidence is, I apprehend, quite against them; and Fritz-has shown how they originated. In short, all the five varieties of reading here found in the MSS. present no more than so many different ways by which the passage was tampered with by the early Critics. And as the common reading is plainly the parent of all the others, it ought, according to one of the most certain of critical canons, to be preferred.

—πέμψας—ἐνέπρησε.] Plainly referring to the utter destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, who might properly be termed the armies of God, as being commissioned by him for the work of destruction. Comp. Is. xiii. 4, 5. Accordingly this was at once a parable, and a prophecy, whose fulfilment was a striking confirmation of the truth of Christianity.

9. τὰς διεξόδους τῶν ὁδῶν.] Most Commentators explain this compita viarum, places where many streets or roads meet, and therefore of public resort. As, however, such a sense is not easy to be deduced from the word, we may rather suppose it to mean (as in Thucyd. iii. 96.) the outlets of the main streets into the country at the principal city gates; places which, being the main channels of communication in and out, must be places of the greatest concourse.

10. συνήγαγον πάντας ὅσους εὗρον.] A circumstance, from the state of society in the East, by no means unnatural or improbable.

10. πονηροὺς τε καὶ ἀγαθοὺς.] Meaning, of all sorts, of every rank, and every variety of moral character. By this it is intimated, that the bad as well as the good would form part of the visible Church; though the privileges of the Gospel would belong alone to the latter, while its threatenings, denounced against the wicked, would fall on the former.

11. θεάσασθαι τοὺς ἀνακ.] As was then usual with great persons who made splendid entertainments. So Ariston. Ep. i. 5. πάντων εἰς ταῦτόν ἀδελφούμενος, ὁ ἐστιάτωρ εἰσῆμι. Comp. also 2 Esdr. ii. 38, 39.

12. πῶς εἰσῆλθες, &c.] i. e. 'How is it that thou didst venture to come in?' &c.

—ἐν δαμάτῳ.] An appropriate robe, with which those who attended, were expected to come clothed, and which was invariably furnished by the host on all such occasions as a wedding-feast. This custom was common alike to the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans; and something similar to it yet prevails in the East. See Jahn § 178. In this, therefore, consisted the offence of the delinquent—that he had neglected to provide himself with the appropriate dress. But the most important point in tracing the moral of the Parable is, to ascertain what it is that is designated by the wedding-garment. On this Expositors widely differ, and in tracing the thing have been too much influenced by a desire to support the systems they have adopted. Many ancient and early modern Commentators supposed it to mean the gifts of the Holy Spirit for sanctification. But this is not correspondent with the scope of the parable. St. Augustine thought it equivalent to the charity spoken of as the end of the commandment, 1 Tim. i. 5; while again, some ancient and most recent Commentators suppose it to mean, in general, the adorning our Christian profession by a visible conduct. See Ephes. iv. 1. 2 Pet. i. 10. Yet even this view is not extensive enough, nor sufficiently agreeable to the scope of the parable; which, I conceive, requires that we should, with many eminent Interpreters, and recently Mr. Greswell, understand to mean 'a lively faith in Christ, a sacred badge of our Christian profession, peculiarly characteristic of the Gospel, and the grand criterion between the nominal and the real Christian; forming, indeed, the mystical bond of union, which attaches the members to the Head of his body, the Church.' This proper garment (observes Mr. Greswell) was to be furnished indeed from the treasury of the king, but its assumption depended on the guests themselves; and even faith, though the one thing necessary to salvation, and in its imputed efficacy, singly sufficient for that purpose, is not independent of the free will and co-operation of the believer, no more than of the grace of God. It may be the proper spiritual covering of the soul, and neither of mortal texture nor of human acquisition, but immediately derived from the wardrobes of heaven; and yet it must be received, and put on, by the wearer for himself.' Thus it is, as Calvin well remarks, frivolous to debate whether the wedding garment designates faith, or a holy life; since the two are inseparable, the former implying the latter. And therefore the former is rightly made the symbolum or testera of admission to the heavenly banquet. Agreeably to this, St. Paul says, Rom. iv. 16. διὰ τοῦτο ἐκ πίστεως [ἐστί] ἵνα κατὰ χάριν, scil. ᾧ. So also the innumerable company of the redeemed are in Rev. xix. 11—14. represented as clothed in white robes, typifying, like the white robe of the spouse of the Lamb, xix. 8, the δικαιώματα τῶν ἁγίων, i. e. the justificatory robes of the saints.

Lastly, it is to be borne in mind (as Mr. Greswell well suggests) that 'the individual mentioned in the Parable as being rejected for non-qualification, forms the representative of a class, and, alas! a very large one, even of those among professing believers, who presumptuously seek to be saved in some other way, and not through faith in a crucified Redeemer.'

14. πολλοὶ γάρ εἰσι κλητοὶ, ὀλίγοι, &c.] We have here an inference from the whole parable, intended to refer both to the whole of it generally, and to the last verse particularly; and which, though meant especially of the persons in question, would hold good generally; namely, that many, comparatively, would be κλητοί, by having the offer of salvation made to them, but the number who shall accept the terms of the offer would be comparatively few. On the sense of these two expressions κλητοὶ and ἐκλεκτοὶ, see Note supra xx. 16. As to one individual only being mentioned, that proves nothing; since this one forms (as we have seen) the representative of a class.

15. παγιδεύσωσιν 'might ensnare him.' The term is properly used of snaring birds; but, like ἀγρεύειν, employed by Mark xii. 13, and the Latin invenire and illaqueare, is used of ensnaring any person by difficult and artful questions. So Prov. vi. 2. Symm. ἐπαγιδεύθη ἐν ῥήματι στόματος. Λόγος here signifies sermo, conversatio, as Acts xiv. 12. 2 Cor. x. 10.

16. τοὺς μαθ. α.] In the passage of Luke we have: ἐγκαθίστου ὑποκρινομένοις δικαίους εἶναι, &c.; and in Mark the insidious purpose is adverted to.

— τῶν Ἡρωδιανῶν.] From the slight mention of these persons in the New Test., and the silence of Josephus, nothing certain with respect to them can be determined; but the prevailing and best-founded opinion seems to be, that they did not form any distinct religious sect (though probably Sadducees in doctrine, as was Herod), but were rather a political party, composed of the courtiers and ministers, partisans and adherents generally of Herod; who maintained, with him, that the dominion of the Romans over the Jews was lawful, and ought to be submitted to; and that, under present circumstances, the Jews might, allowably, resort to Gentile customs. This is confirmed by the termination iavoi, which was then appropriated to denoting political partisans, ex. gr. Cæsariani, Pompeiani, Ciceroniani, &c. The Herodians were brought with them by the Pharisees, in order that any opinion of Jesus unfavourable to the payment of the tribute might be surely reported to the Romans.

— ἀληθής] 'upright,' neither practising simulation nor dissimulation.

— ἐν ἀληθείᾳ.] In an adverbial sense for ἀληθῶς, as often in the New Test. See Robinson's Lex. in ἐν i. 3. b. a.

— οὐ μέλει σοι π. ο.] Meaning, 'art impartial,' 'without partiality.' This and the expression following, οὐ βλέπεις εἰς πρόσωπον ἀνθ. (of which the latter is a Hebraism, for which Luke has λαμβάνεις πρόσωπον), are nearly synonymous. Except that πρόσωπον adverts to the external condition of men, with allusion to its being no more a part of the man than the πρόσωπον, or actor's mask.

18. πονηρίαν.] The word here signifies, like the Latin malitia, craft. So Luke has πανουργίαν; Mark, ὑπόκρισιν, with reference to the υποκρινομένους of Luke xx. 20.

19. τὸ νόμισμα τοῦ κήνσου] i. e. 'the coin demanded by the tax,' what Mark and Luke express by δηνάριον. The word comes to mean this, as signifying literally any thing νομισμένον, 'appointed or sanctioned by law.' The idiom is found also in the Classical writers.

20. τίνος—ἐπιγραφή:] The inscription was ΚΑΙΣΑΡ ΑΥΤΟΚΤΕΤ· ΙΟΥΔΑΙΑΣ ΕΛΛΟΚΥΙΑΣ. 'Our Lord here baffles the malignant proposers of the question, by taking advantage of their own concession, that the denarius bore the emperor's image and superscription, and also of the determination of their own schools, that wherever any king's coin was current, it was a proof of that country's subjection to that government. He significantly warns these turbulent and seditious demagogues, the Pharisees, to render unto Cæsar the dues of Cæsar, which they resisted; and these licentious and irreligious courtiers, the Herodians, to render unto God the dues of God, which they neglected; thus publicly reproving both, but obliquely, in a way that they could not take any hold of.' (Dr. Hales.)

21. ἀπόδοτε οὖν.] 'Though the right of Cæsar to demand tribute of the Jews may seem to be undecided by the answer, yet the precept at v. 23 is decisive, and being united with the preceding verses by οὖν, it inculcates the duty of submission to established governments which is a leading feature of the Christian religion.' (Whitby.) [Comp. supra xvii. 25. Rom. xiii. 7.]

22. ἐθαύμασαν] i. e. 'wondered at the wisdom of his answer;' for by this decision of so nice and difficult a question Cæsar was satisfied, God glorified, and the people edified.

23. The Pharisees being thus baffled, endeavoured to effect their object by setting upon him a not less hostile but craftier race, the Sadducees, who, as Mr. Scott observes, 'excelled in that sort of logic which consists in arguing by insinuation from imagined difficulties against authenticated revelation, or even stubborn facts.' How formidable this mode of warfare was they had themselves experienced; and hoped that Jesus would find in his own case. Accordingly, being thus instigated, those deniers of a future resurrection sought to embarrass him 'who was the resurrection and the life' with a difficulty which had probably perplexed others, but only gave our Lord, as in the case of the Pharisees, an opportunity of showing his own consummate wisdom; and accordingly he so effectually vanquished the claims of his opponents, that they never in future dared to essay the same course.

— Σαδδουκαῖοι.] Render, not 'the Sadducees,' but 'Sadducees;' for we cannot suppose the whole sect to have gone. Indeed, that it must be so understood, is plain from the parallel passage of Luke xx. 27, where we have: τινὲς τῶν Σαδδουκαίων.

— μὴ εἶναι ἀνάστασιν.] Campbell would render, 'that there is no future life: for ἀνάστασις, he says, when applied to the dead, properly denotes no more than a renewal of life to them, in whatever manner. 'Now (continues he) the Sadducees denied not merely the resurrection of the body, but the immortality of the soul, and a future state of retribution. To say, therefore, that they denied the resurrection, would give a very defective account of their tenets. It is plain from Josephus and other Jewish writers, as also Acts xxiii. 8, that they denied the existence of angels, and all separate bodies. Thus going much further than the Pagans, who did, indeed, deny the resurrection of the BODY, but believed in a state after death, wherein the souls of the departed exist in a state of happiness or misery, according to their deeds on earth. It is plain, from our Lord's answer, that the Sadducees denied not merely the resurrection of the body, but the immortality of the soul. They had, it seems, no notion of spirit, and were consequently obliged to make use of terms which properly relate to the body, when they spoke of a future state; which, therefore, came at length to be denoted simply by the word resurrection. Comp. Acts xxiii. 8.' This, though very true, yet does not prove our common version to be, as Dr. C. maintains, inaccurate. Nay, on the contrary, his own is (properly speaking) no version at all, but merely an explanation. The learned Commentator does not sufficiently bear in mind, that popular phraseology (such as is generally that of the New Test.) must be interpreted as such. There is little doubt but that the phrase ἀνάστασις τῶν νεκρῶν, or ἀνάστασις, denoted, in common parlance, and agreeably to the general doctrines of the Pharisees, the resurrection of the soul as well as of the body (doctrines which indeed have commonly stood or fallen together), and the re-union of both in a future state. Though, at the same time, the ideas of the Pharisees themselves (and still more the people at large) as to the nature of that future life, were very vague, and occasionally founded on the notions of the heathens. So that our Lord's reply was, in wisdom, so framed as not only to silence the Sadducees doctrines, but to remove the misconceptions of the Pharisees; and thus to instruct not only the unbelievers in the doctrine of the resurrection, but the middle-believers. [Comp. Acts xxiii. 8.]

24. This is not a regular quotation, nor does it profess to be such—yet it correctly represents the sense of the injunction of the law. The intent of which was to keep the families of Israel separate, and perpetuate them. See Deut. xxv. 5.

— ἴαν τις ἀποθάνῃ.] Mark and Luke more explicitly, ἴαν τινος ἀδελφὸς ἀποθάνῃ.

— ἐπιγαμβρεύσει.] Ἐπιγαμβρεύω (which occurs also in the Sept.) denotes to marry a widow by right of affinity.

— ἀναστήσει.] Mark and Luke have ἐξαναστ.

— σπέρμα.] This word, like the Heb. שׁוּר denotes progeny, whether one or more children; though in Scripture it is almost confined to the latter. On the contrary, in the Classical writers it is almost always used of the former. So Soph. El. 1510, and Œd. Tyr. 1067, and a Delphic oracle in Thucyd. v. 16. Διὸς υἱὸς ἡμῶν τὸ σπέρμα—ἀναφύειν. There are, however, examples in the Classical writers of σπέρμα in a plural sense. Thus Soph. Trach. 304. Eurip. Med. 798, ἀλλὰ κτανεῖν σὸν σπέρμα τολμήσεις, γύναι; By raising up progeny is meant, as Dr. Clarke shows, that the offspring shall be reckoned in the genealogy of the deceased, and, in fact, to be considered his as to inheritance, &c.

28. ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ.] 'in the state following the resurrection.'

29. πλανᾶσθε—Θεοῦ] i. e. 'ye deceive yourselves by assuming a false hypothesis'—namely, that if there be a future state it must be like the present, and by your ignorance of the true sense of the Scriptures; and not considering the omnipotence of God,—to whom renewal of existence can require no more exertion of power than original creation; nor reflecting that God is as able to raise up the dead without their former passions, as to originally create them with those passions.

30. οὔτε ἐκγαμίζονται.] On this point there has been much difference of opinion among the Jewish Rabbins. Some, as the earlier ones, maintaining that there is marrying in heaven; others, as the later, that there is not. The general opinion, however, was, in the time of Christ, that the dead would be raised either in their former or with other bodies. And it was the common notion, that the offices of the new bodies would be precisely the same with those of the former ones. The wiser few, however, were of quite another opinion. But of these some (as Maimonides afterwards) went into the other extreme—and maintained that the raised would have no bodies in a future state. To avoid the difficulty involved in the belief of a resurrection, the Sadducees rejected it altogether,—misunderstanding Scripture,—which does not say that men in a future life will live as they do, and quite misconceiving the power of God. The purpose of the Sadducees was, by this sort of puzzle, to show the absurdity of a resurrection by showing the uselessness of it; for if the future world was not to differ from this, why should there be a resurrection at all? But our Lord answers them by showing the groundlessness of this hypothesis, which was quite unsupported by Scripture, and by assuring them (as is done more at large in Luke) that the future life will be quite different from the present, and that therefore there will be no marrying, &c.

—ὡς ἄγγελοι.] Luke says ἰσάγγελοι. Though neither expression imports equality, but only similarity. This similarity must chiefly, by the context, be referred to the point in question; i. e. the not being subject to the appetites of the body; although, upon the whole, αἰεῖν ὡς may denote condition generally. At all events, it does not follow, because angels are, as is supposed, composed of spirit only, that the righteous shall, at the resurrection, have spirits only. That they will also have bodies of some sort or other is certain,—especially from 1 Cor. xvi. 42. seq.

31. περί δὲ τῆς ἀναστ.] i. e. 'as to the dead being raised, in proof of the resurrection.'

32. ἐγὼ εἰμι ὁ Θεός, &c.] From this passage of Exod. iii. 6, 16, the doctrine of the resurrection is proved, more Judaico, and that inferentially and by legitimate consequence from what has been said. The argument (as stated by Mr. Horne) is as follows: 'Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob had been long dead when these words were spoken, wherein God says, "I am," (not I was), "the God of Abraham," &c.; and as He is not "the God of the dead, but of the living," these patriarchs must have been existing in some sense when this declaration was made; for it implies a relationship between God and them, which could not be if they were not existing. The patriarchs, therefore, though dead to us, are alive to God; which proves a future state.' This mode of argumentation was peculiarly Jewish. So Manasseh Ben Israel, cited by Wetstein, proves the resurrection of the dead from the very same passage, and employs almost the very same words. [Comp. Acts vii. 32.]

33. In Luke it is added, that some of the Pharisees answered, 'Master, thou hast said well.'

34. ἐφίμωσα.] Literally, 'had put a muzzle on their lips.' An idiom not infrequent in the later writers, as Josephus, Bell. i. 22, §. Lucian de Morte Per. 15, οἱ δὲ ἔχθροί ἐπαφίμωτο.

—συνήχθησαν ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό.] Exactly similar to the expression 1 Cor. xi. 20, συναρκοῦντων ὑμῶν ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό, where ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό is equivalent to ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ. The sense is literally, 'at the same place.'

35. νομικός.] Mark xii. 28, calls him εἰς τῶν γραμματέων; from which it has been by some thought that νομικός and γραμματεὺς were synonymous terms. Others, however, suppose that a distinction existed; i. e. that the γραμματεῖς were the public expounders of the law, while the νομικοὶ were the private teachers of it. This, however, rests on mere conjecture. That the νομικοὶ were expounders of the law, whether publicly or privately, appears from Epict. i. 13. νομικόν, ἐξηγούμενον τὰ νόμιμα. But as in Classical Greek νομικός meant jurisconsult, or barrister, there seems no reason to doubt that the νομικοὶ were public as well as private teachers.

—πειράζων αὐτόν.] Some modern Interpreters assign to πειράζων the good sense, explorans, trying, viz. his skill in Scripture; which seems countenanced by Mark. But most of them adopt the bad one, tempting. The truth seems to be (as Chrys. and Theophyl. suppose) that the man came with an evil intention, but departed better disposed.

36. ποία ἐντολὴ μεγάλη.] The question involved a matter of no little controversy among the Jewish Doctors, as involving the comparative importance of different precepts; some maintaining the pre-eminence of one, some of another. Only while they distinguished the Divine precepts (of which they numbered 613) into great and small, they constantly gave the preference to the ceremonial ones. Christ, however, decided in favour of the moral law, yet not to the neglect of the ceremonial.

37. ἔφη.] This reading (instead of the Vulg. εἰπὼν), which is found in the greater part of the best MSS., is preferred by Mill and Bengel; and is edited by Matthæi, Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz. Before the words following we have added in Mark, πρώτη πασῶν τῶν ἐντολῶν. Ἀκούε, Ἰσραὴλ, Κύριος ὁ Θεὸς ἡμῶν, Κύριος εἷς ἐστι.

37. ἐν ὅλῃ τῇ καρδίᾳ, &c.] These are formulas nearly equivalent, but involving no redundancy, and united for intensity of sense (as in a passage of Philo cited by Wets.); importing, not that perfection in degree, or exaltation in kind, contended for by some; but only denoting, that 'we must assign to God the first place in our affections, and consecrate to him the united powers and faculties, both of body and mind,' with which he hath endued us, so as to exert them most effectually. [Comp. Deut. vi. 5. and Luke x. 27.]

38. πρώτη καὶ μεγ. ἐντ.] How and in what respect this was such, see Bp. Taylor's Works, vol. iii. p. 7. and Bps. Sherlock and Porteus in D'Oyly and Mant; also compare Luke x. 27. Rom. xiii. 9. Gal. v. 14. 1 Tim. i. 5. & James ii. 8.

39. ὁμοία αὐτῇ] i. e. similar in kind, though not equal in degree; springing out of it, and closely connected with it.

— τὸν πλησίον.] The term here, as often in the New Test., has a very extensive import, comprehending every person with whom we have to do. [Comp. Levit. xix. 18. and Rom. xiii. 9.]

— ὡς σεαυτόν.] We are not here commanded to love (i. e. benefit) our fellow-creatures as much as ourselves (which were inconsistent with the strong principle of self-love which the Almighty has implanted in us for our preservation); for ὡς (like the Heb. כ) imports, not equality in degree, but similarity in kind. Thus the precept corresponds to that of our Lord at Matt. vii. 12. And we are commanded not only to avoid injuring him, as we avoid injuring ourselves; but to treat him in the same manner as we might, if exchanging situations with him, fairly claim to be treated by him.

40. ἐν ταύταις—κρίμονται.] This is generally thought to be a metaphor taken from the Jewish custom of suspending the tables of the laws from a nail or peg. But the metaphor is common to almost all languages, as used of things closely connected, so as to form links of one common chain, and springing from the same origin. Comp. Plat. ii. 116. γὰρ οὐδὲ σεαυτὸν καὶ τὸ· Μηδὲν ἔγωγε ἐκ τούτων γὰρ ἡρτῆται τὰ λοιπὰ πάντα. There is, however, a Hebraism in the use of ἐν for ἐκ. Or the ἐν should have been followed by ἐκασταφαινοῦνται, or πληροῦνται, as in Rom. xii. 9. Whatever be the nature of the metaphor, the full sense is the same as οὗτος ἐστὶν ὁ νόμος καὶ οἱ προφῆται, πάντα vii. 12. (as Groswell observes), or that those two commandments form an epitome of the duties of the two tables; which, taken in conjunction, comprehend the entire duty of a responsible being like man; who, on performing them both, would be perfectly just, δίκαιος ἀληθῶς ἂν εἴη, to use the words of Justin. M. Dial. cum Tryph. p. 342. 22. See Mark xii. 32—34, who has some important additional matter.

41. συνηγμένων.] In order, as we learn from Mark xii. 35, to hear Christ while he was teaching in the Temple. On what occasion we are not informed.

42. τί ὑμῖν—υἱός ἐστι;] This question, as involving them in an inextricable difficulty, was proposed by our Lord to the Pharisees, to show them how little they knew the true nature and dignity of the Messiah. Bp. Bull, in his Jud. Eccl. Cath. i. 12. observes, that 'although the Prophets had not obscurely intimated that Christ would be God as well as man; and though the wiser few of the Jews saw that,—yet the generality embraced the abject notion that he would be a mighty conqueror, and a glorious monarch (like Cyrus, Alexander, or Cæsar), who would subdue all the nations of the earth, and make Jerusalem the metropolis of the world. And as a mere man might, under God's providence, effect all this; where is the wonder that the Jews supposed the Messiah would be no more.' He adds that, had the Pharisees held the divinity of the Messiah, they might easily have solved the proposed enigma, by replying that Christ would indeed be David's Son, quod ad carnem attinet, but his Lord as regarded his Divine nature.

43. ἐν πνεύματι] scil. ἀγίῳ, which is expressed in the parallel passage of Mark.

— Κύριον.] 'This word, corresponding with the Heb. אדון, adon, signifying Lord or Master, was a term implying an acknowledgment of superiority in the person to whom it was addressed, and therefore never given to inferiors, though sometimes, perhaps, out of courtesy, to equals. Upon this, then, our Lord's argument turns. An independent monarch, such as David, acknowledged no Lord or Master but God; far less would he bestow that title upon a son, or descendant; and consequently, the Messiah, being so called by him, under the influence of the Spirit, and therefore acknowledged as his superior, must be Divine.' (Campb.) Jesus here in the clearest manner affirms that the royal prophet, a thousand years before, under the highest communication and direction of the Holy Spirit, had a knowledge of the Messiah, the glory of Israel and the hope of the world; that he viewed this Messiah as at the same time a living and acting person, and that thus inspired he attributed to the Mes-

44. κάθου ἐκ δεξιῶν.] A comparison taken from kings, on whose right hand sat the heir, or he who was next in dignity, and on the left hand he that was immediately below him in rank. But sitting on the right implied also a participation in the regal power and authority. Hence συμβασιλεύουσιν is interpreted by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 25. as equivalent to βασιλεύειν.

— ἕως ἂν θῶ] 'whilst I make.' The image is derived from the custom of conquerors putting their foot on the neck of a vanquished enemy, as a mark of subjugation. So Virg. Æn. x. 731. Tum super abjectum posito pede. Comp. Josh. x. 24. 2 Sam. xxii. 41. How the words are to be understood of the Messiah, appears from 1 Cor. xv. 25. sq.

45. εἰ οὖν ἐστι:] Some regard this as an inversion of construction, as in Mark xi. 23. But since the sense is the same either way, there is no necessity to resort to any such supposition.

46. τις] 'any one,' namely, of the class of persons whom he had just silenced. By ἐπερωτῆσαι we are to understand the putting such sort of captious enquiring questions as those above-mentioned.

XXIII. 1. τότε] i. e. after he had put the Pharisees and Sadducees to silence.

2. καθέδρας ἐκάθισαν.] This alludes to the sitting posture in which the Jewish doctors taught. They are said to sit in Moses' seat, by having succeeded to him in the office of teachers of religion. In ἐκάθισαν we may, with Fritz. suppose the Aorist used in the sense of custom for pres.

3. πάντα—ποιεῖτε.] This must be taken strictly (as in Col. iii. 20. 22. Ephes. v. 24.); i. e. all things which they read from the Law and the Prophets, and whatever they taught agreeably thereunto. Bp. Warburton, in an able Sermon on this text, points out the magnanimity of this conduct of our Lord, and shows how different it was from what would have been pursued by an impostor, who had a new system to introduce upon one established, but shaken by the immorality of its teachers; who would have improved so favourable a circumstance to his own advantage. Our Lord, on the contrary, reproves the popular prejudice, and, endeavouring to reconcile the people to their teachers, his inveterate enemies—instructs them to distinguish between the public and private character of the teacher: showing them that though men who 'say, and do not,' should not be followed for examples, yet that as ministers of religion, who are invested with authority to teach the Law, they are to be attended to as instructors, when officially enforcing the ordinances of God.

— τηρεῖν.] Some Editors cancel this word, which is omitted in 7 MSS., some Versions, and Latin Fathers. But that is very slender testimony; since Versions are, in a case like this, of little authority; and the MSS. are all of the Alexandrian recension, and such as abound with alterations arising from ill-judged fastidiousness.

4. δεσμεύουσι] 'they bind [on] loads,' as a bundle or bale on a pack-horse. By these burdens are meant the traditions of the elders. Δυσβάστακτα. So Diog. Laert. vii. 5, 4. ἀντὶ μόνου δύναται βαστάσαι Ζήνωνος φορτίον.

— τῷ δὲ δακτύλῳ—κινῆσαι] i. e. 'so far from taking upon their own shoulders the burdens which they lay on those of others,' they will not even stir them with their finger ends; a proverbial expression (common both to Greek and Latin writers) to denote 'being quite indisposed to exert oneself in any labour which we enjoin on others.'

5. πλατύνουσι.] Christ does not censure the wearing of the phylacteries, or the fringe, but the doing it ostentatiously, by making them very large. These phylacteries, or prayer-fillets, (strips of parchment inscribed with texts from the Old Test. which the Jews bound around the forehead and left wrist or arm, while at prayers, see Josephus, Ant. iv. 8, 13.), took their rise from a literal instead of a spiritual interpretation of Deut. vi. 8. Num. xv. 38. That these were, as the Commentators inform us, also regarded as amulets, or charms to preserve from evil, may be very true; but when they would hence deduce the name itself, we may hesitate; for that may better imply that they were thereby reminded to keep the law; the word literally signifying preservers. So Plutarch gives this name to the Roman bullæ around the necks of youths, and accounts for their use on the same principle.

6. πρωτοκλισίαν] 'the first seat at banquets.' Namely, among the Jews, at the top of the table, as with us; among the Greeks and Romans the middle place at the triclinium.

— πρωτοκαθεδρίας,] i. e. on the seats of the seniors and the learned; who sat immediately under, with their backs to the desk of the reader; their faces being turned towards the people.

8, 9, 10.] In these three verses there is essentially the same sentiment, but with some variation of terms; resorted to in order to favour the reprobation, which is meant to give energy to an earnest warning against the assumption, on the one hand, or the admission, on the other, of such a sort of absolute domination as that assumed by the Scribes over men, without authority from God. It is only meant, therefore, to warn them against that unlimited veneration for the decisions of men, or implicit reliance on any human teacher, which was so common among the Jewish devotees. Such being the purport, this passage cannot be supposed to forbid Christian teachers bearing such accustomed appellations as appertain to superiority of office, of station, or of talent; but only admonishes not to use them as the Scribes did, for the purposes of pride and ostentation, and to exercise a spiritual tyranny over the faith and consciences of their Christian brethren, or pretend to such infallibility and supreme authority as is due to Christ alone. See more in a masterly Sermon of Bp. Warburton, vol. ix. pp. 190—206.

The three terms here employed, ραββί, πατήρ, and καθηγ. were appellations ordinarily assumed by and given to their principal Teachers; and not only all three were sometimes employed, but each twice; which is alluded to in the preceding verse.

8. μὴ κληθῆτε] 'suffer not yourselves to be called.'

— καθηγητής.] There is some doubt as to the reading here. Many of the best Commentators would read διδάσκαλος, which is found in several MSS., Versions, and Fathers, but is received by no Editor except Fritz.; doubtless because it would seem a gloss on καθηγ.

— ὁ Χριστός.] This is omitted in several ancient MSS., and some Versions and Fathers; is rejected by Mill and Bengel, cancelled by Griesbach and Fritz, and bracketed by most other Editors. It probably crept in from ver. 10.

9. πατέρα—γῆς.] 'style no man on earth your Father.' There is an ellipsis of τίνα.

12. ὅστις δὲ—ὑψωθήσεται.] A frequent gnome among the Jews, and sometimes occurring in the Classical writers. By Christ, however, it is employed in a spiritual sense.

13, 14.] These verses are transposed in the common text and most of the MSS.; but are placed in the present order in the best MSS.; confirmed by several Versions, Fathers, and early Editions, approved, with reason, by all the most eminent Commentators, and restored by Mill, Wetstein, Matthæi, Knapp, Fritz., and Scholz. Ver. 13 is omitted in several MSS. of the Alexandrian recension, with some Versions and Latin Fathers. But there is no good ground for rejecting it. It should seem that the text above adopted presents the true reading and order; probably accidentally changed by the eyes of the transcribers being carried from the first οὐαὶ δὲ—ὑποκριταί! to the second,—by which the words ὅτι κατεσθίετε—κρίμα were omitted,—and afterwards inserted, either by the scribes (on perceiving their mistake), or by the correctors, but in the wrong place. In this portion (vv. 13—35.) there is a most impressive apostrophe (one of the noblest on record) to the Pharisees, as if present (though, as appears from v. 1. they had now withdrawn), against whom Christ, as it were wearied out with their attempts against him, whether to take him by force or by guile, sums up all that he had said, or had to say, of a generation of vipers; denouncing on them oft repeated woes for their complicated vices (their hypocrisy, pride, extortion, rapacity, and persevering persecution of all the prophets sent to them), and concludes with a solemn prediction (awfully fulfilled within that very generation) of the destruction of their Temple, and the withdrawing of His presence until their final conversion.

— κατεσθίετε.] Of this figurative use of the word examples occur frequently in the Greek Classical writers; and the same is the case with the correspondent term in Latin, and indeed in the modern languages. Oikias means good,

— προφάσει.] Sub. ἐπὶ, 'under a pretext,' of religion; but in reality as a mask to conceal their avarice.

— μακρά.] Sometimes, it is said, these prayers occupied nine hours a day.

14. κλείετε ἔμπροσθεν τῶν ἀνθ.] For the more Classical κλείειν ἀπὸ or ἀποκλείειν. It may be compared with our phrase, to shut the door in the face of, or against. In the words of the parallel passage of Luke, ἔρας τὴν κλειδα τῆς γνώσεως, there is an allusion to locking a door against any, and preventing others from entering by carrying off the key. The import of both expressions is, that 'they cut off all access to the Temple of salvation, by taking away that key of the knowledge' [of Christ in God] which would open the entrance thereto.

15. περιάγετε—ξηρὰν.] A proverbial expression, frequent both in Greek and Latin, importing the greatest activity and exertion. The zeal, indeed, of the Jews for proselytism was, itself, proverbial among the Heathens (see Hor. Sat. i. 4.) inasmuch that at length it was forbidden by the Constitutiones Imperatorum.

— υἱὸν γεέννης] i. e. by Hebraism, 'deserving of, or doomed to, hell.' So 1 Sam. xx. 31. 2 Sam. xii. 5, υἱὸς θανάτου, 'devoted to death.' It is strange that Kypke, Rosenm., and some others, should take διπλ. to signify *dolo*rum. The grammatical objection to the common interpretation, on the ground that the word never occurs in the comparative, has no force, for I have myself in Rec. Syn. adduced two examples. Moreover, διπλότερον, here and in the other two passages where it occurs is not an adjective, but an adverb.

16. In this and the seven following verses Christ condemns the subtle distinctions of the Pharisees concerning oaths, and points out the sanctity and obligation of an oath.

— τῷ χρυσῷ τοῦ ναοῦ.] By this some understand the gold which adorned the Temple; others, the sacred utensils; others again, the money set apart for sacred purposes. As no particular gold is mentioned, it may be understood of any or indeed all of the above.

17. μωροὶ καὶ τυφλοὶ.] This may seem harsh language; but it is to be considered that our Lord had divine knowledge to discern wickedness, and divine authority to reprove it. (Abp. Newcome.) The force, however, of the expression μωροὶ is not to be too much pressed upon, any more than the similar one ἄφρων, 1 Cor. xv. 36 (see the note there); since it merely designates 'homines perperam ratiocinantes et judicantes,' as Schleusner explains. So Ælian de Providentia, p. 1052 (post calc. Var. Hist.), ὅς δὲ λέγεται αὐτοὺς (scil. θεοῦ) μὴ ἡμῖν προσέχειν, ὡ μῦρα.

— ὁ ἀγιάζων] 'makes it sacred and apart from common use.' The money was holy, because it was subservient to the uses of the Temple, and other sacred purposes, like the ἀναθήματα among the Greeks, and the donaria among the Romans. —(Rosenm.)

21. κατοικήσαντι.] This is read, for the common κατοικοῦντι, in the greater part of the MSS. and the Ed. Prin.; and it has been, with reason, edited by Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, Fritz, and Scholz.

- 22 αὐτόν· ^π καὶ ὁ ὁμοῦσας ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ ὁμνῶν ἐν τῷ θρόνῳ ^η τοῦ Θεοῦ, καὶ ἐν τῷ καθημένῳ ἐπάνω αὐτοῦ. ^η ^ο Οὐαὶ ὑμῖν, Γραμματεῖς καὶ Φαρισαῖοι, ὑποκριταί! ὅτι ^ο ἀποδεκατοῦτε τὸ ἡδύσμον καὶ τὸ ἀνηθον καὶ τὸ κύμινον· ^ο καὶ ἀφήκατε τὰ βαρύτερα τοῦ νόμου, τὴν κρίσιν καὶ τὸν ἔλεον καὶ τὴν πίστιν· ταῦτα ἔδει ποιῆσαι, καὶ κείνα μὴ ^ο ἀφίναί. ^ο Ὁδηγοὶ τυφλοί· οἱ διῶλίζοντες τὸν κώνωπα, τὴν ^ο δὲ κάμηλον καταπίνοντες. ^ο Οὐαὶ ὑμῖν, Γραμματεῖς καὶ Φα- ^ο ρισαῖοι, ὑποκριταί! ὅτι καθαρίζετε τὸ ἔξωθεν τοῦ ποτηρίου καὶ τῆς παροψίδος, ἔσωθεν δὲ γέμουσιν ἐξ ἀρπαγῆς καὶ ^ο 26 * ἀδικίας. ^ο Φαρισαῖε τυφλέ! καθάρισον πρῶτον τὸ ἐντὸς τοῦ ^ο ποτηρίου καὶ τῆς παροψίδος, ἵνα γένηται καὶ τὸ ἐκτὸς αὐτῶν ^ο καθαρόν. ^ο 27 ' Οὐαὶ ὑμῖν, Γραμματεῖς καὶ Φαρισαῖοι, ὑποκριταί! ὅτι ^ο

22. ἀποδεκατοῦτε—κύμινον.] The Pharisees were scrupulously exact in paying tithes, even of such insignificant herbs as those here specified, as ἡδύσμον, the garden mint, ἀνηθον, dill (on which see Dioscor. iii. 461); and κύμινον, cummin, a disagreeably pungent herb, and so little esteemed, that it was proverbially employed to express worthlessness. That the above are only meant as examples of insignificant herbs, is plain from Luke having 'mint and rue,' with the addition of καὶ τῶν λαχάνων. Ἀποδεκατεύειν is a word not used by the Classical writers, and only found in the Sept; where it expresses the Heb. ^{וָשַׁלַּח}, which signifies both to take tithe and, as here, to pay tithe. Our Lord, it must be observed, does not censure them for paying tithes of these herbs; but, after performing these minute observances, for omitting the weightier matters of the Law. This applies to all the subjects of the woes in this Chapter, as is plain from the words ταῦτα ἔδει ποιῆσαι, καὶ κείνα μὴ ἀφίναί. — ἀφίκατε] 'ye leave undone.' The word is often applied to the neglect of Divine precepts.

— κρίσιν, ἔλεον, καὶ τὴν πίστιν.] The reason why the Article was put before κρίσιν and πίστιν is, that they may correspond to τὸ ἡδύσμον, τὸ ἀνηθον, and τὸ κύμινον preceding: for, as they have the Article to denote the species of herbs, so may these, as denoting the different species of practical religion. Render 'justice, charity (or humanity), and faith,' or trust in God, as the proper foundation of our love to Him. Thus it will be agreeable to the τὴν ἀγάπην τοῦ Θεοῦ of Luke. Moreover, our Lord seems to have had in view a passage of Micah vi. 8. I would here compare a noble one of Pind. Olymp. xiii. 6. 11, 'Ἐν τῇ γὰρ Εὐνομίᾳ ναίει, κασίγνη- | ται τε, βάθρον πολίων, Ἀσφαλὴν Δίκαι, καὶ ἰσά- | τρηστοὶ Εἰρήναι, ταμίαι Ἀνδράσι πλού- | τιοι, χροῦσαι Παιδὲς ἐβούλων Θέμενοι.

— ταῦτα ἔδει ποιῆσαι, &c.] In the words of Demosth. xxiii. 20, τοῦτ' οὐδὲν δεῖ προσεῖναι, τὰ δ' ἄλλα ὑπάρχειν.

24. διῶλίζοντες τὸν κώνωπα.] Not 'strain at' (which was a mere typographical blunder of the first Edition of our common Version) but strain out, as found in Tindale and Coverdale.

There is an allusion to the custom of the Jews (prevalent also among the Greeks and Romans) of passing their wines (which in the southern countries might easily receive gnats, and indeed breed insects) through a strainer. See Amos vi. 6. The Jews did it from religious scruples (the κώνωψ or culx vinarius being unclean) the Gentiles, from cleanliness. The ratio significatiois arises as follows. The term signifies to pass any liquid through a strainer (ὀδοντιον). See Dioscor. iii. 9. v. 82), to separate it from the ὕλη, or material particles (gnats, or aught else) that they may be passed out and off. With respect to κάμηλον, it signifies, not a camel, nor a beetle (as some would take it), but a camel. To make the opposition as strong as may be, two things are selected as opposite as possible, the smallest insect, and the largest animal. This sort of expression was in use both with the Jewish and the Grecian writers. Καταπίνω is used not of liquids only, but also of solids, as here. So Galen often says, καταπίνω τὰ σιτία. And so Aristotle and Plato. It may be rendered, to bolt down. So Horat. Sermon. ii. 8. 21, ridiculus totas simul ad- | sordere placentas.

25. καθαρίζετε—παροψίδος.] On the purification of domestic utensils, see Horne's Introduction.

— ἔσωθεν δὲ γέμουσι, &c.] There is here a blending of the comparison with the thing compared: the sense, withdrawing the figure, being, that their repasts are furnished by means of rapine and injustice.

— ἀδικίας.] This, for the common reading ἀκρασίας, is found in the greater part of the MSS., and many Versions and Fathers; and is added by Matthæi, Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, Fritz, and Scholz,—rightly; since the internal evidence for it, too, is as strong as the external; for it suits far better with the character of the Pharisees, who (as Campbell observes) are never accused of intemperance, though often of injustice.

26. Φαρισαῖε τυφλέ.] Used in a generic sense (for the sake of more pointed application, individually) as in Joseph. Ant. xviii. 1. 8, προσ- | χωροῦσι δὲ (scil. οἱ Σαδδουκαῖοι) οἷς δὲ Φαρι- | σαῖοις λέγει.

παρομοιάζετε τάφους κεκονιαμένους, οἵτινες ἐξώθεν μὲν φαίνονται ὡραίοι, ἔσωθεν δὲ γέμουσιν ὀστέων νεκρῶν καὶ πάσης ἀκαθαρσίας. 27. κεκονιαμένοις.] In order to see the force of κονιάω, it is to be remembered, that the Jewish tombs were annually whitewashed, that their situation might be known, and the pollution of touching them avoided. This whitening, we learn, extended as far on the surface of the ground, as the vault reached under ground. The sense is, that 'the Pharisees were so polluted with vice, that they defiled all who had communication with them, and were to be avoided like sepulchres whitened with κονία,' the dust of slacked lime. Or it may imply a coating with plaster, as in two passages of Pausanias and Æsop adduced by me in Recens. Synop. In the parallel passage of Luke xi. 44, they are likened to μνημεῖα ἀσθηλά (see Note in loc.); yet there is, in fact, no discrepancy, but reference is had to the contagion they spread around them.

— ἀκαθαρσίας.] Used as in the Schol. on Soph. Phil., who explains the words ράκη βαρπίας νοηλίας πλῆα by πεπληρωμένα—τῆς ἐκ νόσου ἀκαθαρσίας, i. e. pus and bloody matter. Thus it was thought to communicate a defilement to any place. See 2 Kings xxiii. 14. And so Joseph. Ant. xvii. 2, the Samaritans are said to have scattered men's bones in the Temple, διὰ τὸν ἀνθρωποκτονίαν ὅσων ποιοῦνται.

29. οἰκοδομεῖτε—κοσμεῖτε.] Both the Jews and the Heathens alike showed their respect for the illustrious dead, by repairing and beautifying, and, when necessary, rebuilding their tombs, and also by decorating them with garlands, or other ornaments; which is called in the Classical writers στεφανῶσαι τὸν τάφον. See the proofs and illustrations in Rec. Syn. 'This,' as Kuinoel observes, 'our Lord did not mean to censure, but to expose the hypocrisy of the Pharisees in pretending a respect for the Prophets which they did not feel.'

30. ἡμεθα.] This reading (for the common one ἡμεν) is found in most of the best MSS., in some Fathers, and in the Ed. Princ.; and was, with reason, edited by Matthæi, Griesbach, and others down to Scholz.

31. ὥστε μαρτυρεῖτε ἰ., &c.] Meaning, 'ye have the same bloodthirsty disposition as, and thus show approbation of, your forefathers' crimes, by pursuing the same course; as it is said in the parallel passage of Luke xi. 48, ἀρα μαρτυρεῖτε καὶ συνυδοκεῖτε τοῖς ἔργοις τῶν πατέρων ὑμῶν, where the ὅτι must not be rendered although (as some translate), but has the sense qualenus.

Thus we see the inferential force of ὥστε, which is as follows: So then [by this conduct, so similar to that of your fathers], ye bear testimony respecting yourselves, that ye are true sons of your fathers, who murdered the prophets, as it is said Matt. xxiii. 37, Ἰερουσαλὴμ, ἡ ἀποκτείνουσα τοὺς προφῆτας. On the force of the expression ὅτι υἱοὶ ἐστέ, &c., see Notes on Matt. v. 45, and John viii. 44. So the Jews, Joseph. Ant. xvii. 11, 2, complaining of the conduct of Archelaus, son of Herod I., say, οὐχ Ἡρώδου γνήσιος πιστεύοιτο υἱός. Most recent Commentators, indeed, explain μαρτυρ. ἑαυτοῖς, 'ye bear testimony against yourselves.' But there is no sufficient reason to deviate from the common version unto, i. e. respecting yourselves.

32. πληρώσατε τὸ μέτρον τ. π. ὅ.] This may, with many of the best Commentators, ancient and modern, be accounted an ironical permission, often occurring in Scripture; such as indignantly leaves the persons addressed to experience the consequences of their wilfulness. So Josephus, Ant. xvii. 9, 5, after mentioning a great enormity of Archelaus in the massacre of 3000 persons in the Temple, says it was done ὅπως δυνηθείη πληρῶσαι τῆς φύσεως τυραννίδος τὴν πᾶσιν ἀνθρώποις μεμνημένην ἀδικίας. On this 'measure unfulfilled,' see Grotius and Wetstein, who show that the language seems to imply that there is a certain height to which the iniquity of nations and individuals is permitted by God to rise; and that when that measure is full, the punishment is inflicted: also that though the vengeance of the Almighty be slow, it is always sure,—compensating for long-delayed vengeance by the severity of the stroke. See Plutarch de sera Numinis vindictâ. Comp. 1 Thess. ii. 16. Wied. 19. 4.

33. ὄφεικετε—ἐχιδνῶν.] See iii. 7; and on τῆς γέννης, see Note on ver. 15. Φύγητε for φεύγεσθε; the later writers imitating the Poetic idiom of using the Subjunctive for the Future, which is generally thought a solecism, though defended by Fritz. in loc.

34. διὰ τοῦτο.] On the force of this formula the Commentators are divided in opinion. Most recent Expositors consider it as merely a form of transition; as ἐν τούτῳ or ἐπὶ τούτῳ in Matt.

xiii. 52. xxii. 31. Mark xii. 24. We may, however, with Euthym. and Fritz., refer it to ver. 32, εἰσὶν (says Euthym.) μίλλαι πληρῶσαι τὸ μέτρον τῆς κακίας τῶν πατέρων ὑμῶν.

— προφῆτας—γραμματεῖς.] Our Lord here applies to his Apostles and their successors the titles given by the Jews to their prophets and doctors; intimating that his messengers (so called in Luke xi. 49.), would be as entitled to the appellation προφῆτας (in the sense, Divine Legates and inspired interpreters of the will of God) as were the prophets of old; and would likewise be entitled to the appellations σοφοὺς, σοφῶν, and γραμματεῖς ῥῶν, as being thoroughly conversant in the Scriptures and Divine learning.

— ἐξ αὐτῶν.] Sub. τινάς. Ἀποκτενεῖτε. See Acts vii. 59. xii. 2.

— σταυρώσετε.] Though there is no evidence of the crucifixion of any Christian teacher much before the destruction of Jerusalem; yet the silence of history (so exceedingly brief as it has come down to us) is no proof that there were none such.

— μαστιγώσετε.] See x. 17. Acts xxii. 19.

35. ὅπως. Render, not ut, but ut, or hoc modo ut. Fritz. well expresses the sense of the passage thus: 'Vos omnino ita agitis, ut videamini in id unicum intenti, ut omnis sanguinis justique insonitis culpam soli sustineatis.' Αἷμα δίκαιον, for τὸ αἷμα τῶν δικαίων, as Luke xi. 50, τὸ αἷμα τῶν προφητῶν. By ἔλθῃ ἐφ' ὑμᾶς is meant figuratively, 'come against you as a witness, and convict you of being its cause.' A similar mode of expression is adduced by Wets. from Xenoph., ἤξειν μίλλοντα ἐγκλήματα ἐφ' ἡμᾶς. Ἐκχυνόμενον is, as Fritz. remarks, to be taken generally, so as to include both past, present, and future.

— Ζαχαρίου—Βαραχίου.] There has been much dispute as to the person here meant by our Lord. The various opinions are detailed and reviewed by Kuinoel and Fritz. The two alone worthy of remark are, that it was Zechariah, or one of the Minor Prophets. But as there is no historical testimony that Zechariah was murdered, most of the recent Commentators are of opinion that the person meant is that Zacharias, the High Priest,—who, for his having reproved the iniquities of the Jewish people, was, by the order of King Josiah, slain between the sanctuary and the altar of whole burnt offerings. And though this Josiah be called son of Jehoiada, yet it was not unfrequent among the Jews to bear two names; especially when, as in the present case, the names were of the same meaning.

— θυσιαστηρίου.] 'the altar for holocausts,' which stood in the Court of the Priests, before the entrance of the ναός.

36. ὅτι.] This is found in most of the best MSS. and some Versions and Fathers, with the Ed. Princ., and has been adopted by almost every Editor from Bengel to Scholz.

— ἤξει—ταύτην.] By ταῦτα πάντα are meant 'all these crimes;' and ἤκειν, or, as in the former verse, ἔλθῃ ἐπὶ τινα here signifies 'to come upon any one,' 'to be visited upon any one,' namely, to bring down punishment on his head.

37. Our Lord here, I apprehend, turns from the Scribes and Pharisees to the people at large, the οἱ ὄχλοι mentioned at xxiii. 1.

— ἡ ἀποκτείνουσα.] Erasmus well points out the permanent action (as referring alike to past, present, and future) denoted by this use of the present tense.

— αὐτήν.] for ἐαυτήν or σεαυτήν. So I read, instead of the Stephanic αὐτήν, with the Edit. Princ., Beza, Schmid, Griesbach, and Fritz. There is no occasion to recur to the figure whereby a transition is made from the second to the third person; which would here be very awkward.

— τέκνα.] The word is often used thus, figuratively, of the inhabitants of a city, both in the Scriptural and the Classical writers.

— ἐπισυναγαγεῖν.] The ἐπι is not, as the Commentators imagine, pleonastic, but signifies to: the meaning being 'to draw together to any one.' A metaphor derived from a hen's sheltering her brood under her wings; with which have been compared various passages of the Greek Poets; the most apposite is from Eurip. Herc. Fur. 71, οἱ Ἑρακλείοι παῖδες, οὗν ὑπὸ πτερύγεσσιν ἑσπόμενοι, ὅρνε ὡς, ὀφειμένην.

— ἠθελήσατε.] The plural here has reference to the plural ἱμῶν in Ἱερουσαλὴμ, which means inhabitants of Jerusalem, an idiom frequent both in the Scriptural and Classical writers.

38. ἀφίεται ἱερουσόμ.] Prophetic present put for future. I would compare Josephus, Bell. i. 32. 2, δαίμων τις ἐξερρημὸς τὸν ἱερὸν οἶκον.

— οἶκος.] Commentators are not agreed whether this is to be taken of the Temple, or of the whole Jewish nation, especially its metropolis; as in Latin domus for patria. And yet where, it may be asked, is the Temple called their house? Wherever it is called house, it is God's house. Whereas the expression house of Israel, and house of Judah, and David for Judaea, is frequent in the New Test., and occurs also at Matt. x. 6. And when we consider that the sense is more extensive (so as to include the other) and better suited to the context, there is every reason to prefer it. Such, indeed, is undoubtedly the meaning, if, as seems highly probable, our Lord had here in mind the words of David, Ps. lxxix. 26: 'Let their habitation be void;' which is confirmed by the Psalm's having reference to the sufferings of Christ at the hands of the Jews, and is also proved by Luke xxi. 20, ὅταν δὲ ἴδῃτε κυκλομένην ὑπὸ στρατοκρίδων τὴν Ἱερουσαλήμ, τότε γινώτε ὅτι ἤγγικεν ἡ ἐρήμωσις αὐτῆς.

39. οὐ μὴ με ἴδῃτε—Κυρίου.] Some Commentators think that by this our Lord meant to predict his removal from them, until the destruction of Jerusalem; which is in the next Chapter designated under the name of 'the coming of the Lord.' And they render the words ἕως ἂν εἴπητε, 'until ye might say,' i. e. 'would have reason to say.' There is indeed something to countenance this view in the actual state of Judaea at that period, as recorded by Josephus, Bell. J. vii. 36. But such a sense of ἕως ἂν εἴπητε is strained; and the interpretation is otherwise liable to some serious objections. Greatly preferable is that of Chrysost. and others, who take the coming here spoken of to mean the second coming of our Lord to judgment at the end of the world. Thus by ye will be meant the Jewish nation. That the great bulk of the Jews will, ere that awful catastrophe, be brought to acknowledge that Messiah whom their ancestors rejected, we are taught by the sure word of prophecy. See Grotius, Doddridge, and Scott. Those who adopt this interpretation maintain that ἀπ' ἄρτι should be rendered 'after a while,' i. e. after the ascension. But that sense is destitute of proof, and indeed unnecessary, if ἴδῃτε be taken (with Koehler) of familiar intercourse as a teacher; for our Lord had, with the present address, closed his public ministry. Εὐλογημένος ἐν ὀνόμ. K. &c., was the form by which the Messiah (usually styled ὁ ἐρχόμενος, &c.) was to be addressed at his coming.

XXIV. 1. Our Lord having finally departed from the Temple, and closed his public ministry with the awful reproofs and predictions of the present Chapter, his disciples, adverting to what he had said, were pointing with wonder and pride to the magnificent stones of the Temple, and seemed to say, 'Is it possible that such a noble edifice should be utterly destroyed?' Indeed, the destruction of the Temple was, in the minds of the Jews, viewed as coeval only with the end of the world, or at least that modification in its constitution, which they supposed would take place at the coming of the Messiah.

2. εἶπεν αὐτοῖς.] Mark makes the words an answer to an address of one of the disciples, Διδάσκαλε, ἴδε ποταποὶ λίθοι καὶ ποταπαὶ οἰκοδομαί. In the passage of Luke it is: τίνας λιγόντων περὶ τοῦ ἱεροῦ, ὅτι λίθοις καλοῖς καὶ ἀναθήμασι κακίσμηται, εἶπε, &c.

—οὐ βλέπετε.] Several MSS. and Versions are without the οὐ, which is marked as probably to be omitted by Griesb. and others, and cancelled by Fritz. But the MS. evidence for it is incomparably stronger than that against it; and had it not been in the text from the first, who would have thought of inserting it? for, when away, the same sense arises. But why (it may be asked) should the οὐ have been removed? I answer, because it is not employed agreeably to the Classical usage, and because it is not found in the parallel passage of Mark. The μὴ just after, in the last clause of the sentence, is justly rejected, on the strongest evidence, external and internal, by the unanimous voice of the Editors and Critics. It probably arose from the οὐ μὴ just before.

—οὐ μὴ ἀφεθῇ ὧδε λίθος ἐπὶ λίθον.] A proverbial and seemingly hyperbolical expression, denoting utter destruction; but which was, as we find from Josephus (Bell. Jud. vii. 1, 1,) Eusebius, and the Rabbinical writers, fulfilled almost to the letter. See Luke xix. 43, 44. The words ὅτι οὐ καταλυθήσεται are added, to strengthen the preceding. And καταλ. has reference to the dissolution of the cement of the stones, and perhaps to the iron fastenings soldered with lead. (See Josephus, p. 702. J. and Thucyd. i. 93.) So Catullus, cited by Wets. 'Urbis Dardanias Neptunea solvere vincula.'

Thus, as in the building of the Temple, stone was said to be put upon stone (Hag. ii. 15.), so, in the destruction, it is predicted that one stone shall not be left upon another. (Comp. 1 Kings ix. 7. Mic. iii. 12. Jer. xxvi. 18.)

3. πότε ταῦτα ἔσται;—τοῦ αἵματος.] The Commentators are much divided in opinion as to the intent of this inquiry; and not less than four different hypotheses of interpretation have been propounded. The 1st confines the inquiry to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem. The 2d extends it to two questions, and includes the second advent of Christ in the regeneration, according to the Jewish expectation. The 3d, instead of the second, substitutes the last advent of Christ at the end of the world, and the general judgment. The 4th (to use the words of Dr. Hales, who adopts it), 'unites all the preceding into three questions: the 1st, relating to the destruction of Jerusalem; the 2d, to our Lord's second appearance in glory at the restitution of all things, Acts iii. 21; the 3d, to the general judgment at the end of the world.' 'The inquiry (continues he) involves three questions: 1. When shall these (things) be? and the sign when they shall happen? 2. And what the sign of thy presence? and 3. What the sign when all these things shall be concluded, or of the conclusion of the world?' Mr. Townsend (in common with Chrysostom, Euthymius, and many ancient Interpreters, and also the most eminent modern ones) embraces the first (or rather second) hypothesis. 'From their question (he says) it appears that the disciples viewed the coming of Christ and the end of the world or age, as events nearly related, and which would indisputably take place together (and used the expression συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος to designate both. Ed.); they had no idea of the dissolution of the Jewish polity, as really signified by, or included in, either of these events. They imagined, perhaps, a great and awful change in the physical constitution of the universe, which they probably expected would occur within the term of their own lives; but they could have no conception of what was really meant by the expression which they employed, the coming of Christ. The coming of Christ, and the end of the world, being therefore only different expressions to denote the same period as the destruction of Jerusalem, the purport of the disciples' question plainly is, When shall the destruction of Jerusalem be, and what shall be the signs of it? The latter part of the question is the first answered; and our Saviour foretels, in the clearest manner, the signs of his coming, and the destruction of Jerusalem. He then passes on to the other part of the question, concerning the time of his coming.'

It is no easy matter to decide on the comparative claims of these two views, which are manifestly the best founded of the four. If we were to advert simply to the intent of the inquiry of the Apostles, and trace the remarkable fulfilment of the following predictions, even in minute circumstances, we could scarcely, I think, fail to give the preference to the latter. But Dr. Hales's has much to recommend it, in the strong bearing which very many passages have on the last advent and the final judgment; while Mr. Townsend's is too limited, by making our Lord's words only an answer to the inquiries of the Apostles; indeed, scarcely so much: since their third question must, by implication, be understood to have reference to that regeneration, renovation, or restitution of all things, according to their views. See Note on παλιγγενεσία supra xix. 28, and comp. Acts iii. 21. and Rom. viii. 19. Whereas there is no difficulty in supposing that our Lord, finding that the disciples had pointed to the Temple, in order to draw from him some more explicit declaration respecting the utter destruction, and in their questions had wished for more information than they ventured directly to ask, was pleased not only to answer their question, but to give them such further information, on an awful topic closely connected with that of their inquiry, as would be most important, both for them to know, and, through them, his disciples of every age. So that, as the prediction concerning the destruction of the Temple arose naturally out of the train of passing circumstances, so, it should seem, did the awful predictions in this and the next Chapter arise out of the limited interrogatories of the Apostles. It may be observed, that the information as to the last advent and general judgment being superadded to the information in reply to their question, is, as might be expected, in a great degree, given last (xxv. 31-46); yet there are many allusions to it in the preceding matter, which chiefly concerns the event of the second advent to judgment; and in some passages the two predictions are so closely interwoven together, and the expressions and imagery are so applicable to the day of judgment, that we might almost say that a kind of secondary sense must be admitted; which, as Mr. Horne has observed, is not unfrequently found in the prophetic writings, where two subjects, a principal and a subordinate one, are carried on together. This principle will, if I mistake not, afford a clue to guide us in our greatest difficulties as to the interpretation of this obscure and mysterious portion of Scripture.

4. βλῑτ. μὴ τις πλαν.] A form of earnest caution, as in Eph. v. 6. Col. ii. 8. 2 Thess. ii. 3.

5. ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματί μου] i. e. assuming the name and character of Messiah. Between these and the false prophets at ver. 11, a distinction must be made. Of the former were Simon Magus, Dositheus, and Menander, and perhaps those adverted to by Joseph. B. J. i. 2. Of the latter were Theudas, Barchochebas the Egyptian, and many other impostors mentioned by Josephus. Luke adds another circumstance: καὶ ὁ καιρὸς ἥγγικε.

6. πολέμους.] Wetstein cites, in illustration, Joseph. Ant. 18, 9, 1, and on ἀκούε πολλ. Joseph. Ant. 20, 3, 3, 4, 2; Bell. Jud. 2, 16, 1, 1, 2. [Comp. Jer. iv. 27; v. 10, 18.]

earlier modern Commentators to the counsel of God, who permits evil, to educe good therefrom. But it is better, with most recent Interpreters, to take the expression as only denoting the certainly of the events predicted,—the final catastrophe of Jerusalem. I would compare Polyæn. i. 32. 2. ἀνάγκη γὰρ αὐτὰ συμβαίνειν. Soph. Phil. 1338. λέγει σαφῶς, ὡς δεῖ γενέσθαι ταῦτα. Τὸ τέλος is equivalent to συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος at ver. 3. Wetstein compares Hom. Il. β. 122. τέλος δ' οὐπω τι πέφανται.

7. ἔγερθήσεται.—ἔθνος.] This is referred by Grotius, Wetstein, and Kypke, to those various wars and civil commotions with which most parts of the civilized world were then convulsed. [Comp. 2 Esd. xiii. 31.]

—λιμοὶ καὶ λοιμοί.] The words are often found conjoined in a context similar to the present; and no wonder,—pestilence usually succeeding famine (to the citations from Quint. Curt. ix. 16, and Hesiod. Op. 240, adduced by Wetstein, may be added Thucyd. i. 28.),—insomuch that κατὰ λιμὸν λοιμὸς grew to a proverb. See Thucyd. ii. 54.

—σεισμοί.] Some understand the expression metaphorically, of civil commotions. And so we find added in the passage of Mark, καὶ παραχαί. But though such there doubtless will be, the term is, I conceive, to be understood literally; for, from the passages adduced by Wetstein and Kuinoel, it appears that earthquakes were then very prevalent; and such were ever regarded as portents, presaging public calamity and distress. So Herodot. vi. 98, cited by Wetstein: Δήλος ἐκινήθη—μεχρὶ ἐμοῦ οὐ σισθεῖσα,—καὶ τοῦτο μὲν κεν τίρας ἀνθρώποισι τῶν μελλόντων ἔσεσθαι κακῶν ἔφηκε ὁ Θεός. Plin. Hist. Nat. ii. 86. Thus it is added in the passage of Luke: φοβητρά τε καὶ σημεῖα ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ μεγάλα ἔσται. [Comp. 2 Esd. xv. 16.]

—κατὰ τόπους.] The earlier Commentators interpret 'in divers places'; but the recent ones, after Beza, 'every where,' by an ellipsis of ἑκάστους. And this method is supported by some of the ancient Versions. Perhaps, however, the true sense is throughout, place by place, 'in various places.' The words are to be referred, not to σεισμοί only, but also to λιμοὶ καὶ λοιμοί. [Comp. 2 Esd. xv. 5. Jerem. xiv. 12.]

8. πάντα δι—ὧδίνων.] We must here suppose an ellipse of μόνον, as well as the usual one ἔσται; q. d. 'these are only the prelude of sorrows.' So Eurip. Med. 60. ἐν ἀρχῇ πῆμα, καὶ οὐδέπω μισοί. ὧδίν is here (as often in the Sept. and Classical writers) used of severe affliction; lit. throes. [Comp. 2 (or 4th) Esdr. xiv. 6.] Mark adds a yet more strongly expressive caution: βλέπετε δὲ ὑμεῖς ἑαυτοὺς.

9. Our Lord apprizes them what evil treatment they would have to suffer from the enemies of the Gospel, and what difficulties from its pretended friends. Their trials from without are adverted to, v. 9—11, and Luke xxi. 17—19; those from within here at v. 12.

—τότε.] This may, as Rosenmuller suggests, be taken in a lax sense, for circa ista tempora; since the events which follow happened partly before the above-mentioned calamities, and partly at the same time with them.

—παραδώσουσιν ὑ. εἰς θλίψιν.] Θλίψις properly signifies compression, and fig. constraint, oppression, affliction. Here and Acts xi. 19, it denotes persecution; meaning that of bonds: as it is said in the passage of Luke: παραδίδοντας εἰς φυλάκας, carceres. [Comp. supra x. 17. John xv. 20, and Jerem. xv. 4.]

—μισούμενοι ὑπὸ πάντων τῶν ἐθνῶν] i. e. 'ye shall be objects of hatred to all nations.' The hostile feeling of the Gentiles to Christians is plain from various passages of the Classical writers. The true reason for this Bp. Warburton (Div. Leg., vol. ii. lib. ii. § 6.) has shown to be this, — that 'while the different Pagan religions sociably agreed with each other, the Gospel taught Christians not only, like the Jews, to bear their testimony to the falsehood of them all,—but also zealously and earnestly to urge on men the renunciation of them as a matter of absolute necessity, and as requiring them, under the most tremendous penalties, to embrace the Christian religion.'

—τῶν ἐθνῶν.] The τῶν is omitted in the common text; but it has place in very many MSS. and all the Editions up to the Elzevir (in which Wets. thinks it was omitted by a typographical error), and has been restored by Bengel, Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, Fritz., and Scholz; rightly, I think: for internal as well as external evidence is in its favour; since it was more likely to be omitted than added. Neither the τῶν nor the ἐθνῶν are found in Mark and Luke. Διὰ τὸ ὄνομά μου, 'for the sake of [their profession of] my religion.' Comp. John xv. 20. xvi. 2. The correspondence of the expressions in this and the following verses up to ver. 13, to facts recorded in history, has been pointed out by Wetstein and others.

10. Of the expressions in this verse, σκανδ. must be understood of apostasy (as that of Phygellus, Hermogenes, and Demas), and παραδ. of the betraying of their former partners in the faith. Μισήσ. ἀλλ. seems to have reference to that hatred which would be, as is usually the case, borne by the apostates to their former companions, even when they did not betray them.

11. ψευδοπροφ. namely, in the primary ap- plication, persons pretending to a Divine commission to preach deliverance and freedom from the Roman yoke; in the secondary, false teachers. [Comp. supra vii. 15.]

12. διὰ τὸ πληθυνθῆναι τὴν ἀνομίαν] 'and because of the prevalence of lawlessness and iniquity of every kind.' It seems better to assign this general sense to ἀνομίαν, than any of the particular ones which are given by one or other of the Commentators. And thus it may include all the preceding.

— ψυγήσεται ἡ ἀγάπη τ. π.] 'the love of most will grow cold.' By ἀγάπη here some understand the love of God and zeal for religion; others, mutual love. The latter sense is generally adopted by the ancient and some eminent modern Commentators, and is very agreeable to the usus loquendi. And most true it is, that, as iniquity abounds, the exercise of love to mankind will abate; all kindly feeling being absorbed in selfish considerations: and hence the ἀστοργία ascribed by St. Paul to the heathens. The former interpretation, however (equally admitted by the usage of Scripture; ex. gr. Gal. v. 6. πίστις δι' ἀγάπης ἐνεργουμένη.) is so strongly supported by the context as to be preferable. That the ardour of many in the cause of Christ was, from these causes, much abated, is certain from Rev. ii. & iii.; and we might infer it from the fact of the defection in several Churches, attested in Gal. iii. 1. seq. 2 Thess. iii. 1. seq. 2 Tim. i. 15. Heb. x. 25. It should seem, however, that the fulfilment of this prediction is chiefly to be sought in the circumstances which shall precede the second advent of our Lord to judgment. And there is little reason to doubt that it has been fulfilling for the last century, in the increase of infidelity and heresy. See Bp. Warburton's 32d Sermon, on this text.

13. ὁ δὲ ὑπομείνας εἰς τέλος.] This many understand of the end of the Jewish economy, and the destruction of Jerusalem, rendering, 'shall be saved from the ruin which shall overwhelm the inhabitants of Jerusalem.' And, indeed, Ecclesiastical history informs us, that few or no Christians perished in Jerusalem at that catastrophe; they having timely abandoned the city. The passage of Luke xxi. 18, 19. (where it is added, 'there shall not an hair of your head perish') is also in favour of that view. But though such may be admitted, agreeably to the primary application (alone adverted to in Luke), yet the air of the present passage rather requires the secondary application, by which ὑπομ. εἰς τέλος is taken of continued perseverance in Christian faith and practice, and σωθ. of salvation: a view of the sense unanimously adopted by Rosenm., Kuinoel, and Fritz. [Comp. Rev. ii. 10. Dan. xii. 12.]

the Roman Empire; for which signification of οἰκουμένη there is good authority. But as this is scarcely reconcilable with the words following, πᾶσι τοῖς ἔθνεσι, and since there is reason to think that Christianity had, at the period in question, been promulgated in countries which formed no part of the Roman Empire (see Whitby and Doddridge), it may be better to retain the ordinary sense of the expression; understanding, by a slight hyperbole, the greater part of the then known world. [Comp. Rom. i. 8. x. 18.]

— εἰς μαρτύριον πᾶσι τοῖς ἔθνεσι] namely, as some Commentators explain, 'that the offer of salvation had been made to the Jews'; by the rejection of which they had drawn down vengeance on their heads: or rather, according to others, 'in order that all nations may know and be able to testify'; i. e. that the Jews had filled up the measure of their iniquity and obstinacy by rejecting the proffered salvation, both spiritual and temporal. Or it may simply mean, as a testimony that the Jewish economy was at an end, and the Christian dispensation established instead. And that τέλος must principally mean this, is plain from Luke xxi. 31. But as far as the prediction has reference to the second advent of Christ, it will require another sense, on which see Poole's Syn.

15. τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως.] See Dan. ix. 27; xii. 11. Here βδέλγ. has (by Hebraism) the force of an adjective; as in Luke i. 48, ταπεινώσεις τὴν δούλην, for δούλη ταπεινή. The sense is, the abomination causing desolation; 'the abominable desolation'; i. e. the Roman army; always abominable, as composed of heathens, and carrying idolatrous standards; but then abominably desolating, as being both invaders and destroyers.

— ἐν τόπῳ ἁγίῳ.] Most Commentators, from Grotius downwards, explain this 'on holy ground.' But Bp. Middleton has shown that this interpretation is ungrounded; for the phrase occurs elsewhere in the New Test. only at Acts vi. 13. xxi. 28, where it can alone be understood of the Temple. In the Sept. it is often used, and always of the Temple, sometimes the Sanctum Sanctorum. There is therefore no reason to abandon the ancient and common interpretation, 'in the Holy place,' [properly so called,] which is required by the parallel passage in Mark xiii. 14, and is confirmed by the history of the completion of the prophecy in Josephus.

— ὁ ἀναγινώσκων ν.] These words are by most supposed to be our Lord's, and meant to fix the attention of his hearers. But the best recent Commentators, with reason, consider them as a parenthetical admonition of the Evangelist, and perhaps founded on Daniel ix. 25, καὶ γνώσῃ καὶ διανοηθήσῃ. Νοεῖν signifies properly to turn is mind, and, from the adjunct, to attend.

He might have added Ps. cxxi. 12.

17. ἐπὶ τοῦ δώματος, &c.] In this and the two following verses we have some proverbial (and perhaps hyperbolic) forms of expression, denoting the imminency of the danger, and the necessity of the speediest flight. To understand these words ἐπὶ τοῦ δώματος μὴ κατ., we must remember that it has ever been customary in the East to build the houses with flat roofs, provided with a staircase both inside and outside; i. e. at the street. By the latter way (or, as others suppose, over the roofs of the neighbouring houses, and so to the city wall) their flight is recommended to be taken.

— τὰ.] This (instead of the common reading τῷ), is found in all the best MSS. and the ancient Edd. confirmed by the Syr. and Coptic Versions, and many Fathers. It has also been approved by almost all the recent Editors, and received from Matthæi down to Scholz: with reason; for the common reading arose from ignorance of the nature of the more recondite expression τὰ ἐκ τ. ο., which (as Fritz. well remarks), is put for ἄραι τὰ ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ ἐκ τῆς οἰκίας αὐτοῦ. The ἐπὶ in ἐπιστρεφέτω has reference to οἰκίαν, which may be taken from the preceding οἰκίας. By τὰ ἱμάτια are meant the upper garments; (the cloak and coat) which husbandmen of the Southern countries have ever, when at work, laid aside, or left at home: who are then said to be γυμνοί. So Hesiod. Op. ii. 9. Γυμνὸν σπείρου, γυμνὸν δὲ βουταῖν, Γυμνὸν δ' ἀμᾶσθαι. Virg. Georg. i. 239.

19. οὐαὶ δὲ ταῖς—ἡμέραις.] In the passage of Luke is added the reason for earnest precaution; ἔσται γὰρ ἀνάγκη μεγάλη ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, καὶ ὁργὴ ἐν τῷ λαῷ τούτῳ. The prediction was (as the records of history testify) amply fulfilled.

20. προσεύχ. δὲ, &c.] A figurative mode of representing the nature of the calamity; namely, that it would be such, that they would have reason to pray for any circumstance which might mitigate its severity. [Comp. Luke xxi. 23, 24.]

— μηδὲ σαββάτῳ.] Because then, from the inclemency of the weather, and the bad state of the roads, travelling was very difficult; since no traveller was permitted by the Jewish Law [founded on Exod. xvi. 29.] (which was observed by the Christians in Judæa long after the time of the destruction of Jerusalem) to proceed further than five furlongs on that day.

The ἐν is not found in the greater part of the MSS., the Edit. Princ., and some Fathers; and is cancelled or rejected by almost every Editor from Bengel to Scholz; perhaps rightly; for internal as well as external evidence is against it. Yet it is defended by xii. 2.

21. οἷα οὐ γέγονεν—νῦν.] The best Commentators agree in considering this as a proverbial and somewhat hyperbolic mode of expressing what is exceedingly great, as Exod. x. 14; xl. 6. Dan. xii. 1. Joel ii. 2. Yet such were the atrocities and horrors of the siege of Jerusalem, that the words may admit of the most literal acceptance. The triple negative is most strongly emphatic. So. Heb. xiii. 6. οὐ μὴ σὺ δαῶ, οὐδ' οὐ μὴ σὺ ἐγκαταλίπῃς. See also Rev. xiii. 14. At ἔσται τοῦ νῦν sub. χρόνον. Νῦν for τότε is a rare use; but very agreeable to the nature and origin of the word; which being derived from νῦν (cognate with νύσσω) significa, 1. punctum; 2. punctum temporis; especially as said of time present. But when spoken narratively of a thing yet future as if past, it must bear a past sense.

22. εἰ μὴ ἐκολ.] Κολοβός signifies, prop., to amputate, and, as applied to time, to shorten. So Malela, p. 237 (cited by Wetstein), τοῦ αὐτοῦ μηνὸς τὰς ἡμέρας ἐκολόβωσαν. How the days were shortened, we find from Josephus; whence we learn that many incidental causes combined, under Divine Providence, towards bringing about the event in question, and the deliverance.

— οὐ πᾶσα σὰρξ.] A Hebraism for οὐδὲ τις. How literally this was fulfilled, we learn from Josephus, from whom it appears that if the siege had lasted out a little longer, the whole nation must have been destroyed. He says it was a proverbial expression in the mouths of all who escaped: εἰ μὴ ταχέως ἀπωλόμην, οὐκ ἂν ἐσώθημην.

— τοὺς ἐκλεκτοὺς.] Meaning, the Jewish Christians then in Judæa; and, in the secondary sense, the truly pious. See Note supra xx. 16. Grotius, Markl., Kuinool, and Fritz. observe, that there is here an allusion to the very ancient opinion, that in some cases of national calamity, public destruction is averted by Providence, lest the righteous should suffer with the wicked. See Gen. xviii. 23.

23. [Comp. Luke xvii. 23. xxi. 8.]
 24. ψευδόχριστοι καὶ ψευδοπροφῆ.] Such as Theudas, the son of Judas the Galilean, and others mentioned by Josephus.

— δώσουσι σημεῖα μαγ. καὶ τέρα.] An interesting question here arises, whether these σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα were really performed, or merely professed. The ancient and early modern Commentators, together with some recent ones, adopt the former opinion; ascribing the deeds to diabolical agency. The latter view is taken by most recent Commentators; who refer to a similar use of διδόσκειν in Deut. xiii. 1. 1 Kings xiii. 3, 5. They may be supposed to have been chiefly various deceptions of pretended magic produced by optical deception, simulated cures of disorders founded in artful collusion, &c. (see Hibbert on Apparitions, and Sir W. Scott on Magic); and such, in the words of St. Paul, 2 Thess. ii. 9, as were produced, κατ' ἐνέργειαν τοῦ Σατανᾶ, ἐν πάσῃ δυνάμει, καὶ σημείοις καὶ τέρασι ψεύδους.

— εἰ δυνατὸν.] This expression here does not imply impossibility, but only extreme difficulty in the performance of what is possible. (See Matt. xvi. 39. Acts xx. 16. Rom. xii. 18.)

26. ἐστὶ.] Supply αὐτὸς or ἐκείνος (q. d. 'you know who'), namely, the Messiah. Comp. Luke xvii. 23. There is something graphic in this use of the pronoun for the appellative; which, though it had been long generally adopted of that great Personage, who was the object of universal expectation; yet in this case it would be employed by the lurking adherents of false Christs.

— ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ.] The very place where (as we find from Josephus) these impostors usually started up and abode.

— ἐν τοῖς ταμείοις.] This is not to be taken, with most Commentators, as plural for singular; but, as Schleus. and Fritz. rightly observe, the term is to be considered as denoting a genus;—q. d. He is in the kind of places called ταμεία (i. e. secret apartments); namely, in one or other of them.

27. Ὡσπερ γὰρ ἡ ἀστραπὴ—οὕτως, &c.] By this exquisite simile is represented the suddenness, celerity, and unexpectedness of Christ's advent to take vengeance on the Jews; also, some think, there is an allusion to the rapidity of the approaches of the Roman armies, and the direction of their course, from West to East. At ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν sub. ἰδίου, (which is expressed in Soph. Œd. C. 1245, εἰ μιν ἀπ' ἀλλοῦ δυσμῶν, εἰ δ' ἀνατέλλοντος.) the meaning is, 'it would be as useless to look to any particular quarter or place for his coming, as it would be to know from whence the lightning would next flash forth.' The coming here spoken of is to be understood primarily of Christ's first and figurative advent, at the destruction of Jerusalem, but also secondarily, of his final advent to judgment.

28. ὅπου γὰρ—αἵετοί.] Comp. Luke xvii. 37. The connexion of this verse with the preceding has been variously traced. But the γὰρ need not be rigorously interpreted. It may be merely illustrative. In this figurative simile (which seems founded on Job xxxix. 30, οὐ δ' ἂν ὥς τι θνήσκῃ, παραχρῆμα εὐρίσκονται scil. οἱ αἵετοί.) there seems an allusion to the certainty as well as suddenness of the destruction; the meaning being, that 'the Son of man would come (figuratively by the Roman armies) as certainly and suddenly as eagles, discerning a carcass from afar, are sure to flock around suddenly from all quarters, and pounce upon it.' To the accuracy of which representation Oriental travellers bear ample testimony. By the eagles are plainly meant the Romans,—whose standard was an eagle. Since, however, eagles, properly so called, do not feed on dead bodies,—and there were none in Palestine,—so the best Commentators suppose the bird here meant to be the Vultur percnopterus, or γυπαετός, which was by the ancients referred to the eagle genus. And assuredly the Heb. נָשׂוּ denoted not only the eagle, but the vulture. Here, indeed, the mention of the latter is as apposite as that of the former would be the reverse; γυπαετοί being proverbially fond of carcasses. See Ælian de Anim. ii. 46. By πτώμα is meant the Jewish nation, lying, like the fabled Prometheus, a miserable prey to the foes who were tearing out her vitals. Under the allusion, however, is couched a great moral truth,—that 'wherever there is flagrant impiety, thither will vengeance from heaven surely and suddenly light upon it.'

29. εὐθέως δέ, &c.] 'On this and the following verses the opinions of Commentators are much divided. The ancient and early modern ones understood the expressions literally; referring the whole to the awful events which will precede the final catastrophe of our globe, and the day of judgment; especially as in the next Chapter and other parts of Scripture the same signs are mentioned as ushering in the last great day. But from the connexion here,—especially in the parallel passages of Mark and Luke,—and from the assurance contained in them all, 'this generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled,' the most eminent of the later modern Commentators have been induced to refer the passage to the signs accompanying the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish state. 'As (say they) our Lord has from v. 15. shown by what signs his disciples might know that the destruction of the Temple and city was at hand, so now he, in prophetic imagery, depicts the total ruin of the Jewish state.' They consider the language as highly figurative, understanding by the darkening of the sun, &c. the ruin of states and great personages. The appearance of the sign of the Son of man they take to denote the subversion of the Jewish state; and the gathering together of his elect they refer to the gathering of the Christian Church out of all nations. All which is very agreeable to the Prophetic style; for as in ancient Hieroglyphic writings (observes Bp. Warburton) the sun, moon, and stars were used to represent states and empires, kings, queens, and nobility; and their eclipse or extinction denoted temporary disasters, or entire overthrow; so the Prophets, in like manner, call kings and empires by the heavenly luminaries. Stars falling from the firmament are employed to denote the destruction of the nobles and other great men. See Is. xiii. 10. xxiv. 23. li. 6. lx. 20. Ez. xxxii. 7. Dan. viii. 10. Ezech. viii. 16. Jer. iv. 23. xv. 9. Joel ii. 10, 13, 31. iii. 15. Amos viii. 9. Apoc. vi. 12, &c. Inasmuch that, in reality, the prophetic style seems to be a speaking hieroglyphic. And as our Lord here sustained the character of a prophet, so he vouchsafed to employ prophetic imagery. Of similar figurative language many examples, too, have been adduced from the Greek writers. See Wetstein. Since, however, the expressions of the present passage admit of explanation according to each of the above views, it may be safer to unite both interpretations; one, that which respects the destruction of Jerusalem, as the primary; the other, as the secondary sense, by way of accommodation, to the destruction of the universe. According to the latter view, οἱ ἀστέρες πεσοῦνται ἀπὸ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ is to be understood of the falling of the heavenly bodies from the apparent concave sphere in which they are fixed; of course producing 'darkness which may be felt.' As far as regards the former, we may compare Homer Od. v. 356. ἥλιος δὲ οὐρανοῦ ἔξαπλόωλε, καὶ δ' ἐπιδέδρομεν ἀχλὺς. Statius Theb. x. sub init. Plutarcho laxato ceciderunt sidera caelo; and, above all, Is. xxxiv. 4. (which was probably had in view by our Lord, as it was by St. John, Rev. vi. 12, 13.) καὶ ταχέσονται πᾶσαι αἱ δυνάμεις τῶν οὐρανῶν, καὶ λιγυθήσεται ὁ οὐρανὸς ὡς βιβλίον, καὶ πάντα τὰ ἀστρα πσεύτῃται, where the same double sense likewise subsists and is recognised by Bp. Lowth. Αἱ δυνάμεις τοῦ οὐρανοῦ is an expression frequent in the Sept., to denote the heavenly bodies. There is no vain repetition, but a strong emphasis intended by the expression of the same thing in other words; or there may be a hysteron-proteron; q. d. 'they will be tossed to and fro, and will then fall.' Σαλεύσθαι is used properly of the tossing to and fro of ships at anchor (see Thucyd. i. 137.); but also of any other tossing.

30. τὸ σημεῖον τοῦ Υἱοῦ τοῦ ἀνθ.] The τὸ σημεῖον is by Wolf, Rosenmüller, and Kuinzel supposed to be put pleonastically, since it is not found in Mark and Luke. But though it might be dispensed with, it adds something to the sense. We may, with some, suppose an allusion to the sign from heaven required. See supra xvi. 1. But it should rather seem that τὸ σημεῖον merely means the visible appearance; q. d. 'then shall be seen the visible appearance of the Son of man,' i. e. then shall the Son of man visibly appear (agreeably to what the Jews understood from the prophecy in Dan. viii. 13.), and shall give manifest evidences of his power, by taking vengeance on the Jews. The secondary application is obvious. In αἱ φυλαὶ τῆς γῆς, too, we may discern a double sense; the primary one to denote the inhabitants of Judea, (who would have cause enough to lament for the calamities coming upon them. See Luke xxiii. 28, and comp. Zech. xii. 12.) the secondary sense in order to intimate, that the nations of the world will wail (see Matt. xi. 17. and Note) when Christ comes to judgment. In ἐρχόμενον ἐπὶ τῶν νεφελῶν we have gorgeous imagery, seemingly assimilated to the character of Hebrew poetry, to designate majesty of approach, as referred to in δόξης πολλῆς. Yet the literal sense seems required by the assurance of the Angel at our Lord's ascension, ὁρᾶτε (meaning, in clouds) ἐλεύσεται (return) ἐν τῷ αἵματι τοῦ ἐκείνου πορευόμενος εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν· this evidently referring more especially to our Lord's coming at the last day. The expression δυνάμειος may have reference to the power manifested in the final destruction of Jerusalem, or, in the secondary sense, as shown in the destruction of the universe (2 Pet. iii. 7, 10, 12.), the raising of the dead, and the other events of the last great day, all evincing 'power and great majesty.'

31. καὶ ἀποστελεῖ τοὺς ἀγγέλους, &c.] Here, as before, much diversity of interpretation exists; which, however, might have been avoided, by a reference to the above-mentioned two-fold application, which even those who recognised it before seem here to forget. The application of the words to the final advent of our Lord (here principally intended) is too obvious to need pointing out. But neither ought the advent of our Lord at the destruction of Jerusalem to be kept out of view; for, even in that application, the words have much propriety; τοὺς ἀγγέλους αὐτοῦ denoting the preachers of the Gospel, announcing the message of salvation, and gathering those who should accept its offer from every quarter of the globe (see v. 14.) into one society under Christ, their common Head. To suppose, with most recent Commentators, that it intimates that he would send forth his angels, and by them (meaning, by his providence) gather his followers into a place of safety, involves considerable harshness; and therefore, if the first-mentioned view be not admitted, it were better to suppose that here the reference is only to the final advent.

The words μετὰ σάλπιγγος φωνῆς (to be construed μετὰ μεγάλης φωνῆς σάλπιγγος) are by most Interpreters supposed to have a reference to preaching, as compared to the sound of a trumpet; as Is. lviii. 1. Jer. vi. 17. Ez. xxxiii. 3—6. Rom. x. 18. But there should rather seem, in both the above applications, to be a reference to the method of convoking solemn assemblies among the Jews and Gentiles,—namely, by sound of trumpet. The words ἐκ τῶν τεσσ. ἀνέμων are a Hebrew formula, denoting, 'from all quarters or regions of the globe': for, according to Jewish ideas, the winds served not only to denote the cardinal points of heaven, but to mark the regions which lay in the direction of any of them. The words ἀπ' ἄκρων—αὐτῶν are also a Hebrew form, containing an emphatic repetition of the same thing. [Comp. supra xiii. 41. 1 Cor. xv. 52. 1 Thess. iv. 16.]

32. ἀπὸ δὲ τῆς συκῆς—παραβολὴν.] Παραβολὴ here (as at supra xiii. 18. and Luke xxi. 29.) simply denotes an illustration of any thing by comparison with something else which resembles it; q. d. 'Take for your instruction the illustration, which may be derived from the fig-tree.'

There is here an answer to the inquiry, v. 3. as to the time of this destruction, which our Lord intimates will be as plainly indicated by the signs above mentioned, as the approach of summer is by the buds of the fig-tree. Here, for the Vulg. ἐκφύ, I have, with H. Steph., Matthæi, Fritz., and Lachman, edited ἐκφυῖ. Τὰ φύλλα is (as even the use of the Article shows) not the accus., but the nomin. to ἐκφ. (likewise κλάδος before); which is perfectly agreeable to propriety: for (as Matthæi observes) a tree is said φύειν and ἐκφύειν φύλλα, but the φύλλα are also said ἐκφύεσθαι and ἐκφυῖναι.

—τὸ θέρος] i. e. rather Spring than Summer, by an idiom formed on the Hebrew, in which language there are no terms to denote Spring and Autumn; the former being included under ἔτη, the Winter. This idiom has been generally accounted for from the equable temperature of the East; but as it occurs in the Western language, it is probably a vestige of the simplicity and poverty of primitive language. The phrase ἐγγύς ἐπὶ θύραις is formed from two phrases blended together (for emphasis); and thus denotes the closest proximity. So Demosth. p. 140 (cited by Bos), ὑπὲρ τοῦ ἐπὶ ταῖς θύραις ἐγγύς, οὐτωσί, sc. ὄντος. and Aristoph. Plut. 767. ἐγγύς πρὸ θυρῶν ἐστίν. Comp. also James v. 9. Accordingly Jerusalem was destroyed about 40 years after. The Nominative at ἐστίν is to be supplied from the preceding context, and therefore can be no other than ἡ παρουσία τοῦ Υἱοῦ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου.

33. πάντα ταῦτα.] Namely, the σημεῖα above mentioned.

34. ἡ γενεὰ αὕτη—γίνεσθαι.] Our Lord here critically distinguishes the time of the destruction of Jerusalem from that of his second appearance. The former is adverted to in v. 34, and the latter in v. 36; of which event he, in v. 37, sqq. proceeds to show the uncertainty, &c. Ver. 35 is confirmative of the assertion at v. 34, and that by a figure usual in Scripture (as Is. liv. 10. Matt. v. 18. Luke xvi. 7.) involving a comparison with a thing the least possible; q. d. sooner would heaven and earth pass away, than his words fail, which would be more stable than the visible creation. (Dr. Hales.)

35. οὐ μὴ παρέλθῃ.] Render, 'can by no means pass away.' [Comp. supra v. 18. Is. li. 6. 2 Pet. iii. 10.]

36. This is intended as an answer to the question at v. 3. The sense of the verse will partly depend upon the reference, which is by most Expositors supposed to be the final advent of Christ exclusively. Yet as the words following relate partly, if not chiefly, to the destruction of Jerusalem, so must this, at least primarily; though, in the secondary, and more august sense, it may be referred to the day of judgment. And indeed ἐκείνη ἡμέρα is often used to denote that period; as 1 Thess. v. 4. 2 Thess. i. 10. 2 Tim. v. 4. i. 12. 18. iv. 8; whereas the expression is scarcely ever used of the destruction of Jerusalem, though a long list of passages have been adduced by Expositors.

nifies, not hour, but time; and by the use of ἡμέρα and ἔρα is meant, by Hendiadys, the precise period in question. [Comp. Zech. xiv. 7. Acts i. 7.] The τῆς is not found in many MSS., and is cancelled by Matthæi, Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz; but wrongly: since, as Bp. Middleton observes, the Article is required by ἐκείνης, which is understood from the preceding. It is also confirmed by Matt. xxv. 13. The Pesch. Syr. Version renders so that the Translator must not only have had the Article, but ἐκείνης repeated. Μου too, being, in several MSS. not found, is cancelled by Griesbach; but wrongly: since it is defended by vii. 21. x. 32. seq. xi. 27. xii. 50. xv. 13. xvi. 17. and other passages adduced by Schulz. It seems to have been omitted for no better reason than euphony.

In the passage of Mark it is written: περὶ δὲ τῆς ἡμέρας—οὐδὲ ὁ Υἱός, εἰ μὴ ὁ Πατήρ. That the Son should not know the precise time of the destruction of Jerusalem, or of the end of the world, ought not to be drawn as an argument to prove the mere humanity of Christ; the expression having reference solely to his human nature; since, though, as Son of God, he was omniscient, as Son of man he was not so. See Calvin, and Smith's Scrip. Test. ii. 331, seqq.

37, 38. The general sense is, that 'there would be a resemblance between the event in question and the catastrophe of the deluge,—both in its being, like that, sudden and unexpected (the same general intimations and warnings having been given respecting it), and also that it would find the world in the same state of unconcernedness and total absorption in the business and pleasures of the world.

There is no reason to put any strong emphasis on the words τρώγοντες and πίνοντες (still less to take γαμ. and ἐκαμ. of lewdness and debauchery); the words being merely meant to express no more than the security and levity with which they carried on the usual pursuits of life, when on the brink of destruction. [See Luke xvii. 26. 1 Pet. iii. 20. Gen. vi. 3—5. vii. 5.]

39. οὐκ ἔγνωσαν. Meaning, by a common Hebraism in שׁוּן, 'they did not attend or consider,' did not care to know, though warned. ἦραν, 'swept away;' answering to the Heb. נִסּוּ. The Classical writers say αἶψαν ἐκ μέσου.

40. τότε δύο ἔσονται, &c.] Some take this to denote that the destruction will be as general as it will be unexpected; so that no two persons employed together shall both escape. Others suppose it to mean that some of both sexes shall escape, while others shall perish; implying a providential distinction. Both which views may be admitted (as merging into each other); the scope of the verses being to illustrate the awful nature of the catastrophe, and at the same time to intimate, that, however wide spread, it will not be without merciful exceptions. Of those in the same place and occupation some shall perish, while others will be spared.

41. ἀφίεται.] Lit. 'is let alone [in safety].'
Ἀπάγεται, 'is taken off, hurried away,' to destruction (equivalent to ἦραν at v. 39). So John xix. 16. παρίλαβον Ἰησοῦν καὶ ἀπάγαγον, and Palæph. de Incred. § 41. τὸν Ἀδμηττον ἀφίησιν, ἐκείνην δὲ συλλαμβάνει, αἰεῖται. This, too, is confirmed by the parallel passage of Luke xxi. 35. ὡς παγίς γὰρ ἐλεύσεται ἐπὶ πάντας, &c. where in παγ. we have an image of sudden destruction, by which men are caught, like a beast in a trap. The general sense, therefore, as expressed in both Gospels, is, that 'the destruction will come over all the people of the country, many of whom will be swept away, while others will be allowed to escape.'

— δύο ἀληθυσσαι, &c.] The μύλων was a hand-mill with two stones, turned by two persons, generally females. At Luke xxi. 34, which is the true parallel to this verse, we have the admonition expressed even more forcibly, and adapted for every age. See the Note there.

42. γρηγορεῖτε.] Γρηγορεῖν signifies, 1. to be wakeful; 2. as here, to be watchful. Some of the best Commentators, ancient and modern, are with reason of opinion, that our Lord's discourse, as far as regards the destruction of Jerusalem, terminates at v. 41,—and that what follows, v. 42. (peculiarly applicable to the final advent of our Lord), forms, as it were, the moral of the prophecy, and its practical application to Christ's disciples of every age. Many of the above Expositors, too, suppose it to have been spoken upon another occasion, since Luke places it in a different connexion. But as the portion in question is applicable in both connexions, there is surely no reason why we should not suppose it to have been introduced twice. [See infra xxv. 13. Mark xiii. 33, 34.]

43. The foregoing warning to vigilance is now pointed, and the lesson strongly emphasized, by the use of three parables, or parabolic illustrations, δεσπότης ποία φυλακῇ ὁ κλέπτης ἔρχεται, ἐργηγόρησιν ἂν, 44 καὶ οὐκ ἂν εἴασε διουρηγῆναι τὴν οἰκίαν αὐτοῦ. Διὰ τοῦτο

in the first of which the circumstance of Christ's coming being sudden and unexpected is compared (see also 1 Thess. v. 2. 2 Pet. iii. 10.) to that of a robber, who breaks into the house of a person not on his guard.

43. φυλακῇ] hour of the night, for the more general term ὥρα, found in the passage of Luke. Διὰ, to be broken through, by perforating the wall. See Note supra vi. 19. Hence house-breakers were called τοιχωρύχοι.

44. διὰ τοῦτο] i. e. 'because ye are in the same situation as the householder.' [Comp. Luke xxi. 36.]

45. Here we have the second illustration, derived from the case of a good or a bad δούλος, or, as Luke, using a more specific term, says, οἰκονόμος; from whose account it appears that the words were spoken in answer to a question from Peter, which suggested the parable or illustration here employed. The question was (xii. 41.) Κύριε, πρὸς ἡμᾶς τὴν παραβολὴν ταύτην λέγεις, ἡ καὶ πρὸς πάντας; For the Apostles, it seems, were always fancying that they should have exemptions and privileges beyond the multitude. Now the answer is intended to correct this error. And accordingly the foregoing general admonition to Christian watchfulness is here urged as especially incumbent on those who are entrusted with any spiritual charge, as οἰκονόμοι τῶν μυστηρίων τοῦ Θεοῦ, to feed the flock of Christ. [Comp. 1 Cor. iv. 2.]

— τίς ἐστιν, &c.] The Commentators have been somewhat perplexed with τίς, which some take in the sense qualis or quantus; while others regard it as put hypothetically for εἰ τίς, of which usage they adduce examples; yet, as Fritz. shows, not to the purpose. I agree with him in regarding this (like some of those among the examples adduced) as an interrogation conjoined with exclamation. The sense may be thus expressed: 'Who, then, is that faithful and attentive servant whom,' &c. meaning, as Chrysostom observes, to express how rare and valuable such servants are.

— τῇ οἰκίᾳ [αὐτοῦ] 'household,' for τῶν δεικνόντων; abstract for concrete. This use is, however, almost confined to words signifying service, but occurs also in συμμαχία and προσβία. Ἐν καιρῷ. Meaning, 'at the proper time,' usually monthly.

46. οὕτως] i. e. ὡς ἵδει, discharging his office with fidelity. [Comp. Rev. xvi. 15.]

47. πᾶσι—καταστήσει αὐτόν] i. e. from being οἰκονόμος, or dispenser, he will promote him to ἐπίτροπος, treasurer, or steward, which implied freedom. [Comp. xxv. 21, 23.]

48. ὁ κακὸς δ. ἐκεῖνος.] It might seem that ἐκεῖνος has little to do here; the bad servant not having been yet mentioned. The word has therefore been cancelled by Fritz., as introduced from v. 46. But surely it is scarcely possible that it should have found its way into all the MSS. copies, both here and in Luke. The word must therefore be retained, and explained as it best may. In fact, the difficulty is occasioned, not by ἐκεῖνος, but by κακός, which is not found in the passage of Luke. Retaining, then, as we must, both ἐκεῖνος and κακός, the phrase is best regarded as a brief mode of expression for ἰδὼν δὲ εἶπῃ ὁ δούλος ἐκεῖνος, ὁ κακός, ἐν τῇ, &c.

49. αὐτοῦ.] This word is inserted, from several of the best MSS., Versions, and Fathers, by Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, Fritz., and Scholz. All the best Editors, from Wetstein to Scholz, are agreed on the reading ἐσθίῃ καὶ πίνῃ, for ἐσθίειν and πίνειν, which has the strongest evidence of MSS., Versions, and Fathers, and is required by one of the most certain of critical canons. Συνδούλους is put for the more Attic ὁμοδούλους.

51. διχοτομήσει αὐτόν.] On the interpretation of διχοτ. there has been no little difference of opinion. The explanations, 'will turn him away,' or 'will confiscate his goods,' are alike unauthorized and jejune; nay, inconsistent with the parallel passage of Luke. Most Commentators explain the word literally, of the dreadful punishment in ancient times, of being sawn asunder; of which see some proofs and illustrations in Recens. Synopt. Yet, as the sufferer seems, in the words following, represented as surviving the punishment, that cannot well be admitted. Heumann, Doddridge, Rosenmuller, and Kuinoel take it in a metaphorical sense, to denote, by a certain figure, the infliction of a most severe flagellation. So Hist. Sussanæ v. 35. σχίσαι σε μέσον. & 39. πρίσαι σε μέσον. Also Arrian, Epist. iii. 22. (of a disorderly servant), ἰπιστραφεῖς δι' ὁ κύριος, καὶ ἰδὼν αὐτὸν σοβαρῶς διατασσόμενον, ἑκτύσας ἔτεμεν. Thus also the word είρειν, which properly signifies to flay, generally denotes only to scourge severely. And so, it may be observed, as confirmatory of the above interpretation, we have added just after, in the passage of Luke, that 'the servant who knew his master's will, and yet prepared not himself, nor did according to his master's will, δαρῆσεται πολλὰς.'

With respect to what follows, τὸ μέρος αὐτοῦ μετὰ τῶν ὑποκριτῶν θήσεται (meaning, 'will place him in the same situation with hypocrites.' Comp. Ps. xlix. 18. Sept.) we must understand it to imply, 'when he survives the punishment;' which many would not. In the next words there is an allusion to the general treatment of delinquent slaves, whose miseries are feelingly alluded to in κλαυθμὸς καὶ ὁ βρυγμὸς τῶν ὀδόντων.

The meaning, then, of the passage seems to be: 'As he will miserably scourge him, and consign him to the woeful abode of incorrigible criminals, so will the Lord consign the willfully disobedient disciple to the abode of hypocrites,' namely, as the Jews universally acknowledged, HELL.

XXV. The two Parables which follow (vv. 1-13, 14-30), are intended to carry on the subject treated of in the latter part of the preceding chapter (this being one continued discourse on the Mount of Olives, in sight of the Temple). That subject was, in a more especial sense, the coming of Christ at the day of Judgment, or, what is tantamount to it, the hour of death. And the object of both is to warn men of the necessity of being always prepared to meet their Judge. Accordingly, at the close of these parables there is a transition to the subject of the general judgment only. The scope of the first parable is to inculcate the necessity of continued vigilance, constant prayer, and perseverance in every good work; and it is especially designed to discourage all trust in a late repentance. It is founded on the circumstances which attended the celebration of marriage among the Jews, with whom it was usual for a procession of females to grace the nuptial ceremony.

1. τότε ὁμοιωθήσεται, &c. ['may be likened,' 'will resemble,' q. d. so it shall be when the Son of man returns to judgment, as it was in the case of ten virgins at a marriage ceremony.]

The parable which follows (as Mr. Greswell observes) was intended to be as applicable to the moral probation and moral responsibility of all who agreed in the character of Christians in general, as the parabolic allegory which had preceded, to those of the ministers of religion in particular.

— δέκα.] This has been regarded as a certain for an uncertain number. Yet some certain number was likely to be used; and ten was a round number much in use among the Jews.

— λαμπάδας] i. e. rather torches than lamps; and, as appears from a Rabbinical writer in Lightfoot, composed of a piece of iron wrapped round with old linen and moistened with oil.

— ἐξῆλθον εἰς ἀπάντ. τ. ν.] A difficulty exists as to the going out here spoken of, which Rosenm. and Kuinoel endeavour to remove by understanding the verb of intention, not of action. Grotius has recourse to a philological device, supposing the figure Prolepsis. Both methods are alike inadmissible. The difficulty is thus handled by Mr. Greswell, vol. v. p. 453: 'That they must not be supposed to go forth directly to meet the bridegroom, nor consequently to the place where he was, appears from the result; that they must be supposed to go forth to some quarter different from that whence they set out, and some quarter where they might expect to meet with the bridegroom at last, follows from the necessity of the case. We may presume, then, that the place to which they are supposed to go, is the house of the bride.' A solution evidently formed on that proposed by myself in Recens. Synop., that there were two goings forth; one to a certain distance on the way from the bride's house; namely, some friend's house by the way; the other from thence, when, on the bridegroom's party being announced, they move forward to meet him. The same view has been likewise adopted by other recent Commentators. Whether Mr. Greswell has improved upon, while he has borrowed my solution, is, I think, very doubtful. How the preliminary assemblage of the virgins, from their houses respectively, to attend on the bride, can be supposed to be adverted to in the words ἐξῆλθον εἰς ἀπάντησιν τοῦ νυμφίου, I am at a loss to see. After all, however, there is perhaps no occasion to suppose two goings forth, since, strictly speaking, the narrative has not even commenced at v. 1; the thing being spoken of only in a general way; q. d. that the case in question bears a close resemblance to that of a marriage party of virgins going forth to meet the bridegroom.

3. φρόνιμοι—μωραί.] The former are called wise, and the rest foolish, with respect to their providence or improvidence.

— αὐτῶν.] This, for αὐτῶν is edited by Scholz, from many of the best MSS.

4. ἀγγείοις] flasks. So Numb. iv. 9, ἀγγεῖα τοῦ ἔλαιου.

5. ἐνύσταξαν πᾶσαι, καὶ ἐκάθοντο] 'they all became drowsy' (lit. nodded) and began to sleep.

6. μείσης νυκτός.] So ἡμέρας μείσης in Acts xxi. 13; a later form for μύσον ἡμέρας or μυσούσα ἡμέρα. Κραυγὴ. Namely, of those sent forward to announce the approach of the bridegroom.

7. ἰκόσμησαν] for κατισκιάσαν, which is used in the Sept., though the same Hebrew word, צטל is by the Sept. used both for κοσμεῖν and ἐπισκιάζειν. The sense is, ornament, 'put them in order,' made them fit for use, as the Æthiopic Version expresses it.

8. σβέννυνται.] Render, 'are going out.'

9. μήποτε οὐκ ἀρκέσθῃ, &c.] Here is evidently an ellipsis; which Rosenm., Schleus., and Kuinoel would supply by οὕτω; taking μήποτε in the sense perhaps. So Josephus, Ant. xv. 4, 3, καὶ μήποτε τοῦτο ἐκείνου χεῖρον. The sense, however, is feeble, and the proof of it insufficient. It is better with Erasmus, Wolf, and Elsnar, to suppose an ellipsis of σκοπεῖται, or ὁρᾶται, or (what Fritz. proposes) φοβούμεθα or διδίκαμεν. Or, rather, with Euthym., Pisc., Grotius, and the framers of our English Version, of the negative particle, or some negative phrase. The negative seems omitted ceterum de gratia; the ancients attaching some kind of shame to denying a request. Though, in the present case, as the request was unreasonable,—so the denial was perfectly justifiable, and indeed unavoidable; since the oil which the prudent virgins had taken with them would probably be no more than sufficient for themselves; and consequently to have shared it with the others would only have rendered it insufficient for all, and thus have occasioned the non-attendance, and exclusion, of all.

—πορεύεσθε, &c.] This seems to have been a common mode of expression, used to those who asked what could not be spared, and, of course, serves merely an ornamental circumstance. The ἢ before μᾶλλον is cancelled by Griesbach and Scholz from several MSS.; but wrongly; since the current of authority runs the other way, and the non loquendi of Scripture is adverse; ex. gr. x. 6, 28. Luke x. 20.

10. αἱ ἑτοιμαὶ] 'those who were ready.' This absolute use of ἑτοιμοί with persons, as Matt. xxiv. 44. Luke xii. 40, is very rare.

12. οὐκ οἶδα ὑμᾶς] i. e. 'I do not recognize you as among those who accompanied me and my spouse;' or, regarding it as a common form of repulsion, 'I know nothing about you.'

13. γρηγορεῖτε οὖν, &c.] An admonition containing the great fundamental truth which it is the purpose of the whole parable to inculcate, and with reference to which all its minuter parts are to be considered. The words ἐν ᾗ ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθ. ἔρχεται do not appear in several good MSS., most of the Versions, and some Fathers; and are cancelled by Griesbach, Fritz., and Scholz. They have certainly the air of an addition to fill up the sense, perhaps from supra xxiv. 42, 44. The sentence may indeed thus seem to terminate somewhat abruptly (the very reason which, we imagine, led the ancient Critics to fill up what appeared wanting); but several passages might be adduced from the Classical writers where something at the end of a sentence is left to be supplied from the context, or subject matter. One example may here suffice. Polyæn. p. 749. ed. Maass.: Καὶ οὕτω τὸν καιρὸν οὕτω τὴν ἡμέραν προέλεγον.

14. Ὡσπερ γὰρ ἄνθρωπος, &c.] Something here seems wanting, which Commentators variously supply. Some, by ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν; others, by ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου; which last, from the context and character of the similitude is preferable. Yet, after all, it should seem that we have here, not an elliptical construction, but rather (as Grotius, Maldonat, and Fritz. say) an anacoluthon, or unfinished construction; there being nothing to correspond to Ὡσπερ in the words subsequent to it.

The parable nearly resembles that of the Pounds at Luke xix. 12; though there are several points of dissimilarity, on which see Greenwell. It is meant still further to illustrate the manner in which Christ will deal with men at his return to judgment. Or to enter more particularly into its nature, there are, Mr. Greenwell thinks, two histories combined therein; the first comprehending the five first verses; the second continuing to the end; one containing a scheme of probation; the other one of retribution; one preparing the way for the other; and of course the latter economy forming the principal subject of the parabolic narrative.

— ἀποδημῶν] 'on taking his departure.' Or for ἀποδημῶν θάλλον.

— τὸν ἰδίον δούλους.] If the ιδίους be regarded as emphatic, or even very significant, it will mean (as Gresswell explains) 'his own peculiar servants,' meaning a certain number opposed to the rest of his household, implying, as Wetstein explains, such as he judged fittest for such a trust. This, however, is liable to objection. And it should rather seem that ιδίους is here used simply for the possessive pronoun, as often both in the Sept. and the New Test., ex. gr. Job vii. 10. Prov. xxvii. 8. Matt. xxii. 5. Tit. ii. 5. 1 Pet. iii. 1, 5. And as the ancient Versions confirm this, there can be little doubt that it is entitled to the preference, especially as in the Parable of the Pounds we have δούλους αὐτοῦ, not ιδίους.

— τὰ ὑπάρχοντα] his possessions or property. On the custom see Horne's Intro.

15. κατὰ τὴν ἰδίαν δύναμιν] 'according to each one's particular capacity and ability to employ the money to advantage.' Thus it seems that masters sometimes (as is still the case in the East and in Russia) committed to their slaves some capital, to be employed in traffic; for the improvement of which they were to be accountable to them.

16. εἰργάσατο ἐν αὐτοῖς] scil. χρήματα, which is almost always expressed in the Classical writers. Of the elliptical phrase the only example I have there met with is Pausan. iii. 23, 2. τῆς γὰρ Δήλου τότε ἔμπορίου τοῖς Ἕλλησι οὕση, καὶ ἀδελφὰ τοῖς ἐργαζομένοις (mercantile) δοκούσῃ παρίχειν. This use of ἐν is Hellenistic. A Classical writer would have used ἐπὶ. In this use ἐργάσασθαι signifies to invest capital, or to make money. Ἐποίησις, 'acquired by traffic'; a use chiefly found in the later Greek; the early writers employing κερδήσαι, though Aristotle says χρήματα ποιεῖν, Plato ἀργύριον π. and Theophrastus ποιήσας τάλαντα ποιεῖσθαι.

18. ὥρυξεν] scil. δρυγμα, which is implied. See Herodot. iv. 71.

21. ἔφη δέ.] The δὲ is not found in many good MSS. and some Versions, and is cancelled by Griesbach, Tittman, Fritz., and Scholz. At ἐπὶ ὀλίγα supply καταστάσεις from καταστήσω following. The syntax with the Accus. (which is rare) occurs also at Heb. ii. 7.

— τὴν χαρὰν τ. κ.] Some of the best Commentators are of opinion that, in order to keep the story apart from the application, we should here take χαρ., by a metonymy of the adjunct, in the sense banquet. It is scarcely necessary, however, to abandon the common mode, by which, (as Chrys. and Euthym. observe,) is denoted τὴν ἀπασαν μακαρίστην, namely, the bliss prepared for them by their Lord; even that spoken of by Christ, John xvii. 24.

24. σκληρός] 'hard-hearted, gripping,' one who exacts his due to the uttermost, ἀκριβοδικαίως. So Josephus, Ant. vi. 14, uses it of Nabal. And so Arrian, cited by Kypke: οἱ κατοικοῦντες ἔμποροι σκληρότεροι scil. εἰσέ. And Stob. Bern. p. 363, ἀνδρὶ σκληρῷ καὶ ἀπὸ πάντων πορίζοντι. The expressions following are for-

- 25 ὅπου οὐκ ἔσπειρας, καὶ συνάγων ὅθεν οὐ διεσκόρπισας· καὶ φοβηθεὶς, ἀπελθὼν ἔκρυψα τὸ τάλαντόν σου ἐν τῇ γῇ· ἶδε, μυαίς, probably in common use with agricultural persons, and expressive of the habits of such persons. Though some similar ones are found in the Classical writers (so Aristoph. Eq. 392, τάλλοτριον ἀμύνειν ἑαυτοῦ); nor are they wanting in our own language. We may render, 'reaping where thou hast not sown, and harvesting where thou hast not scattered (namely, the seed).'

25. φοβηθεὶς] i. e. 'fearing lest if I should lose the money, thou wouldst severely exact it of me,' by taking away all my substance (Kuin.) This was evidently a mere excuse; but, as Euthym. observes, the parable puts a weak excuse into the mouth of the slothful servant, in order to show that in such a case no reasonable apology can be made.

— ἶδε, ἔχεις τὸ σόν.] Formula, (says Grotius) nihil ultra debere se profitentis, as xxi. 14, ἄρον τὸ σόν.

26. πονηρὲ καὶ ὀκνηρὲ.] Not 'wicked,' but 'evil.' Campbell has here an able note on the distinction between words nearly, but not quite, synonymous, as exemplified in κακός, πονηρὸς, ἀνομος, and ἄδικος. 'Though such words (says he) are sometimes used promiscuously, yet there is a difference. Thus ἄδικος properly signifies unjust; ἀνομος, lawless, criminal; κακός, vicious; πονηρὸς, malicious. Accordingly, κακός is opposed to ἐνάρετος, or δικαίος; πονηρὸς to ἀγαθός. Κακία is vice; πονηρία, malice or malignity. This is the use of the words in the Gospel. Thus the negligent, riotous, debauched servant, supra xxiv. 48, is denominated κακὸς δοῦλος, a vicious servant. Here the bad servant is not debauched, but slothful, and, to defend his sloth, abusive. And in xx. 32, the inexorable master is called πονηρὸς. A malignant, that is, an envious, eye is πονηρὸς, not κακὸς ὀφθαλμός. The disposition of the Pharisees is termed κακός; and the Devil is termed ὁ πονηρὸς, not ὁ κακός.' Here, however, it should seem that πονηρὸς simply means bad, i. e. unfruitful, as said of one that neglects to do his duty, or does what he ought not to do. So Josephus, Ant. xvi. 9, κατηγορεῖ Σέλλαον ὅτι πονηρὸν δοῦλον, &c., being an unfaithful servant, one void of fidelity.

— ᾗδεῖς, &c.] Said (as Euthym. and Grotius observe) by the figure Synchoreisis: 'Be it as you say that I am, &c., then ought you to have taken the more care not to deprive me of what is really my own. Though it were true, as you say, that I reap where I sow not, and you durst not risk the money in merchandize, you ought to have put it out to the public money-changers to interest; some exertions should have been made.' Against this, however, it is urged by others, that it would make our Lord allow that he reaped where he did not sow; which was not true. They would therefore take the sentence as an interrogative one,—by which it will be an argument out of the man's own mouth to condemn him, upon his own principles, for not acting suitably to his own hard conceptions of his Lord. Those Commentators, however, confound a rhetorical synchoreisis with a real one, or positive admission that a thing is really true. And as to the interrogation which they propose, it is, to say the least, by no means necessary, and not in the manner of Scripture.

27. βαλεῖν] for διδοῦναι, as in Luke xix. 23; for the more Classical δίδωαι, according to the Commentators. But it may rather be said to be for καταβαλεῖν, pay in, as Mark xii. 42. Luke xxi. 2. So also Diog. Laert. ii. 20, τὰ βαλλόμενα κέρματα ἀθροίζειν.

— τραπέζιταις.] These discharged not only the offices of our bankers, in receiving and giving out money, and giving interest upon it; but also in exchanging coins, and distinguishing genuine from forged money. See Gresswell, vol. iv. 447, sq.

— τόκῳ] 'interest;' lit. 'what is produced' by, as we say, turning money; which, indeed, was originally the sense of usury, i. e. the profit allowed to the lender for the use of borrowed money. However, if the term were taken in the worst sense that was ever ascribed to usury, it would not imply our Lord's approbation, since the whole (as has been before observed) is said per synchoreisis. Κομίζεσθαι signifies to carry off for one's own use; and it is generally implied that the thing was before in our possession.

28. ἄρατε οὖν, &c.] These words have been by most Commentators considered as merely serving as a finish to the picture. But if the observation at v. 29 be meant (as it must) with especial reference to the preceding command, we may, as Mr. Gresswell suggests, gather from it, not only that the good use of a trust of one kind may be expected to lead to the enjoyment of a trust, and probably a greater, of another kind; but that where many have been invested with a certain trust in common beforehand, with a view to a certain use thereof, to be required in a certain manner to themselves, the failure of some in the use and administration of that trust, and the consequent loss of their claims to a reward on account of it, in their own person, will lead to this result in behalf of others who have made a better use of the same, that the reward which might have been earned by the former will be given, over and above their proper remuneration, to the latter.'

29. τῷ γὰρ ἔχοντι, &c.] On this proverbial saying, see Matth. xiii. 12. and Note. The words may be paraphrased, with Kuinoel, 'When any one does not properly use gifts bestowed, or benefits received, even these are taken from him. But to him who rightly employs them, more are given, as rewards of his good management."

30. ἀχρεῖον.] This is, by the best Commentators in general, taken as put for ὀκνηρόν; as Tob. iv. 13. An opinion supported by the Syr. and Pers. Versions, and countenanced by v. 26. Such, however, would be rather a paraphrase than version. It should seem to mean what we call good-for-nothing, as said of any thing or person producing more harm than good. And so the expression is taken in the Æthiopic and Arabic Versions. Thus, it may be noticed, ἀχρεῖον in Eurip. Supp. 299. is explained by Markland damnosum. And in this manner ἀχρεῖος is used in Hom. II. β. 269, where see Clarke's Note.

— σκότος τὸ ἐξώτερον.] Corresponding to the Tartarus of the Heathen mythology. Of the same kind is the expression at 2 Pet. ii. 17. ζόφος τοῦ σκότους.

31. ὅταν δὲ ἔλθῃ, &c.] After pressing the warnings inculcated in the preceding parables, our Lord now, with inexpressible majesty and solemnity, proceeds to advert to the great day of retribution itself, in a description which represents, 1. the extent, i. e. the universality of the judgment; 2. the methods with which it will be carried on; 3. the place and circumstances. Whence (in the words of Dr. Smith, Script. Test. vol. ii. 257.) we learn, that 'he will discriminate men's moral state, amidst the complicated varieties of human character; will estimate their actions by an infinitely penetrating development of their motives; will, accordingly, by an infallible decision, completely and for ever separate them one from another.'

The imagery is partly derived from the solemn mode of administering justice in the East (see Ps. ix. 5—9. Is. vi. l. lxi. l. Dan. vii. 9.), and partly there is a pastoral metaphor (frequent in Scripture) derived from the ancient Eastern custom of keeping the sheep separate from the goats.

— ὅρδον δόξης α.] for ὅρδον ἰνδόξου. The ἅγιοι before ἄγγελοι is not found in several MSS., and is cancelled by Griesbach and Fritz., as having been introduced from the parallel passage of Mark; but it is retained by Wetstein, Matthæi, and Scholz. The point is doubtful; but the quarter from whence the omission proceeds is suspicious.

32. πάντα τὰ ἔθνη.] Meaning, both Jews and Gentiles, both quick and dead. In opposition to the Jewish notion, that the Gentiles would have no part in the resurrection.

— ἀφορ:εἰ αὐτοὺς—ἐρίφων.] Meaning (by a brief mode of expression) will separate, among those nations, the bad Christians from the good. So xiii. 49. ἀφοριεῖ αὐτοὺς πονηροὺς ἐκ μέσου τῶν δικαίων. Sheep and goats are apt emblems of the dispositions inherent in each respectively. Also, as sheep were more valuable than goats, they would, in an allegory wherein the Messiah and those whom he was to guide are compared to a shepherd and his sheep, fitly represent, the former, those accepted, and the latter, those rejected.

33. ἐκ δεξιῶν—ἐξ εὐνυμίων.] Here there is thought to be an allusion to the Jewish custom (adverted to by Maimonides and others) of placing in the Sanhedrim the acquitted on the right hand, and the condemned on the left. But I have proved in Recens. Synop. that, among the ancients generally, whether Jews or Gentiles, approbation was denoted by placing on the right hand; disapprobation, by placing on the left, and consequently the right and left situations were respectively emblematical of eternal bliss or eternal misery.

34. ὁ βασιλεὺς.] So called, it is said, as then exercising the highest act of kingly power, judging, in extreme cases. Perhaps, however, the term is rather used in accordance with the regal imagery preceding, and intended to represent the high character in which Christ will then appear, as our Lord and King.

— τοῦ Πατρὸς.] Some supply ὄνο. But the Genit. may of itself denote the efficient cause; not to say, with Fritz., that οἱ εὐλογημένοι is in some measure a nomen.

— κληρονομήσατε, &c.] Here it is finely remarked by Chrys., he does not say recuset, but inherit, as domestic property derived from a father, and therefore that to which any one has a just title. Τὴν ἡτοιμασμένην ὑμῖν, &c. So it is said, Tob. vi. 17. ὅτι σοὶ αὕτη ἡτοιμασμένη ἦν ἀπὸ τοῦ αἰῶνος.

— ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου.] This has been thought to countenance the doctrine of eternal decrees. But the expression may merely be supposed to denote, by a Hebraism (what the context plainly shows it to mean), that the kingdom of heaven was all along prepared for those who should approve themselves, by the performance of those good works which invariably spring from a true faith. And, among these, those of charity, hospitality, and benevolence are especially introduced, as representatives of all the active virtues. Not that we are to understand from γὰρ that the promise of salvation belongs to these, or any individual virtue; the performance of other duties is implied in the specification of these great and leading ones. Comp. James i. 27, which is an excellent comment on the present passage.

35. συνηγάγετε.] scil. εἰς τὸν οἶκον. The complete phrase occurs in 2 Sam. xi. 27. and Judg. xix. 18. The difference between the Classical and Hellenistic use is this,—that in the latter the phrase is used of one only; in the former, of more than one.

36. γυμνός.] The term here (like the corresponding one in most languages, ancient and modern,) denotes, not simply naked, but without some of one's garments, meaning, in a general way, poorly and scantily clothed.

—ἐπεσκέψασθε.] The word signifies, 1. to look at, survey; 2. to look after, implying attendance, care, and relief. Thus it is used of both the attendance of a physician, and the care or attention of a nurse or friend. Ἠλάττε πρὸς με, like the Latin adire, implies solace and comfort.

38. εἰ] 'morosorum.'

48. εἰς ἑσπέρην—ἀπολείποντες.] Here we have an explanation of what was meant at vv. 35 & 36. So close is the union between Christ and his members, that he looks on whatever is done to them as done to himself, and rewards them accordingly. Comp. Matt. x. 42. This, indeed, agrees with what the Scriptures elsewhere declare, that what is done unto the poor, in relieving their wants, is done unto God himself, under whose especial care they are. Thus it is said (Prov. xix. 17.), 'he that hath pity on the poor, lendeth unto the Lord.' A sentiment not unknown to the Heathens. So Hom. Od. ε. 57. πρὸς γὰρ Διὸς εἰσιν ἅπαντες θεῖνοι τε πτωχοὶ τε.

41. εἰς τὸ πῦρ, &c.] Render, 'unto the everlasting fire, destined,' &c.

—αἰώνιον.] Considering the opinion of the Jews, and, indeed, of the ancients in general, as to the eternity of future punishments, our Lord's hearers could not fail to understand this word in the usual acceptation everlasting, rather than (as some ancient and several modern Commentators contend) in that of a very long, but limited duration. And this may be considered one of the strongest arguments against an interpretation so unwarranted and presumptuous.

44. αὐτῷ.] This, not found in most of the best MSS. and Versions, and some Fathers, has been cancelled by Bengel, Wetstein, Matthæi, and Scholz.

having given his disciples privately many weighty admonitions,—especially apprising them that he would assuredly return again to judgment, with power and great glory,—he proceeds to communicate to them the near approach of those sufferings by which he should 'be perfected,' (see Heb. ii. 10. & vii. 28.) and should purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works.

2. γίνεται for ἀγεται, 'is to be celebrated' (a frequent sense of the present tense); which, however, is not only a Hebraism, but a Grecism also.

— πάσχα 'the paschal feast.' The word is derived from the Heb. פסח a passing by, from פסע, to pass, pass by. And in the Sept. and the New Test. τὸ πάσχα signifies 1. the paschal lamb; 2. the paschal feast.

— καὶ ὁ Υἱός.] The καὶ is best taken in sensu chronikῷ, for καὶ τότε. It is often used for ὅτε, which may admit of being resolved into καὶ τότε. That his death was near at hand, our Lord had repeatedly apprised his disciples; but he had not until now told them the exact time.

3. τότε.] i. e. on the second day before the Passover. Οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς—λαοῦ. A periphrasis for τὸ συνέδριον, as that assembly is called in John xi. 47, and whose office it was to sit in judgment on false prophets.

— αὐλήν.] Αὐλή signifies, 1. an open enclosure; 2. an area, or court-yard, such as was before the vestibule of a large house; 3. such an interior court as is in the centre of Oriental houses; 4. by synecdoche, of part for the whole, it signified an edifice provided with such an αὐλή; and was a name given to the residences of kings or great persons, denoting mansion or palace.

4. δόλῳ.] The Commentators supply ἐν or σὺν. But no ellipsis is necessary, since the Dative form will of itself express the instrument or means.

5. μὴ ἐν τῇ ἑορτῇ] scil. γενίσθω τοῦτο. By ἑορτῇ is meant not the feast-day itself, but the whole paschal festival. The three great festivals, indeed, were periods when notorious malefactors were usually executed, for the sake of more public example. The Sanhedrim would have waived their purpose for the present; but having so fair an opportunity, by the offer from Judas, they embraced it.

— ἵνα μὴ θόρυ· γίν.] Such as was usual at the festivals, and on the slightest cause.

6. Σίμωνος τοῦ λεπροῦ.] So called by surname, because he had been a leper, and had probably been cured by Christ. So Matthew was called the Publican, as having been such. [Comp. John xi. 2; xii. 3.]

7. προσῆλθεν αὐτῷ γυνή, &c.] There has been no little debate on the question, whether the transaction related here and at Mark xiv. 3, 9, be the same with that recorded in John xii. 2, or a different one. On the latter hypothesis see Lightfoot and Pilkington; on the former, Doddridge, Michaelis, Recena. Synop., Fritz., and Townsend, Ch. Arr. i. 387. There is no great weight in the allegations of discrepancies between the two stories; while their points of agreement are so remarkable, that they cannot well be regarded as two different transactions; but have every appearance of being two statements, by two different eye-witnesses, of the same transaction. It cannot, indeed, be denied, that one or other of the two narratives must be inserted out of the strict chronological order; which, it should seem, there is greater reason to think is observed by John, than by Matthew and Mark.

— ἀλάβαστρον μύρου.] This denotes not a box but a cruse of ointment or unguentary, which (as we learn from the writers on Antiquities) was much of the form of our oil-flasks, with a long and narrow neck, or rather of the form depicted in Class. Ant. i. 102. (Lardner's Cyclo.) Pliny, however, derives it from Alabastrum, a city of Egypt, near Thebes, where the finest Oriental Alabaster was found, and from which the stone derived its name. It should rather seem, that the city derived its name (at least among the Greeks) from the Alabaster found in its neighbourhood, and there was probably a great manufactory of Alabaster vases there. The utensil was so called, because it had been first, and was always generally, made of a sort of marble called onyx (from being of the colour of a human nail), and also alabaster from its extreme smoothness. Thus the utensil came to be called ἀλάβαστρον, which it is probable was originally an adjective with the ellipse of σκεῦος. Afterwards, however, it came to be manufactured of any materials, as glass, metal, stone, and even wood. In the phrase ἀλάβαστρον μύρου (which is found in Herodot. iii. 28, and Athen. p. 268), there is the same ellipse of πλῆρω.

Mark and John call this μύρον, nard, which, as appears from Heyn. on Tibull. ii. 27, was rather an oil than an unguent; and therefore (especially as the term κατέχευεν just after demands this) we may suppose that such is the sense of the word here. 'Ungebantur (says Wetstein) et convivæ et mortui; ditiores quidem unguento nardo, reliqui oleo.'

7. βαρυτίμου.] A word used by the later Greek writers, equivalent to πολῦτιμος, which is used by John, or πολυτιλῆς, used by Mark.

— κατέχεεν ἐπὶ τὴν κεφ.] An usual mark of respect from hosts towards their guests, both among Jews and Gentiles. In the present case, however, far more was meant.

8. ἀπώλεια.] So φθόρος ἀργυρίου in Theocr. Id. xv. 18, and ἀπόλλυμι in Theophr. Ch. Eth. xv. and Plutarch, i. 869. At εἰς τί sub. ἵστι, or γίγνεται, which is expressed in Mark.

9. τὸ μύρον.] The words are wanting in several of the best MSS., Versions, and Fathers; and are cancelled by Griesbach, Fritz., and Scholz. They seem to have come from the margin (where they were intended to supply a substantive to which τοῦτο might be referred) and to have been introduced from John xii. 5.

10. τί κόπους παρέχετε.] Παρέχειν is not unfrequently used with an accus. of a noun, importing labour or exertion; but almost always in the singular, with the exception of πράγμα, which always has the plural.

11. πάντοτε γὰρ, &c.] q. d. 'The good work which was to be done soon or never, was preferable to that of which the opportunities were continual.' (Comp. supra 18, 20, infra 28, 20. John xii. 8. Deut. xv. 11.)

12. πρὸς τὸ ἐντ. ἐποίησεν.] Ἐνταφιάζειν signifies to make preparation for burying, by such observances (namely, washing, laying out, anointing, and embalming) as were used previously thereto. The best Commentators, from Grotius downward, are agreed that πρὸς τὸ has reference not to the intention of the woman, but rather of Providence. There may be, as some think, simply an ellipse of ὥστε (which is confirmed by the Syriac Version), i. e. 'she has done it, as if for my burial.' For (as Grotius remarks) 'it is not unfrequent in Hebrew for any one to be said to do a thing for this or that end; which, however, is not really intended by him; only his act is consequent upon it accidens: as 1 Kings xvii. 18.' In either view, the words must be regarded as suggesting the nearness of his death; and (as Grotius says) justifying what had been done by an argument a pari: that, had she expended this on his dead body, they who used such ointments could not reasonably object to it; and had, therefore, no ground now to do so, as he was so near death and burial.

13. ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ κόσμῳ.] This clause is by some (as Kuinoel and Fritz.) construed with the following word λαληθήσεται; but it is usually, and more properly, taken with the preceding ὅπου, and is well rendered by Casaub. 'in toto, inquam, mundo.' By εὐαγγ. is meant my religion. Εἰς μνημόσυνον αὐτῆς, 'for her (honourable) remembrance,' since μνημόσυνον, as well as its kindred terms, is almost always meant for praise. It is properly a neuter of the old adjective μνημόσυνος, commemorative.

14. τότε.] The sense may be 'about that time;' for this particle is of very indefinite signification, and is used with considerable latitude. The particle, however, may have reference to v. 3, and be resumptive, and the narration of the anointing parenthetical. The τότε does not, at all events, denote (as Kuinoel and others imagine) 'when they had resolved to apprehend him,' but rather 'when they were yet unresolved whether to apprehend him then, or to defer the thing.'

15. ἔσθησαν αὐτῷ.] On the interpretation of ἔσθησαν Commentators are divided. Some ancient and many modern ones explain it 'weighed out,' i. e. paid; by a reference to the ancient custom of making payment of the precious metals by weight; which continued, or at least the mode of expression, even after the introduction of coined money. This signification of ἔσθαι is frequent in the Sept., and in the Classical writers from Homer downward. Others, however, induced by a seeming discrepancy from the accounts of Mark and Luke; (the former of whom says ἐπηγγέλατο αὐτῷ ἀργύριον; the latter συνέθεντο ἀργύριον δ.) would take it to mean promised to give. But that would be exceedingly harsh; and the testimony of the ancient Versions will afford no confirmation, since they rather give the sense appointed than promised. Nor is the discrepancy in question so material as to need being got rid of in so violent a manner. For, without resorting to the arbitrary supposition of Michaelis and Roemnn., that the money in question was only an earnest of more; the term used by Mark (which means 'engaged to give'), and that used by Luke

(which means agreed), may either of them be said, in such a case, to imply immediate payment at the treasury. That the money was paid, we find from Matt. xxvii. 3, 5. [Comp. Zech. xi. 12.]

17. τῇ δὲ πρώτῃ τῶν ἀζύμων.] We are here brought to the consideration of a most litigated question, namely, whether our Lord celebrated the Passover before his crucifixion, and if so, at what time? There are expressions in the Evangelists which seem, at first sight, contradictory. John appears to differ from the rest respecting the time that the Jews partook of the Passover; and supposes that they did not eat it on the same evening as our Saviour; yet all the Evangelists agree, that the night of the day in which he ate what was called the passover, was Thursday. He is also said to command his disciples to prepare the passover, and he tells them he had earnestly desired to eat this Passover with them. Yet we find that on the day after that on which he had thus celebrated it, the Jews would not go into the judgment hall lest they should be defiled, but that they might eat the passover. Now the law required that all should eat it on the same day. The principal solutions which have been propounded of this intricate question are as follows: 1. That our Lord did not eat the Passover at all. Of those who adopt this opinion some contend that it is only a common supper that is spoken of; others, that Jesus (like the Jews of the present day) celebrated only a memorative, not a sacrificial Passover. 2. That he did eat the Passover, and on the same day with the Jews. 3. That he ate it, but not on the same day with the Jews; anticipating it by one day. Of these solutions, the first, in both its forms, is alike inconsistent with the plain words of Scripture, φαγεὶν τὸ πάσχα, and θύειν τὸ πάσχα. That our Lord did not eat the Passover rests merely on conjecture; and the place, the preparation, and the careful observance of the Paschal feast, alike forbid the notion of a common, or of a memorative supper. As to the second solution, it is equally inadmissible, since, on that hypothesis (as Mr. Townsend says), 'if our Lord ate it the same hour in which the Jews ate theirs, he certainly could not have died that day, as they ate the passover on Friday, about six o'clock in the evening. If he did not, he must have been crucified on Saturday, the Jewish sabbath, and could not have risen again on the first day of the week, as the Evangelists testify, but on Monday.' The third solution (which has been adopted by Scaliger, Casaub., Capell., Grotius, Bochart, Hamm., Cudw., Carpov, Kidder, Ernesti, Michaelis, Rosenm., Kuinoel, Bentley, A. Clarke, Townsend, and many other eminent Commentators) has the strongest claims to be preferred; since it is most consistent with the language of the Evangelists, and best reconciles any seeming discrepancies. The Passover was to commence on the first full moon in the month Nisan; but, from the inartificial and imperfect mode of calculation by reckoning from the first appearance of the moon's phasis, a doubt might exist as to the day; and this doubt afforded ground, occasionally, for an observance of different days; which, it is said, the Rabbinical writings recognize. And as the Pharisees and Sadducees, and also the Karaites, differed on so many other points, so it is likely that they should on the present. And this disagreement would, it is obvious, make a day's difference in the calculation; which difference must extend throughout the whole month; so that what would to one party be the 14th day, would to the other be the 13th. Of course, the error in this diversity of observance must rest, not with our Lord, but with the Pharisees who differed from the order which he adopted. They might defer, but our Lord would not anticipate the day ἐν ᾗ ἵδαι θύσθαι τὸ πάσχα. Thus, while Christ celebrated this his last Passover, one day earlier than the Traditionarii, the ruling party among the Jews; yet he might be said equally to observe the ritual command of eating on the 14th of Nisan.

Thus every real difficulty, as far as the subject admits of it, is solved; and moreover, this is not a mere novel notion, but was adopted by some ancient Fathers, being found in Euthymius.

18. τὸν δεῖνα.] This expression was used both by the Classical and Hellenistic writers (as we say Mr. Such-a-one, and the Spaniards fulano) in speaking of a person whose name one does not recollect, or think it worth while to mention, but who is well known to the person addressed. Many reasons have been imagined for Jesus's suppressing the name, which has been variously recorded by Ecclesiastical tradition. It was a person, who, our Lord knew, would be ready to accommodate him with a room, and with whom he had, no doubt, previously arranged the matter.

— ὁ καιρὸς μου.] Schmid., Rosenm., and Kuinoel take καιρὸς to denote the time of keeping the passover; and refer the μου to the different day on which Jesus, with the Karaites and others, kept it, from that of the Pharisees. But though this interpretation may seem countenanced by the words following, yet it presents so frigid a sense, that there is no reason to abandon the usual one, by which καιρὸς is explained of the time of Christ's passion and death. So Ps. xxxi. 15, 'my time is in thine hand.' Thus the Tull sense will be, 'The time for my departure is near; previous to which it is necessary that I should celebrate the Passover, which I will do at thy house.' This use of ποιεῖν, like facere in Latin, is found also in the Classical writers.

19. ἡτοίμασαν τὸ πάσχα] 'they prepared the paschal lamb.' Or rather, 'they made ready for the paschal meal'; with reference to such preliminaries as examining the lamb, slaying, skinning, and roasting it. On the ceremonies of the Passover, see Horne's Introd. iii. 310, 312.

20. ἀνέκειτο.] Though the Passover was directed to be eaten standing (Exod. xii. 11.), yet the Doctors had introduced the reclining posture (which had been usual at meals from ancient times), accounting it a symbolical action, typifying that rest and freedom to which, at the institution of the rite, they were tending, but had not yet attained.

21. [Ὡςπερ, John xiii. 21.]

22. μήτι ἐγὼ εἰμι] sub. ὁ παραδώσω σε, omitted through delicacy.

23. Commentators are not agreed whether this was meant to designate the betrayer; or whether it was only a prophetic application of a proverbial saying; indicating that one of his familiar companions would betray him, and not meant to be applied particularly, except by the person himself intended. The latter opinion is preferable. Indeed, it is plain, from Mark xiv. 20, that Christ did not mean to particularly designate him, since he says εἰς τῶν δώδεκα ὁ ἑμὶ, &c. See also Luke xx. 21. Theophyl. and Grotius are of opinion that Judas reclined near Christ; so that, though there were more dishes on the table, of which every one dipped his bread into the one nearest to him, yet he helped himself from the same dish. Thus would Jesus more easily (and without the others hearing) answer the interrogation of Judas by the words 'thou hast said;' and thus John would more unobservedly (on asking who the traitor should be) receive the sign from Jesus. The disciples (except John, see John xiii. 26.), it should seem, did not, until Judas's departure, understand who was meant. They only knew, at the time, that some one of the twelve, who had been helping himself from the same dish with Jesus, would betray him. It should seem that the question, is it I? was asked by Judas immediately after he had received the sop from Jesus, and that the question asked by John, who it should be? was asked immediately after Jesus had made the public declaration, 'One of the twelve, who has been dipping his hand in the same dish, and whose hand is on the same table with me, will betray me.' [Comp. Ps. xli. 9. John xiii. 18.]

— ὁ ἐμβάψας.] Render: 'he who has dipped' (or rather dived); for we need not suppose, with Dr. Shaw and some of the Commentators, that this was merely dipping the hand into liquid, like soup; but rather (agreeably to the Oriental custom of taking food with the hand from one common dish) diving the hand into a deep dish (like a soup-tureen), in order to transfer the meat, already torn up into pieces, to one's own plate, or others'. See a passage of Maj. Taylor, cited by me in Recens. Synop. Hence it appears that ἐμβάψας is for ἐμβάλων, which occurs in a fragment of Anac. χεῖρά τ' ἐν τηγάνῳ βαλεῖν. This idiom, however, is so rare, that no example, I believe, has ever been adduced by any Philologist; and I have myself only met with one, namely, in Philostr. de Sophia. Vitia, xxi. 3, where, speaking of a party of harvest-men sitting at dinner under an oak-tree, and suddenly killed by lightning, he says, οἱ θερισταί, ἐφ' οὐκ ἕκαστος ἐτυχε πρῶττων (I conjecture παράττων, προσημνης, prosiien), later Greek for παράσσων or παράισσων, occurs in Hom. Il. s. 690. ἀλλὰ παρήξεν λελιμῖνος, where the Schol. explains by παρίδραμι.) οὕτως ἀπῆλθεν (I conjecture ἀπῆλθον). Ὁ μὲν γὰρ κύλικα ἀναγούμενος (render, not raising but in manus elevans; so Hesiod. Theog. 553. χερσὶν οὐ γ' ἀμφοτέρῃσιν ἀνέλειτο λευκὸν ἀλειφαρ), ὁ δὲ πίνων, ὁ δὲ βάπτων (I conjecture ὁ δ' ἐμβ.), ὁ δ' ἐσθίων, ὁ δὲ τι ποίων (I conjecture ὁ δ' ὅ, τι π.), τὰς ψυχὰς ἀφῆκαν.

24. ὑπάγει] 'is going.' The present tense is used to denote the nearness of the things predicted. There is, too, an euphemism, 'is going (unto death),' such as is common to most languages, in words denoting to depart; and of which the Commentators adduce examples, both from the Sept. and the Classical writers. In the Anthol. Gr. vii. 169. we have the complete phrase εἰς δίδην ὑπάγω. [Comp. Ia. xxxviii. 10.]

— καθὼς γέγραπται π. α.] Namely, in Ps. xxii. 1—3. Ia. liii. 8. Dan. ix. 26. Zach. xiii. 7. Καλὸν—ἐγεννήθη is a formula employed by the ancients to express a condition the most miserable; of which examples are adduced by the Commentators. The most apposite is Schemoth R. § 40. p. 135. 'He that knoweth the Law, and doeth it not, it were better for him that he had not come into the world.'

25. σὺ εἶπας.] A form of full assent, and serious affirmation, found not only in Hebrew, but sometimes in Greek and Latin.

26. ἔσθιόντων αὐτῶν.] Some of the best Commentators render, 'when they had eaten;' which sense seems to be required by 1 Cor. xi. 25. μετὰ τὸ δεῖπναι. But ἔσθιόντων scarcely admits of that sense; and the seeming discrepancy may be removed by a mutual accommodation, rendering ἔσθιόντων before, v. 21, 'while they were [yet] eating,' (i. e., as Rosenmüller translates, towards the end of the supper) and the ἔσθιόντων here, 'as they had just finished the paschal feast.'

— τὸν ἄρτον.] Bp. Middleton, on the authority of some MSS., would cancel the τὸν: which he thinks called for by its absence in the parallel passages of Mark and Luke. But it is more probable that the τὸν was cancelled by those who wished to conform the text of Matthew to that of the other Evangelists; which, however, is not necessary; since, though the sense with the Article is more definite (i. e. the loaf, or rather cake, thin and hard, and fitter to be broken than cut. See Note on Ch. xiv. 19.), yet it would be sufficiently intelligible without it. That two cakes of unleavened bread were provided for the Passover, all the accounts testify; though as only one was broken by our Lord, it is no wonder that in the new ordinance founded on the Jewish rite, only one (and that large or small in proportion to the probable number of communicants) should be provided.

— εὐχαριστήσας.] It is not easy to imagine stronger authority of MSS., Versions, Fathers, and early Editions, than that which exists for this reading (instead of the common one ὀλογήσας), which has been with reason adopted by Wetstein, Matthæi, and Scholz. Nevertheless, the common one is retained and defended by Griesbach and Fritz; whose reasons, however, seem light, when weighed against such predominant external evidence. From the term εὐχαριστήσας, the rite afterwards took its name; especially as the service was a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving. Indeed it was customary among the Jews never to take food or drink without returning thanks to God the giver, in prayer, by which it became sanctified.

— ἔκλασε.] Namely, as a type of the breaking of the body of our Redeemer on the cross.

— ἔστι.] All the best Commentators (of course excepting those of the Romish Church) are agreed that the sense of ἔστι is, represents, or signifies; an idiom common in the Hebrew, which wanting a more distinctive term, made use of the verb substantive; a simple form of speech, yet subsisting in the common language of most nations. See Gen. xl. 12. xli. 26. Dan. vii. 23. viii.

21. 1 Cor. x. 4. Gal. iv. 24. Thus the Jews answered their children, who asked respecting the Passover, What is this? This is the body of the lamb which our fathers ate in Egypt. See Bp. Marsh's Lectures, p. 332—335, and especially Dean Turton's examination of the words in which the Eucharist was instituted, P. ii. of his 'Roman Catholic doctrine of the Eucharist considered (in answer to Dr. Wiseman's Lectures), especially § 2, in which he discusses the force of the words of the institution, and shows that they must be understood figuratively, and not, as the Romanists contend, literally.' On the present subject it is justly remarked by Bp. Pearson (on the Creed), that we must not so far stand upon the propriety of speech, when it is written, This is my body, as to destroy the propriety both of the bread and of the body. It is also most acutely observed by Wetstein, that 'while Christ was distributing the bread and wine, the thought could not but arise in the minds of the disciples, What can this mean, and what does it denote? They did not inquire whether the bread which they saw were really bread, or whether another body lay unconspicuously hid in the interstices of the bread, but what this action SIGNIFIED? of what it was a representation or memorial?'

27. τὸ ποτήριον.] Some few MSS. have not the τὸ. But the evidence, both external and internal, for the Article is so strong, that it must be retained. See Bp. Middleton. Hence it should seem that one cup only was used; for (as observes Middleton) 'though four cups of wine were to be emptied at different times during the ceremony, a single cup four times filled was all that the occasion required.' Which of the four is here meant, Commentators are not agreed. It is generally supposed to have been the third, or the cup of blessing; which was regarded as the most important of the four. That the wine was mixed with water, all are agreed; and this custom the Romanists still scrupulously retain; though they hesitate not to violate the next injunction, πῶς ἐξ αὐτοῦ πάντες, by confining the cup to the clergy (as if the words were meant for the Apostles only), notwithstanding that this view is utterly forbidden by the reasons subjoined why all are to drink of it; and in spite of the strong authority of Antiquity, in the practice of the Church up to a comparatively recent period.

28. τοῦτο γάρ—διαθήκη] i. e. 'For this is my blood, by which the new covenant is ratified.' So Luke: τοῦτο τὸ ποτήριον ἡ καινὴ διαθήκη ἐν τῷ αἵματί μου, 'By the administration of this cup I institute a new Religion, to be ratified by my blood.' In the federal sacrifices of the ancients it was (as Grotius and Hammond show) usual to receive the blood in a vessel; which was itself drunk by the more barbarous nations, but the rest to his disciples. And so, indeed, several MSS. and Versions (including the two later Syr. and Vulg.) say in words. It appears, therefore, that this interpretation is untenable; and that the one alone such as can be safely adopted, is that by which βασ. τοῦ Πατρὸς μου is taken for ἐν τῇ βασ. τῶν οὐρανῶν supra viii. 11. Luke xiii. 29. The general sense couched under this strong metaphor is, that 'his departure from them was high at hand, and would prevent his again participating in any future solemnity of the kind, unto the end of the world.' The καινός has a reference to the spiritual nature of that kingdom emphatically termed 'the kingdom of my Father,' even tho' new Jerusalem,' that 'city not made with hands,' 'eternal in the heavens.' So ἡδὴ καινῇ, Rev. v. 9. xiv. 3. This, too, is confirmed by the passage of Luke xxii. 18. The expression γεννήματος τῆς ἀμπέλου is a periphrasis for οἶνου, occurring not only in the Sept., but (at least with a slight change) in the Classical writers; ex. gr. Pind. Nem. ix. 23. ἀμπέλου παῖς. Anacr. Od. i. 7. γόνος ἀμπέλου. Instead of γεννήματος, many MSS. have ἐπιγενήματος, which is edited by Matthæi, on the ground of its greater propriety, and the general usage of the Scriptural writers; where γέννημα is used of men and animals, ἐπι- γέννημα of the fruits of the earth. He acknow- ledges, however, that there is, even in the Clas- sical writers, some diversity of reading. I have not ventured to follow the learned Editor here, because I feel doubtful whether a minute prop- erty like this would be observed, or be even known to those (like the Evangelists), writing in a foreign language.

30. ὑμνήσαντες] 'having sung a hymn;' i. e. either, as some think, one adapted to the rite which Christ had just instituted, (so the Christian hymn mentioned at Acts iv. 24.) or, as most Commentators suppose, the usual Paschal hymn called, κατ' ἑξοχὴν, the Hallel, which comprised the 113th and four following Psalms. Whether it was sung, or recited, has been doubted; but from the Rabbinical researches of Buxtorf and Lightfoot, the former is the more probable.

31. σκανδαλισθήσεσθε] i. e. (as Euthymius explains) σαλευθήσεσθε τὴν εἰς ἐμὲ πίστιν, ἧγουν φύξεσθε, ye shall fall away from, forsake me. [Cf. vmp. John xvi. 32.]

—πατάξω—ποιμήν.] From Zach. xiii. 7, with a slight, but very unimportant, variation from the Heb. and Sept. It is indeed there said of an evil shepherd; but, as Whitby remarks, our Lord applies the passage to himself rather as an argument a fortiori than a prediction. Most recent Commentators (from Grotius) think that this is a proverbial expression, of which they ad- duce examples. But those will only show that there was a similar proverbial expression, not that this is such; which indeed is inconsistent with the ὡς γέγραπται, whereby is indicated a quotation from the Old Test. The true reading in the Sept. is, no doubt, πάταξον (found in many of the best MSS.) But as the terminations ω and ον are very similar (especially in MSS.), so probably πατάξω was a frequent, perhaps the common, reading in the time of Christ. This is much better than supposing, with Owen and Randolph, that the Hebrew is corrupted; for although the first person is not inapplicable in the Evangelist, yet it is quite unsuitable in the Prophet.

32. προάξω ὑμᾶς εἰς τ. Γ.] Here there is a continuation of the pastoral metaphor of the preceding verse; and the force of the figure becomes clear by bearing in mind the Oriental custom, of the shepherd not following but preceding and leading the sheep; which is alluded to in John x. 4. Rosenmuller and Kuinoel think that the sense of προάξω must not be pressed on, since all that is meant is, 'I will see you again in Galilee: expect me in Galilee.' There is, however, something lax and precarious in this sort of interpretation; and it is better to suppose that the general sense (which is, as in other predictions of our Lord at this period, briefly and obscurely worded) is: 'On returning to life, I shall precede you into Galilee;' i. e. I shall first be present in Galilee, where, if you follow me, you will recover your shepherd and leader. [Comp. infra xxviii. 16. Mark xvi. 7.]

33. εἰ καὶ πάντες.] The καὶ is absent from most of the best MSS. and Versions, was rejected by Mill, Bengel, and Wetstein, and cancelled by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, and Scholz, but restored by Fritz., whose reasons, however, are more specious than solid. And there is more reason to suppose it was introduced from Mark, in a great part of the MSS., than that it should have been accidentally omitted in so many as form the remainder. For no one would ever designedly omit it, since no Critic would be ignorant of the sense, even. Whereas some might think that they should strengthen the sense by inserting the καὶ, which, at all events, might make others prefer εἰ καὶ to the καὶ of Mark; which, however, is more agreeable to propriety of language. So Hom. II. v. 316. καὶ εἰ μάλα καρτερόν ἐστιν.

γεῖναι, and φθέγγεσθαι. As the Rabbinical writers have told us that cocks were forbidden to be kept in Jerusalem, because of the 'holy things,' it has been objected that Peter could not hear one crow. But (without cutting the knot by resorting to any unusual sense of ἀλέκτωρ, or disallowing the testimony of the Talmud,) we may, with Reland, maintain that the cock might crow outside of the city; and yet, in the stillness of night, be heard by Peter from the house of Caiaphas, which was situated near the city-wall. And that cocks were kept in the vicinity of the city, there is no reason to doubt. But perhaps the best mode of removing the difficulty would be to render, 'before cock crowing.' So Aristoph. Eccl. 391. ὅτε τὸ δαύτηρον ᾄλεκτρων ἐφθέγγαστο. Moreover, this phrase, like the correspondent one in Latin, is founded upon general custom. [Comp. John xiii. 38.]

It has been thought a contradiction, that Mark xiv. 30. says, πρὶν ἢ δὶς φωνῆσαι. But there will be none, if it be considered that the heathens reckoned two cock crowings; of which the second (about day-break) was the more remarkable, and was that called, κατ' ἔσχατον, the cock-crowing. Thus the sense will be, 'before that time of night, or early morn, which is especially called the cock-crowing, thou shalt deny me thrice.' In Mark (who relates the thing more circumstantially, but with no real discrepancy,) the expression καὶ ἀλέκτωρ ἐφώνησεν may be rendered, 'and it was cock-crowing time;' in Luke and John, ὁ μὴ ἀλέκτωρ φωνῆσει, 'it shall not be cock-crowing time.'

35. κἂν δέῃ με σ. σ. ἀποθανεῖν.] A strong form of expression, of such frequent occurrences in the Classical writers, that it may be regarded as almost proverbial.

— ὁμοίως δέ.] The δε, which is not found in the vulg., is supported by most of the best MSS. and some Versions, Fathers, and early Editions; and it has been restored by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Fritz., and Scholz. It is required by the propriety of language.

36. Γεθσημανῆ.] Heb. גֶּתְשֶׁמָנִי, 'place of oil presses;' situated at the foot of the Mount of Olives. Not, what some have supposed, the oil-lage in which the produce of the Mount of Olives was prepared for use; for the term χωρίον can only mean a field or close, as in Thucyd. i. 106. Pans. i. 29, 2; as, indeed, is plain from the very ratio significationis of the word, which is from χωρίω (cognate with χωρίζω), to set apart, take in, or enclose; whence χωρίς, apart. They were

In he περι is intensive, as in the words περιφόβος, περιδῆς, and περιπα- θανάτου is intensive of the sense. 9. λελύπημαι ἕως θανάτου. See 8. The eminent scholar Valcknaer the aptness of the expression in its tion to the sufferings of our Saviour, forma hominis, Dæum tegens, et humanorum pondere pressus, pæne . With respect to the nature of this ch as far transcends the powers of nderstanding, in their present imper- fully comprehend, and to which the investigations that ever have, or made, must be inadequate. On so storious a subject, little is it that we nd to one so awfully sublime, wo ch too humbly and reverently. That not simply death (as some of the preters understood) we may be very t the agony was occasioned (as some rough the divine ιερὰ, by our be- bearing the sins of the world, is y objections; as is also the opinion, had then a severe spiritual conflict t Enemy of mankind. The deadly so doubt, produced by a variety of from his peculiar situation and cir- and which it were presumptuous too minutely to scan. At the same, time, however, we may rest assured that our Lord's agony was, in some mysterious way, connected with the offer- ing of himself as a sacrifice for the sins of the world, and the procuring of the redemption of mankind.

39. προσελθὼν.] Many of the best MSS. have προσελθὼν, which is received into the text by Matthæi and Scholz, and strenuously defended by them; but on precarious grounds. The common reading has been rightly retained by Griesbach and Fritz.; for it is in vain to urge MS. authority in words so perpetually confounded as προ and προς in composition. But even were that waived, and MSS. were in favour of προς, yet the testi- mony of Versions and Fathers, all of them on the side of προ, would turn the scale in favour of the common reading. Besides, προς is capable of no tolerable sense, except by a most harsh ellipse.

— εἰ δυνατόν εἰ.] 'We are here (says Grotius) to distinguish between what is impossible per se, and what is impossible hoc vel illo pacto. Now per se nothing is impossible with God, except such things as are in themselves inconsistent, or else are repugnant to the Divine nature. The sense, therefore, is, "if it be consistent with the counsels of thy Providence for the salvation of men." Thus the words are perfectly reconcil- eable with those of the parallel passage of Mark xiv. 36, πάντα δυνατά σοι. Similar sentiments are quoted from the Classical writers. In παρελ- θίτω—τὸ ποτήριον there is (as appears from the Classical citations) a figure derived from a cup being carried past any one at a feast. So Ana- creon, παρίρχεται; μὴ κάτχει. We may notice the bold figure involved in ποτήριον, similar to that in Isaiah li. 17, 'who hast drunk at the hand of the Lord the cup of his fury; hast drunken the dregs of the cup of trembling;' with which I would compare a very sublime passage of Æschyl. Agam. 1367, τάδ' ἀνδραγαθῶς ἦν, ὑπερδίκως μὲν οὖν Τροσάνῳ κρατῆρ' ἐν δόμοις κακῶν ὅδε Πηλεΐδας ἀράων, αὐτὸν ἐκπίνει μολών. [Comp. John xii. 27. Hebr. v. 7, 8.]

40. οὕτως] 'ίταne? sicine?' For οὕτως, like εἶτα and some other particles, is so used with in- terrogations, as to denote wonder mixed with cen- sure. See Hom. Il. β. 23, and Od. ε. 204. From the natural sense of the term γρηγορία our Lord now passes to the metaphorical, and en- grafts upon it an exhortation to Christian watch- fulness; on which subject see an excellent Ser- mon on this text by Dr. South, vol. vi. 353, where, after observing that, 'in the Christian warfare, the two great defenses against tempta- tion are watching and prayer,' he remarks, I. that watching implies, in the first place, a sense of the greatness of the evil we contend against: 2dly, a diligent survey of the power of the enemy, compared with the weakness and treachery of our own hearts; 3dly, a consideration of the ways by which temptation has prevailed on ourselves or others; 4thly, a continual attention to the danger, in opposition to remissness; 5thly, a constant and rigid temperance. II. That Prayer is rendered effectual, 1st, by fervency or importunity; 2dly, by constancy or perseverance. III. That Watching and Prayer must be always united; the first without the last being but presumption; the last without the first a mockery. So Bp. Bull. Harm. Ap. p. 13, well observes, 'gratiam non dari nisi assidue petentibus. Scilicet et ipse Dominus hæc duo conjunxit, προσοχὴν καὶ προσευχὴν, eoque nos docuit, quam apud conspiret cum humanâ diligentia auxilium divinum. Qui enim vigilare jubetur, non agitur ut nervis alienis mobile lignum; qui precari, ostenditur opis divinæ indigere, sine quâ inanis humana industria.'

41. εἰσελθῆτε.] Eiselen is here used, like ἐμπίπτειν in 1 Tim. vi. 9, in the sense to fall under, meaning to succumb. Our Lord does not direct them to pray to God that no temptation might befall them; but that they might not be overcome by the temptations in which they must be involved; and to pray for extraordinary spiritual assistance under them.

—τὸ μὲν πνεῦμα—ἀσθενής.] This is meant not as an excuse for their frailty, but as an incentive to greater vigilance, accompanied with prayer.

42. πάλιν ἐκ δευτέρου.] Some would refer πάλιν to ἀπελθὼν, and ἐκ δευτ. (scil. χρόνου) to προσηύξατο. But the Classical examples adduced by the Commentators show that the words must be taken together: in which there is not (as some imagine) a pleonasm, but a stronger expression.

43. βεβαρημένοι.] Sub. ὕπνω; though the ellipse is rarely supplied.

45. καθεύδατε τὸ λοιπόν.] This seems so inconsistent with the subsequent exhortation ἐγείρεσθε! ἀγώμεν! that many Commentators take the sentence interrogatively; q. d. 'do ye yet sleep?' But this is doing violence to the construction, and is (as Fritz. shows) contrary to the usus loquendi; which will not permit τὸ λοιπόν to be taken in any other sense than 'in ceterum tempus.' Vain is it to urge that the interrogation is required by Luke xxii. 46, τί καθεύδετε, since the two addresses may have been quite distinct, each taking place, but at different times. It is better with Chrysost., Euthym., Erasmus, Beza, Grotius, and some recent Commentators (as Schmid. and Fritz.), to suppose a kind of slightly ironical rebuke; q. d. ['Since you have hitherto failed to watch] sleep on the remainder of the night, and take your rest [if you can.] So Virg. Æn. iv. 560. Potes hoc sub casu ducere somnos? Yet it may be doubted whether irony be suitable to the deep solemnity of the occasion; or if so, whether we are justified in supplying so many words. Not to say that this view of the sense is forbidden by the parallel passage of Mark, in which we have added, ἀπέχει (answering to ἰκανόν ἔστι in Luke) 'sufficit, the time is over, it is enough;' q. d. I no longer need your assiduity, [inasmuch as I shall now have Angels ministering unto me]. Hence the imperatives are (as Theophylact, Rosenm. and Kuinoel suggest) to be taken permissively; as in Matt. xxiii. 32, ὑμεῖς πληροῦσατε τὸ μέτρον τῶν πατέρων ὑμῶν. There is something not dissimilar in the use of ἰκανόν ἔστι at Luke xxii. 38. In such cases a mild censure is implied, the nature of which must be determined by the context. I have here pointed ἀναπαύεσθε, because there seems to be a break-off of the sentence peranthesis: and the words ἰδοὺ, ἤγγικεν—ἁμαρτωλῶν are in some degree parenthetical.

—ἡ ὥρα.] Scil. τῆς παραδόσεως, as Euthym. rightly supplies. The καὶ following signifies and, by what some call a Hebraism; though it is found in Herodot., Thucyd., and other Classical writers.

—ἁμαρτωλῶν] i. e. the Romans, as being heathens; though it would apply, in another sense, to the Jews.

47. ξύλων] 'lignorum,' clubs and such like tumultuary weapons. Such, however, would scarcely have been borne by Roman soldiers;

though John xviii. 3, speaks of a Roman σπαῖρα. That expression, however, must be understood in a more general sense of less than a cohort. And these might be stationed at some little distance, to aid the civil power.

48. κατεφίλησεν.] Agreeably to the customary mode of salutation in ancient times, especially in the East; which is still retained in Spain and some parts of Italy and France. In the Classical writers the κατα is usually intensive; but in the Sept. both the simple and the compound are used indifferently. Here we may suppose an intensity of signification, very suitable to the character of the discenter.

50. ἔταῖρε.] This is best regarded as a common form of address, though generally implying some degree of contempt, or, as here, reproach.

— ἐφ' ᾧ.] Most of the best MSS., together with some Fathers, and early Edd., have ἐφ' ᾧ, which is edited by Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Fritz, and Scholz. It is scarcely possible to determine the true reading, because the signification of purpose is expressed both by the Dative and the Accus. Yet, if the phrase occurred in a Classical writer, I should not hesitate to edit ἐφ' ᾧ; for I am not aware of any unimpeachable examples of the simple δε in this sense used in the Accus., but many of the Dative. See my Note on Thucyd. i. 134, ἐφ' ᾧ ἐχώρει. The case is different with respect to the compounds δοῖς, δοῖς, &c. There Classical use employs alone the Accus.

51. ἀπέσπασε.] This is Hellenistic Greek for ῥάσσει, or ῥάσαστο, and occurs elsewhere only in the LXX. Μάχαιρα, meaning the cut-lance which travellers in Judæa used to carry for security against the robbers who infested the country. Ἀφείλε is for ἀπέτιμε or ἀπέκοψε, as in John. An Alexandrian or Hellenistic use; for, except the New Test. and Sept., it has only been found in Polyænus. A parallel, however, exists in the Latin auferre, and in the common dialect of our own language.

— τὸ ὠτίον.] Meaning certainly the whole ear, and not (as Grotius would understand) the tip of it; for that is inconsistent with the οὐκ in the parallel passage of Luke. Besides, ὠτίον is not infrequently used in the LXX. for οὐκ. And (as Lobeck on Phryn. p. 211, observes,) the common dialect calls most parts of the body by diminutives, as τὰ ῥινία, and τὸ ὀμμάτιον. [Comp. John xviii. 10.]

52. πάντες γὰρ ἀπολούνται.] Some ancient and several modern Commentators consider these words as a prediction of the destruction of the Jews, who took up the sword unjustly against Christ and his disciples (see Rev. xiii. 10): while others, as Elsner, Campbell, Kuinoel, and Fritz, regard it as a proverbial saying against repelling force by force, and the exercise of private vengeance; importing that those who shall defend themselves by the sword, will, or may, perish by the sword. Of course, it must be taken, as it regarded the disciples, with restriction, and be here applied to those who take up the sword against the magistrate. Perhaps, however, a double sense may have been intended, 1st, for caution (including an intimation that swords were not to be defended); and 2dly, by way of prediction, which would suggest the best argument for non-resistance. [Comp. Gen. ix. 6, Rev. xiii. 10.]

53. Ἡ δοκεῖς, &c.] The connection seems to be this: 'Or [if that argument will not avail, take this—that I need not thy assistance, for] thinkest thou,' &c. The argument in this and the following verse is, that such conduct implied both distrust in Divine Providence, and ignorance of Scripture: would be at once unlawful and unnecessary; unlawful, because contrary to the spirit of his religion; unnecessary, because he could, if he judged it expedient, call to his aid superhuman and irresistible power. The term ἄρτι is very significant, denoting even in this crisis. Καὶ παραστήσει, 'and he would bring to my aid.' As to the number which follows, it is better (with some of the best Commentators), not to press upon it, much less deduce any inferences from it, since it only denotes a very great number.

54. ἔτι.] Supply αὶ λέγουσαι. Or, as this ellipse is harsh, we may, with Fritz, take ἔτι in the sense nam. Thus there should be a mark of interrogation after γραφῆαι, and a period after γενέσθαι. [Comp. Isa. liii. 7, 8, 10. Luke xxiv. 25.]

56. τοῦτο δὲ—προφητῶν.] Some ascribe this observation to the Evangelist; but others, more properly (as appears from Mark xiv. 49), to Christ.

— τότε οἱ μαθηταί, &c.] See John xviii. 15. 57. ἀπήγαγον πρὸς Κ.] i. e. 'after having been first taken to Annas' (as we learn from John xviii. 13), in order, it should seem, to do him honour, and while the Sanhedrim was collecting. Ἀπάγειν is a term appropriate to leading any one to trial or execution.

58. τῆς αὐλῆς] the inner court of the palace.

59. ἐήτουν ψευδομαρτυρίαν.] We need not suppose that they suborned false witnesses. Had they done this (for which, indeed, there was then no time, in the hurry with which their determination to take Jesus' life was formed and carried into effect), they would have tutored their witnesses better than to be rejected even by themselves. But the meaning seems to be, that, though they professed to inquire for true evidence, yet they readily entertained any, whether true or false, that might criminate Jesus. Nay, they studiously sought and encouraged the latter; whilst, on the other hand, all testimony in his favour was (by the Jewish law) rejected; for, though it was permitted to say any thing, true or untrue, against false prophets or persons suspected of idolatry, no man was permitted to appear in their behalf. But to return to the words in question: the best view that can be taken of them is, that the judgment of the Evangelist is blended with his narrative, as is not unfrequent in ancient writers. In St. Mark, indeed, instead of ψευδομαρτυρίαν, we have simply μαρτυρίαν. At οὐχ εὑρον just after, we must supply μαρτυρίαν (taken from ψευδομαρτυρίαν), by which is to be understood μαρτυρίαν ἱκανήν, or, as Mark expresses it, ἰσχυρὴν. [Comp. Acts vi. 13.]

60. οὐχ εὑρον.] These words are wanting in some MSS., Versions, and Fathers; are rejected by Campbell, and cancelled by Griesbach, but retained by Fritz. and Scholz; rightly, since internal as well as external evidence is in their favour. As to the authority of the Versions, it is slender in a point of this kind. And we have here not a mere repetition (as the ancient Critics, who cut the words out, supposed), but a repetition for emphasis; the kai denoting yea.

61. δύναμαι—αὐτόν.] This was (as appears from Mark xiv. 58, and John ii. 19), in effect a fulsity, by the suppression of some words of Christ, together with the action which explained them, and adding others. Hence the witnesses are justly termed ψευδομάρτυρες. By this temple our Lord plainly meant his body. If it could have been proved that Jesus had spoken irreverently of the temple, by predicting its destruction, that would have afforded some ground for a charge of blasphemy, which was a capital offence. The High Priest, however, finding that even this testimony could scarcely afford any colour for the charge, artfully changed his ground.

63. ἐξορκίζω σε, &c.] This seems to have been the most solemn form of administering an oath. Ὁρκίζω and ἐξορκ. are used in the LXX. to express the Heb. נִשְׁבַּע, 'to make to swear, to swear in,' to put to one's oath. The syntax is an Accus. of the person sworn (whether witness or criminal), and a Genit. with κατὰ, or sometimes an Accus., without a preposition, of the deity sworn by. The ἐξ denotes the extension of the oath; and κατὰ has reference to the stretching of the hand upon or towards the person or object sworn by. As this oath of adjuration brought an obligation, under the curse of the Law, it imperatively claimed a reply, when the adjuration accompanied an interrogation; and the answer thus returned was regarded as an answer on oath; in which case falsity was accounted perjury. Thus, our Lord, who had before disclaimed to reply to an unfounded, and even absurd charge, (especially before judges who had predetermined to find him guilty), now thought himself bound to answer, as an example to others of reverence towards so solemn a form.

— ὁ Χριστὸς, ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ.] Grotius and Whitby remark, that from this and other passages (as Matt. xvi. 16), it is clear that the Jews expected their Messiah to be Son of God (interpreting the 2d Psalm as said of him); which title, is also certain, they understood as implying Divinity, otherwise the High Priest could not have declared the assumption of it to be blasphemy. For 'Blasphemy (as observes Dr. Pyc Smith, Scrip. Test. vol. ii. 56) is justly defined by Schleusner to be, the saying or doing any thing by which the majesty of God is insulted, uttering curses or reproaches against God, speaking impiously, arrogating and taking to oneself that which belongs to God. In this latter sense the Jews manifestly understood it, when they said, "We stone thee for blaspheming, and that thou, being a man, makest thyself God." 'Now what blasphemy (says Mr. Coleridge, Table Talk, i. 142.) could there be,—unless the assuming to be the Son of God was assuming to be of the Divine nature? That the Jews did so believe of their expected Messiah, has been thoroughly proved; but by none more convincingly than by the writer of the Lettres de quelques Juifs à M. Voltaire.
 Supra 25, and Note.

64. 'Ἀπ' ἄρτι is ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν, (used by Luke), which, by a slight accommodation, may mean μετὰ μικρόν, as Euthym. here explains. The words following have reference to the sublime imagery descriptive of the Messiah's advent in Dan. vii. 13, 14. [See infra xxiv. 30, and Note xxv. 31. 1 Thess. iv. 16.]

— τῆς δυνάμεως] τοῦ Θεοῦ; literally, the Power, abstract for concrete, as we say 'the Almighty'; (see Heb. i. 3; viii. 1. 1 Pet. iv. 14.) in idiom founded on the Jewish mode of ex-pressing the Deity, קוּדְשׁ, the Powerful One. Ques. in Luke xxii. 69, and sometimes in Philo

Jud., τοῦ Θεοῦ is added, as it were, to determine the sense. Hence the expression is not ill rendered in the Peshito Syr. ܡܠܟܐ; though it is wrongly translated by Schaaf viculus. Rather, Numinus, as in 2 Thess. ii. 4. The ultræ here meant signifies, primarily at least, the coming of Christ to take vengeance on the Jews at the destruction of Jerusalem; and secondarily, but chiefly, his final advent to judge the world.

65. διέρρηξε τὰ ἱμάτια.] It was a custom among the ancients to express the more violent passions, especially grief and indignation, by rending the garments, either partly, or from top to bottom, but sometimes from bottom to top.

— ἴδε.] Said by the Commentators to be put for ἴδετε. But it is better to consider it as a particle of exclamation, as often.

66. ἐνοχος θανάτου.] Ἐνοχος (derived from the preterite middle of ἐνέχω) is equivalent to ἐνέχόμενος, and signifies, 1. 'held fast' by, bound to; 2. being subject, or liable to.' In this last sense it is used properly with the Dative (as in the LXX., New Test., and the Classical writers; but sometimes with the Genit., as in the present passage and Mark iii. 29, and occasionally in the Classical writers; in which syntax there is commonly thought to be an ellipse of κρίματι. But it should rather seem that the construction is like that of Plato, Apolog. p. 83. τιμᾶται μοι ὁ ἀνὴρ θανάτου.

67. ἐνέπτυσαν—αὐτοῦ.] A mode of expressing the utmost contempt, common both to ancient and modern times: on which, and the other marks of contumely accumulated on the head of our Lord, see Horne's Introd. iii. 161, sqq.

— ἐκολάφισαν.] Between κολαφίζω and ραπίζω there is the same distinction in signification as between our verbs to thump and to slap. [Comp. infra xxvii. 30. Isa. i. 6.]

68. προφήτευσον ἡμῖν, &c.] To understand this, it is proper to bear in mind (what we learn from Mark and Luke), that Christ was blindfolded when these words were pronounced; in which there was a taunt on his arrogating the title of Messiah, and a play on the double sense of προφητεύειν, which (as also μαντεύεσθαι) is often used in a sense corresponding to our verb to divine, or guess.

tibule, called by Matthew πύλων, but by Mark περιαύλιον.

— παιδίσκη.] The word properly signifies a girl; but, as in our own language, it was often, in later Greek, used to denote a maid servant. She is by John xviii. 17. styled ἡ Συρωρὸς, where see Note. Καὶ σὺ ἡ. μ. 'I. may be rendered, 'Thou, too, wert one of the party with Jesus;' for εἶναι μετὰ τινος often denotes 'to be on any one's side.'

70. οὐκ οἶδα τί λέγεις.] A form expressive of strong denial. So Soph. Aj. 270. οὐ κάτοιδ' ὅπως λέγεις. For reconciliations of the minute seeming discrepancies in various parts of the narrative, see Recens. Synop.

71. ἄλλη.] Luke says ἄλλοι. There was probably more than one who spoke to this effect.

72. ὅτι οὐκ οἶδα.] Ὅτι, like the Hebrew particles ו and כ, after verbs of swearing and affirming, denotes profecto, ἡ μὴν, οὐτως. (Kuin.) It should rather seem that there is here an ellipsis of λέγων, implied in ἠρνήσατο.

73. οἱ ἐστῶτες] for παρεστώτες, 'those who stood [by or near];' as John i. 35. iii. 29. xviii. 18.

— ἡ λαλιά σου δηλὸν σε ποιεῖ.] 'thy dialect bewrayeth thee.' Different provinces of the same country have usually their distinct idioms, accent, &c., which in the remoter parts are more strongly marked. That this was the case with Galilee, we learn from the Rabbinical writers, who tell us that the speech of the Galileans was broad and rustic.

74. καταναθεματίζειν.] The best, and by far the greater part of the MSS. have καταθεματίζειν, which was preferred by Mill, Bengel, and Wetstein, and has been adopted by Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittmann, and Scholz. But it is not easy to see how καταθεματίζειν can be reconciled to analogy, or yield any sense suitable to the context (for it can only mean deponere), or possibly be synonymous with καταναθεματίζειν. It is, besides, destitute of any authority beyond the present passage; except that of the Ecclesiastical writers, who plainly took it from their MSS. of the New Test. And as ἀνὰ might easily slip out, or be lost, by an inattention to a mark of abbreviation, the authority of MSS. has far less weight than the usus linguae. I have, therefore, thought proper, with Vater and Fritz., to retain the common reading.

75. On the salutary lesson to be learnt here, see an admirable Sermon of Bp. Sanderson on the subject of the fall of Peter.

XXVII. 1. πρωίας δὲ γεν.] The meeting of the Sanhedrim could not be held till the morning, since the courts of the Temple were never opened by night; nor, if they had been then held, could judgment have been pronounced; for among the Jews justice was administered only in the day time.

2. δῆσαντες.] This word is, on account of John xviii. 12. (whence it appears that Christ had been bound before) by most Commentators supposed to be put for δεδεμένον. That, however, is too violent a way of removing the discrepancy. It is better, with Elsner and Fritz., to suppose that our Lord's bonds had been removed during examination, and were now again put on him.

— ἡγεμόνι.] So he is sometimes styled by Josephus also; though, properly speaking, Pilate was only an ἐπίτροπος, or Procurator, as Joseph. and Philo often call him. He was indeed virtually ἡγεμών, because he (as was not unusual in the lesser provinces) had entrusted to him the authority of ἡγεμών, as if President (which included the administration of justice, and the power of life and death); in subordination, however, to the President of Syria, to whom was an appeal en dernier ressort.

μεταμεληθεὶς ἀπέστρεψε τὰ τριάκοντα ἀργύρια τοῖς ἀρχιερεῦσι καὶ τοῖς πρεσβυτέροις, λέγων· Ἡμαρτον παραδούς αἷμα ἀθῶον. Οἱ δὲ εἶπον· Τί πρὸς ἡμᾶς; σὺ ὤφει. 5^c Καὶ ρίψας τὰ ἀργύρια ἐν τῷ ναῷ, ἀνεχώρησε· καὶ ἀπελ- 6θὼν ἀπήγγατο. Οἱ δὲ ἀρχιερεῖς, λαβόντες τὰ ἀργύρια, 7 τιμὴ αἵματος ἐστὶ. Συμβούλιον δὲ λαβόντες ἡγόρασαν ἐξ αὐτῶν τὸν ἀγρὸν τοῦ κεραμέως, εἰς ταφὴν τοῖς ξένοις. c 2 Sam. 17. d Acts i. 18.

3. μεταμεληθεὶς.] On this is chiefly founded the opinion of some of the ancient Fathers, as well as many eminent modern Commentators (as Whitby, Rosenmuller, Kuinoel, and A. Clarke), that Judas was partly induced to betray his Master by the expectation that, as Messiah, he could not suffer death, but would no doubt deliver himself from their hands, in some such way as he had done aforesaid. But the language of our Lord (see supra xxvi. 24. and John xvii. 12.), and of Peter, Acts i. 25, forbids us to suppose that his repentance was sincere, or ought but the remorse of an upbraiding conscience. Indeed, we have every reason to suppose that, as he was originally actuated solely by avarice, so was he now possessed wholly with despair. He could not bear the stings of remorse, sharpened as they would be by the contempt and abhorrence of all good men, whether Christ's disciples or not; for, as it is acutely remarked by Elsner, 'apud improbos conscientia vigilare non solet, nisi quum res ei conculcatur.'

— ἀπέστρεψε] 'returned.' Thus, indeed, making good the words of Job xx. 15, 'He hath swallowed down riches, and he shall vomit them up again: God shall cast them out of his belly.'

4. αἷμα ἀθῶον] 'an innocent person.' A signification frequent in the Sept., Philo, and other Hellenistic writers; by which αἷμα corresponds to σάρξ καὶ αἷμα. The word ἀθῶος indeed properly, and always in the Classical writers, signifies impunis, the not being liable to punishment. Yet the Hellenistic usage is not only defensible, but perhaps more agreeable to the primary signification of the word.

— σὺ ὤφει.] A milder form for the Imperative; 'thou wilt, or ought to see to that: be that thy care.' A Latinism from tu videris, for which the Greek Classical writers either used σοὶ μάλιτα, or employed the Imperative.

5. ἐν τῷ ναῷ.] Not the vaos properly (for he could not have entered there), but probably at its entrance.

— ἀπελθὼν ἀπήγγατο.] The plain import of the words would seem to be, 'he went and hanged himself'; a sense supported by the ancient Versions. Since, however, it has been thought inconsistent with the account given by Peter (Acts i. 18.) of the death of Judas, many methods of interpretation have been devised to reconcile this discrepancy. See Recens. Synop. But, after all, there is nothing to authorize us to desert the common signification of ἀπάγγισθαι (wherein the reflected sense is to be noticed, on which see Thucyd. iii. 81.), nor any reason to doubt that Judas hanged himself, as Διόδοτος did before him, 2 Sam. xvii. 23. It is very probable that he selected that mode of suicide, simply because it was frequent; (of the expression itself, ἀπελθὼν ἀπήγγατο, &c. several examples have been adduced, both from the Sept. and the Classical writers.) And, as we shall see further on, it involves no real discrepancy with St. Luke's account. Whereas the other interpretations are (as I have shown in Recens. Synop.) open to many objections. Thus even that which assigns the sense 'was suffocated,' (literally suffocated himself,) introduces a signification which cannot with certainty be established; for though in Herodot. ii. 131. ἡ παῖς ἀπήγγατο ὑπὸ ἀχέου may, with Perizon., be rendered, 'was suffocated with grief' (an effect of mental agony which is known to sometimes occur), yet it seems far better to render the expression, with the Editors in general, 'hanged herself;' a sense occurring also at vii. 232. of the same writer: λέγεται—ἄλλον ἀγγαλόν—ὡς ἡτίμωτο, ἀπάγγασθαι. Besides, the context, and the use of the expression ἀπελθὼν, point to an action, not to any thing of so passive a nature as dying of grief. The best mode of reconciling the apparent discrepancy is, to suppose (with Casaubon, Raphel, Krebs, Kuinoel, Schleus., and Fritz.), that after he had suspended himself, probably from a branch of a tree overhanging a precipice, the rope breaking, or giving way (from the noose slipping, or otherwise), he fell down headlong, and, from falling on some prominent and sharp substance, burst asunder, so that his bowels protruded. Thus, in a Rabbinical writer cited by Wets. on Acts i. 18. 'quidam de tecto in plateam decidit, et ruptus est enter, et viscera ejus effluerunt.' Πιρηνὴς in the passage of Acts may be taken, like our headlong, simply of falling down from a high place, as in the examples adduced in Recens. Synop. And this view is confirmed by the air of the expression, which implies falling from on high. Thus the narration in Matthew is completely reconciled with that in the Acts, by supposing, that in the former is recorded the kind of death by which Judas sought destruction; and in the latter, that by which he made his final exit; and which, at least, was the event or result of the other.

6. κορβανῶν.] The word is Syriac, and signifies 1st, something offered, an offering; and, by use, an offering to the sacred treasury; 2dly, the place for the offering, or treasury itself, which consisted of chests placed in the Court of the Women.

7. τὸν ἀγρὸν τοῦ κεραμέως.] The Article τοῦ expresses a particular field known by that name; so called from having been occupied by a potter: no doubt to dig clay for his wares. Thus several villages in England have the prefix, Potter; probably from part of the ground having been formerly occupied for potteries. And so the field at Athens, appropriated as a cemetery for those who fell in the service of the country, was called Ceranicus, from having been formerly used for brick-making; so also the Tuilleries at Paris. This, of course, would make a field unfit for tillage; though good enough for a burying ground. And thus the smallness of the price may be accounted for.

—τοῖς ἔξωτοις.] It is debated by the Commentators whether by these we are to understand foreign Jews, sojourning at Jerusalem for religious or other purposes, or Gentile foreigners. The latter, for the reasons which I have assigned in Recens. Synop., is by far the most probable.

9. τὸ ῥῆθὲν διὰ Ἱερ.] The following passage is not found in Jeremiah; but something very like it, and, as it seems, the very prophecy, occurs in Zach. xi. 12, 23; which has induced some to suppose a corruption of the names, arising from MS. abbreviations. The best solution, however, of the difficulty is to suppose, either that Matthew simply wrote διὰ τοῦ προφήτου, omitting, as he often does, the name of the prophet (and indeed Ἱερ. is omitted in a few MSS. and several of the ancient Versions); or, since Mede and Bp. Kidder have shown it to be highly probable that Jeremiah was the writer of the Chapter from which these words are taken, as well as the two former, to suppose that the Evangelist wrote from that opinion. To advert to the words themselves, every grammatical machine has been put in motion to reconcile them with what is found in the Hebrew and Sept., but all in vain. Much trouble, however, might have been spared, had it been considered that we have not a citation, but an application of the words of the prophecy or vision; which was, no doubt, intended to pre-signify the train of events recorded by the Evangelists. Indeed, so little other purport has it, that the Jews themselves have always referred the words to the Messiah.

As to the mode in which the words in question are to be taken, there is no reason to abandon the common interpretation, confirmed by Euthymius, according to which τινὲς must be supplied at ἀπὸ υἱῶν Ἰ. It indeed involves a somewhat harsh ellipse,—but not so harsh as the method Fritz has adopted in its place,—namely, to take the words of Judas. Besides, that makes δὲν τιμήσαντο a most offensive pleonasm. Whereas, according to the common interpretation, the words δὲν τιμήσαντο—Ἱερ. are exegetical of the preceding. It is well observed by Vater, 'latet τινὲς in v. ἀπὸ, ut alibi in v. ἐκ. Conf. Matth. xxiii. 24.' There may seem some difficulty in καθὰ—Κύριος; the best way of removing which is to suppose, that these words (corresponding to חָמַשׁ שֶׁקֶל of the Hebrew) are left by the Evangelist unaccommodated. Campbell and others would take ἔλαβον as the first person, and read ἔδωκα. Thus we must render, 'I took the thirty shekels (the price of him that was valued, whom they valued), from the sons of Israel (and they gave them for the potter's field), as the Lord appointed me.' But this is destitute of any authority, and does such violence to the words, that no dependence can be placed on a sense thus extorted. With respect to τοῦ τιμημένου, the best Commentators regard it as taken, per metonymiam, in the sense purchased, referring to Theod. i. 33. πρὸ πολλῶν χρημάτων—ἐτιμήσαντο. But perhaps τιμᾶσθαι may here be used in the sense to have a price set on one's head. Now when it is said that the Priests agreed with Judas for 30 pieces of silver, it is implied that they offered him that sum; which, indeed, might be expected from his inquiry, 'What will ye give me?'

11. σὺ εἶ ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν Ἰ.] i. e. 'dost thou claim to be king of the Jews?' To this the σὺ λέγεις following is a form of solemn asseveration. (See Note on xxvi. 64.) With which Pricæus compares the dicta of Plautus. Hence may be seen the true force of our affirmatives aye and yes, which are both derived from the old French oïez. The sense, therefore, is, 'You say the truth—(I am a king).' From John xviii. 36, it appears, that this declaration was made after our Lord had said that his kingdom was not of this world, i. e. not temporal. On the order of the events recorded in this and the following verses, see Euthymius and Kuinoel in Recens. Synop. who have skillfully adjusted the harmony, and illustrated the connection and mutual bearing of the circumstances. [Comp. John xviii. 33. 37. 1 Tim. vi. 13.]

14. οὐδὲ ἓν.] A stronger expression than σὺ δὲν. [Comp. Is. liii. 7.]

15. κατὰ δὲ ἑορτὴν, &c.] The Commentators are not agreed whether by κατ' ἑορτὴν we are to understand 'at least time,' or, 'at the paschal feast.' The latter opinion is thought to be proved by John xviii. 39. And though that passage be not decisive, yet, according to propriety of language, this would seem to be the best founded opinion. See Middleton. There will be little difficulty in supposing, that as ἑορτὴ would of itself, without addition, most readily suggest the idea of the paschal feast, so κατ' ἑορτὴν would mean at the paschal feast. Indeed, it is used precisely in this way in Joseph. B. J. i. 11. 5. Whether the custom here mentioned was old, or new, has been debated; but it has, I think, been satisfactorily shown to be the latter. It was probably derived, either from the Syrians, or from the Greeks and Romans; the former of whom had such a custom at their Thesmophoria, the latter at their Lectisternia.

16. ἐπίσημον.] Ἐπίσημος signifies, 1. signatus, bearing a stamp; 2. notabilis, in a good sense; 3. notabilis, in a bad sense, as in the Latin famosus.

18. διὰ φθόνου] 'bitter hatred;' by a metonymy of the effect for the cause.

19. τοῦ βήματος.] See Recens. Synop. or Horne's Introd., vol. iii. p. 131. Μηδὲν σοὶ—ἐκείνῳ. Sub. γινώσκω.

—τῷ δικ. ἐκείνῳ.] Meaning, 'to this innocent man.' See v. 24. Here supply ἴστω.

—κατ' ὄναρ.] It has been much debated whether this dream was natural, or supernatural. The latter view was maintained by the Fathers and the earlier Commentators; as the former is by most of the recent Interpreters. And, indeed, we may so well account for the thing from natural causes (history having recorded many similar cases), that we are not required—perhaps scarcely warranted,—to call in the supernatural. Σύμμερον may mean, '[early] this morning.' And morning dreams were supposed to be most veracious, nay ominous.

21. [Comp. Acts iii. 14.]

23. τί γὰρ κακὸν ἐπ.] The γὰρ has reference to a clause omitted, expressing a refusal of the punishment demanded, q. d. 'Not so, or why so, for,' &c. That this is not a Hebraism (as some have thought) is evident from the Classical examples which have been adduced by Krebs.

24. ὅτι οὐδὲν ὠφελεῖ] 'se nihil proficere,' that he is doing no good, effecting nothing.

—μᾶλλον] 'the rather,' 'yet more.' An intensive use of μάλλον, as often in the New Test.

—ἀπενίψατο τὰς χεῖρας.] A symbolical action, to express being guiltless of the thing: a custom, as regarded the Jews, founded on the precept of Deut. xxi. 6, 7, where, in case of a murder of which the perpetrator is unknown, the elders of the nearest town are commanded to wash their hands, in testimony of their innocence, over the victim which was sacrificed for expiation of the crime. So also Ps. xxvi. 6. 'I will wash my hands in [testimony of my] innocency.' It has, indeed, been disputed among Commentators, whether Pilate here followed Jewish or Gentile custom. But, considering the purpose of the action, namely, to testify his innocence to the people, the former is the more probable. Besides, there has never been any proof admitted that such a custom subsisted among the Gentiles. For the Gentile custom to which Commentators appeal, was only that of washing the hands, not to attest innocence, but to expiate crime, though involuntary. It is not, indeed, impossible that the use of this symbolical action existed among the Gentiles; but if so, it was probably rather (according to the import of the phrase with us) to express that 'one will have no participation in any thing, nor be answerable for the blame incurred thereby.' It is plain, however, from Pilate's words, and the answer made to them by the people, that more than this was meant; namely, to solemnly attest his innocence, and to cast on them the guilt of the crime. And as Pilate had lived long enough in Judæa to become thoroughly acquainted with Jewish customs, and would be more likely to adopt a Jewish form, for the satisfaction of the Jewish people, no doubt can well be entertained but that the action was done according to Jewish, not Gentile custom.

— ἀπὸ τοῦ αἵμα.] The ἀπὸ is added by Hebraism; on which see Fritz.

— δικαίον is here (as supra ver. 19.) taken by Casaubon, Le Clerc, Campbell, and others, in a forensic sense, i. e. 'innocent of the crime laid to his charge.' But perhaps the forensic and ordinary senses are combined; q. d. 'this innocent man and just person.' To the latter Pilate bore testimony in a dispatch sent to the Emperor Tiberius. Ὑμεῖς ὄψεσθε, 'ye must look to that;' q. d. 'ye must take the blame.'

25. τὸ αἷμα—ἡμᾶς.] Supply ἔστω or ἰλθίτω. So in the paraphrase of Juvencus, 'Nos, nos, cruor iste sequatur, Et genus in nostrum scelus hoc, et culpa redundet!' Elsner and Wetstein have proved that it was usual among the Greeks for the witnesses, on whose testimony any were put to death, to devote themselves, and even their children, to curses, if they bore false testimony. The antiquity of the custom is plain from 2 Kings ii. 37. Similar forms of imprecation are adduced both from the Rabbinical and the Classical writers.

26. φραγελλώσας.] A word derived from the Latin flagellare. The flagella were so sharp, that they are termed by Horace horrililia. Scourging, either with flagella (as in the case of slaves), or (as in that of free persons), with rods, was among the Romans a prelude to capital punishment; and it was in use by the Greeks in the earliest ages.

27. τὸ πραιτώριον.] The word here denotes, not that part of the camp so called, but a magnificent edifice, in the upper part of Jerusalem, which had formerly been Herod's palace, and was afterwards the abode of the Roman Procurators when they sojourned at Jerusalem; for their residence was at Cæsarea.

28. χλαμύδα.] This was a kind of round cloak, confined on the right shoulder by a clasp, so as to cover the left side of the body, and worn over the other garments. It was used alike by officers and privates; but, of course, with a difference in texture and dyeing. What is here called κοκκίνη is by Mark denominated πορφύρα, and by John xix. 2. πορφυροῦν. Yet there is no real discrepancy; for though the colours are, properly speaking, different, yet πορφυροῦς denoted sometimes a bright red; and hence the words κοκκίνη and πορφύρα were sometimes interchanged. Thus, in English, the expressions purple and red are often interchanged. And so in Hor. Sat. ii. 6, 102, 'rubro cocco tincta vestis' is the same as vestis purpurea at v. 106. The robe here mentioned was, no doubt, a cast-off sgum of some general officer.

29. στέφανον ἐξ ἀκανθῶν.] There has been no little debate as to the nature and materials of this crown; some contending that as this, like all the rest of what was done by the soldiers, was merely in mockery of Jesus' regal pretensions, there could be no motive to cruelty; and they propose to take the word ἀκανθῶν as the Genitive plural, not of ἀκανθα, but of ἀκανθος, i. e. the bear's foot, which is rather a smooth than a thorny plant, and would be more convenient to plait. Those, on the other hand, who defend the common version, reply that both ἀκανθα and ἀκάνθινος often occur in the New Test. and Sept., and always in the sense thorn and thorny; and that the ancient Versions and some ancient Fathers all confirm that version. The latter interpretation seems the best founded. There is, however, great reason to think (with Theophylact and Bedæus) that the crown was not of mere thorns, but of some prickly shrub (probably acacia). So in a kindred passage cited by Wetstein, 'in capite corona subito exstitit, ex asperis herbis,' especially since those fit to make a fillet are such. So also Pliny Hist. xxi. 10. vilissimam coronam, spiculam.

— χαῖρε, ὁ βασιλεὺς.] A usual salutation to Emperors, as Cæsar, ave! In ὁ βασιλεὺς, the nominative is put for the vocative, as Mark ix. 25. and Luke viii. 54.

32. ἔξερχόμενοι] 'as they were going out [of the city]; for executions were, both among the Jews and Gentiles, always conducted outside of cities.

— ἄνθρωπον Κ.] This use of ἄνθρωπος with nouns of country, business, or office (see Matth. Gr. Gr. § 430. 7.), is thought to be pleonastic, but is in reality only a vestige of the wordiness of antique phraseology. ἠγγάριυσαν, 'compelled'; literally, impressed, which implies compulsion (see Note on Matth. v. 41.); though it was customary for the criminal himself, when strong enough, to carry his cross; which was of the form of a T, and was denominated σταυρός, from σταύω, cognate with στάω to stand, namely, in the ground, as our stake comes from the past participle of to stick. About the middle of it was fixed a piece of wood, on which the crucified person sat, or rather rode; and into which he sometimes, in bravado, leaped. For the height of the cross was (contrary to the common opinion) such as to admit of this,—being only such as to raise the feet of the crucified person about a yard from the ground. The hands were fastened to the cross piece with nails, but the feet were only tied to the post with ropes, and thus the miserable wretch was left to perish gradually by famine or ravenous birds. See Artemid. Oneir. iv. 49. Crucifixion can be traced back to as early a period as the age of Semiramis; and was a punishment chiefly inflicted on slaves, or free persons convicted of the most heinous crimes.

33. Γολγοθᾶ.] From the Chaldee gol-goltha, the second l being omitted, for euphony, as in Babel for Babbel. The place in question was a sort of hovel, and so called from being strewed with the skulls of executed malefactors, like the Candas at Sparta, on which see my note on Thucyd. i. 134. [Comp. John xix. 17.]

Instead of the vulg. ὄξος, ὄ is found in many of the best MSS., some ancient Versions, and early Eds., and is edited by Bengel, Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Fritz., and Scholz: with reason; as being the more difficult reading. The common reading λεγόμενον, just after, can only be defended on the precarious principle of Hypallage. Hence some MSS. change its place, several omit it, and Fritz. cancels it. But it is better to keep than to amputate: and I doubt not but that λεγόμενον is the true reading; which is found in not a few MSS., and is confirmed by the readings μεθερμηνεύμενον, and καλούμενον, and also by the Syriac, Arabic, Persian, and Æthiopic Versions, whose framers must have read λεγόμενον, or μεθερμηνεύμενον. Λεγόμενος arose from the vicious reading ὄς preceding. Render, 'which word is (i. e. signifies) when interpreted, Skull-place.' This sense of λέγισθαι is found also in John xx. 16. Ῥαββουνί· ὁ λέγειται διδάσκαλε. Thus in a kindred passage of Matth. i. 23, ὁ ἔστι, μεθερμηνεύμενον, μεθ' ἡμῶν ὁ Θεός. See also Mark v. 41. xv. 22, 34. John i. 42. Acts iv. 36.

34. ὄξος—μεμιγμ.] Mark xv. 23, mentions a potion administered to Christ, but he calls it εἰςμυρμισμένον οἶνον. To remove the discrepancy, some Commentators suppose that it was the same drink under different names; since ὄξος is used to denote wine (especially the poorer kinds); and χολή, though properly signifying wormwood, yet sometimes in the Sept. denotes any bitter infusion. Others are of opinion, that the potions mentioned by the two Evangelists were distinct mixtures; the vinegar mingled with gall being, they think, offered in derision; and the myrrhed wine, the medicated cup usually administered to criminals about to suffer a painful death. The former interpretation, however, seems to be preferable; and it is confirmed by the ancient gloss which has crept into many of the best MSS., and all the best of the ancient Versions, οἶνον. [Comp. Ps. lxxix. 21.]

35. ἵνα πληρωθῇ—κλῆρον.] These words are found in comparatively few MSS., have no place in the ancient Versions, and several Fathers, nor the Edit. Princ. They have been cancelled by every Editor of Note from Wetstein to Scholz. [Comp. Ps. xxii. 18. John xix. 23.]

37. ἐπάνω.] This word, whether used as a preposition, or an adverb, is derived from ἐπ' ἄνω, and means literally, at or on high, as our above, which was originally written at-bove, i. e. at height.

— αἰτίαν αὐτοῦ.] Namely, the τίτλον, or επιγραφὴν τῆς αἰτίας, his crimination, the crime laid to his charge; which was engraven on a metal plate, in black letters on a white ground. The trifling discrepancy in the words of this inscription may very well have arisen from the language in which it was written.

38. δύο λησται] i. e. 'highway robbers,' or rather, brigands, with which, and banditti of all sorts Judea then swarmed; a state of things which had arisen from the miserable destitution of the bulk of the people, occasioned by the shameless oppression of those blood-suckers, the Roman governors, of whom each one exceeded his predecessor in every bad quality of a governor. [Comp. Is. liii. 12.]

39. κινούμεντες τὰς κεφαλὰς.] A mark of derision common to all the nations of antiquity, and here a fulfilment of prophecy. See Ps. xxii. 7.

40. ὁ καταλύων, &c.] The ὁ refers to Σὺ understood; and καταλύων and οἰκοδομῶν signify propitiator, 'who undertook to destroy.' See Glassii Phil. Sac. [Comp. supra xxvi. 61. John ii. 19.]

41. καὶ πρεσβυτέρων.] Many of the best MSS. add καὶ Φαρισαίων, which is adopted by Wetstein, Matthiæ, Fritz., and Scholz.

42. ἄλλους—σῶσαι.] Beza, Bengel, Pearce, and some others, would take the words interrogatively; which makes them, they think, more cuttingly sarcastic. This, however, quite alters the air of the passage, and destroys the antithesis, which, as Fritz. remarks, is strengthened by the Layndeton. In further confirmation I would compare Aristid. iii. 430 (of Palamedes), πᾶσις τὰς ἄλλας εὐρίσκειν μηχανὰς, μίαν οὐχ εὖρεν, ὅπως σωθήσεται.

—βασιλεὺς, &c.] We may remark the distinctive taunts of the Jews and the Romans; the former of which pointed at Jesus's claim to be King of Israel (i. e. Messiah); the latter, to his assuming the title of King of the Jews; which, however, many of the Romans understood as equivalent to Messiah. The ἐπ' is inserted by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz, on the authority of nearly all the best MSS., and several Versions and Fathers.

43. πέποιθεν ἐπὶ τὸν Ὁ.] The Commentators are at a loss to know what the railers here allude to; perhaps, they think, to his declaration at Matt. xxvi. 53. But that was delivered aside to his disciples. There is rather a reference to that fearlessness with which Jesus yielded himself to the soldiers sent to apprehend him; and which might very well be thought to imply confidence in the Divine aid for deliverance. The railers, however, in this taunt unwittingly fulfilled a remarkable prophecy of the Messiah, Ps. xxii. 8. [Comp. Wisd. ii. 16, 18.]

—ῥυσάσθω.] Ρύσμαι, from the obsolete ῥύω or ῥύω, means properly, 'to withdraw from danger,' and 'take to oneself,' i. e. to one's protection.

—εἰ θέλει αὐτόν.] Θέλειν here, after the manner of the Heb. רָצוּ, denotes to delight in.

44. οἱ λησται—αὐτόν.] Or rather one of them, as is stated in the more exact account of Luke. This trifling discrepancy may, however, be removed; not, indeed, by supposing an enallage, nor by introducing the figure of Amplification (which cannot here apply), but by supposing that the Evangelist speaks generally. Αὐτόν (for the common reading αὐτῷ) is found in almost all the best MSS., and is adopted by Wetstein, Griesbach, Matthæi, Vater, Tittman, Fritz., and Scholz.

45. σκότος—πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν.] There are here two points demanding our attention, which have occasioned no small perplexity to the Commentators; 1. the darkness here recorded; and 2. the distance to which it extended. On the former subject, they are not agreed as to the nature of the darkness, and its cause. The recent Expositors in general seek to account for it in the ordinary course of nature; while the ancient, and most modern ones, regard it as preternatural. That it could not be produced by a total eclipse of the sun is certain; for that can only happen at a change of the moon; whereas it was now full moon. Besides, a total eclipse never continues beyond a quarter of an hour. Some ascribe it to a mist arising from sulphureous vapours, such as precede or accompany earthquakes. This, the naturalists tell us, may extend to a semi-diameter of ten miles from any spot. Those who adopt this view of the subject appeal to the words of ver. 51, καὶ ἡ γῆ ἐσεισθη, &c. But can such a haze as that be all that is here meant? Taking the whole of the circumstances into the account, it should seem that both the darkness and the earthquake may be regarded as preternatural; something in the manner of a portentous natural meteoric phenomenon described by Ebn Batuta, in his travels, who mentions a certain spot as being 'enveloped by a dense black cloud so close to the earth, that it might be almost touched with the hand.' The darkness, which, it may be observed, is not said to have been total (nor, indeed, from the circumstances which are recorded as accompanying it, could it be such), was probably (for who shall dare to go beyond conjecture) produced (as Elsner supposes) by a preternatural accumulation of the densest clouds, enveloping the whole atmosphere; such as that mentioned at Exod. x. 21; brought preternaturally, at the stretching forth of the hand of Moses, over the whole land of Egypt, except that portion occupied by the children of Israel; and which was meant to portend the calamities that should soon overwhelm the Jewish nation.

But to turn to the second question: the extent of this darkness. Most of the ancient interpreters regard it as extending over the whole earth; though one of them, as Origen, and the most eminent modern ones, confine it to Judaea; while those who hold the hypothesis of a thick haze, such as succeeds earthquakes, necessarily limit it to the vicinity of Jerusalem. The latter is, I apprehend, the true view. For, first, there is nothing in the words of the original that compels us to suppose universality; and it is more natural to take the expression of Judaea, the place of the transactions recorded. So, in a kindred passage of Luke iv. 25, ἐγένετο λιμός ἐπὶ πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν. The Fathers, indeed, and some modern Commentators (especially Grotius) allege, in proof of its universality, passages of Phlegon, Thallus, and Dionys. the Areopagite. But they are not agreed on the nature of Phlegon's testimony: indeed, which they ascribe to him has any direct bearing on this event. As to the passage adduced from Thallus, cited by Jul. Africanus, who mentions a darkness over all the world, and an earthquake which overturned many houses in Judaea and elsewhere; there is no reason to think that Thallus lived before Christ; and as the more ancient Fathers quote him for other matters, but never for this, no weight can be attached to the usage in question. As to the story told of Dionys. the Areopagite, it is entitled to still less attention, since Dr. Lardner has proved that all his writings attributed to him are spurious. Besides, there was surely (if we may venture to pronounce on the inscrutable purposes of Almighty Providence) a peculiar propriety in the darkness being confined to Judaea:—as indicating the wrath of God on that country for the enormity then operating; and presenting an apt emblem of the spiritual darkness in which that benighted region was involved. Finally, by adopting this view, and not needlessly exaggerating the intensity of the obscuration, we are enabled satisfactorily to account for the silence of the Pagan Historians, and even Josephus, without supposing in the latter a wilful suppression of truth. Indeed, that writer has passed by other occurrences which we should as little think he would omit as this.

46. Ἥλι—σαβαχθανί.] This is, with the exception of σαβ, (which is Syro-Chaldaic), taken from Ps. cxvii. 1. Mark writes Ἐλωὶ and λαμῶσ, making it all Syro-Chaldaic; which was the dialect then prevalent in Judaea, and, no doubt, used by our Lord. It is of more consequence, to consider the purpose for which the words were pronounced. They must not be supposed to express (what some have ventured to ascribe to them) impatience, faithlessness, and despair. Neither need we, with others, in order to exclude such a conclusion, resort to any far-fetched and improbable interpretation. We may suppose that, by citing the verse, and applying it to himself, our Lord meant to turn the attention of his disciples to the whole Psalm; and to signify to them that he was now accomplishing what was there predicted of the Messiah. It has, indeed, been thought by some, that the words are too expressive of extreme mental suffering to admit of such an explanation. They would regard them as 'the natural effusions of mental torture, scarce conscious of the complaints it uttered.' But this is not a sufficiently reverent view. In short, no interpretation must be admitted which implies any expression of querulousness, or distrust in the favour and support of God. Moreover, on a subject so awfully mysterious as this, and that of the agony in the garden, it is better to abstain from all prying speculation, and learn, in the words of the Philosopher, σωφρονεῖν ἐν τῇ σοφίᾳ.

47. Ἥλιαν φωνεῖ.] These were not, as some imagine, Roman soldiers; for they could know nothing about Elias. The best Commentators are of opinion that they were Hellenistic Jews, who either mistook Christ's words, or intentionally and maliciously perverted them, in derision of his claim to be the Messiah; and with reference to a common opinion, that Elias would return to life at the coming of the Messiah, and prepare the way for his kingdom. See supra xvii. 10.

48. καὶ εὐθὺς—ἐπότιζεν αὐτόν.] Namely, in consequence of what Jesus had just before said (as recorded by John xix. 28.) διψῶ.

—καλάμῳ.] Some render reed; Campbell, stick. But I prefer, with Markland, 'a stalk'; a not unfrequent, and perhaps the primary, sense of the word. Thus Matthew and John will be reconciled; for the ὑσσώπῳ of the latter is equivalent to καλάμῳ ὑσσώπου. The stalk of the hyssop is, in the East, so long, that it might easily reach our Lord on the cross; especially since it was by no means so high as is commonly supposed. Περιθεις may be rendered, 'winding, or fastening it round.' [Comp. Ps. lxi. 21.]

49. Ἄφες ἴδωμεν.] Sub. ἴνα. This use of ἀφες and ἀφετε is not pleonastic (as some imagine), but hortatory, like our come!

50. κράζας φωνῇ μεγάλῃ.] Gruner (a German Physician, author of a learned Tract to prove the death of Christ real, and not, as some sceptics have pronounced, a mere syncope) and Kuin, take this to indicate a loud outcry from pain; as in the case of persons oppressed with an excessive congestion of blood about the heart—the precursor of suffocation. But that does not here apply; for this was not a mere outcry, but an exclamation in words (as is clear from John xix. 30. and Luke xxiii. 46.) namely, τετέλεισται: Πάτερ, εἰς χεῖρας σου παραθήσονται τὸ πνεῦμά μου. This sense of κράζειν is frequent in Scripture, especially as used of exclamations in precatory addresses to God. See Rom. viii. 15. Gal. iv. 6.

—ἀφῆκε τὸ πνεῦμα.] Many ancient and some modern Commentators suppose something preternatural in Christ's death, as being the effect of his volition. But there is nothing in the words of Scripture to countenance such an opinion; though our Saviour's volition must be supposed to accompany his offering himself for the sins of the world. The term is no other than such as is frequently used, both in the Sept. and the Classical writers, of expiration, either with πνεῦμα or ψυχὴν. From the comparative shortness of time during which our Lord survived his crucifixion, some Commentators have supposed an especial interposition of the Deity. But it may very well be accounted for from natural causes, as is shown by Gruner, ubi supra.

51. καταπέτασμα τοῦ ναοῦ.] Meaning, the interior of the two veils which separated the Holy of Holies from the Sanctuary, and which is called by that name in the Sept., Philo, and Josephus. On the form and materials of this veil, see the authors referred to in Recens. Synop. From a most interesting passage of Pausan. v. 12, 12, which I have there adduced, it appears, that exactly such a veil (of woollen, richly embroidered, and in colour purple,) was used at the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, and at that of Jupiter at Olympia. It reached from the roof to the ground, and was drawn up and let down by ropes. See Exod. xxvi. 31. 2 Chron. iii. 14.

This rending of the veil must, like all the other occurrences of this awful scene, be regarded as preternatural. For, though some recent Interpreters ascribe it to the earthquake just after recorded, yet surely no earthquake could rend a veil of 60 feet long, so exceedingly thick as, from its size and purpose, it must have been. Not to say that, had it been owing to an earthquake, the rending would have been, not from the top to the bottom, but from the bottom to the top. Besides, the earthquake is plainly distinguished from the rending of the veil. On its symbolical intent, comp. Heb. x. 19, 20, and see Recens. Synop.

—καὶ ἡ γῆ ἐσείσθη.] This also must be regarded as preternatural; for though an earthquake be not of itself such,—yet, when we consider the circumstances which accompanied the one here described, we cannot but regard it as produced by the direct agency of the Author of nature, and therefore, so far, preternatural.

Of this earthquake vestiges still remain, in immense fissures, which attest the violence of the rending, and show the propriety of the words καὶ αἱ πέτραι ἐσχίσθησαν.

52. καὶ τὰ μνημεῖα ἀνέψχθησαν.] An effect not unfrequently attributed to earthquakes in the ancient writers. So Aristid. i. 504. says of the great earthquake at Rhodes: ἀνεβρίπτοντο δὲ οἰκίαι καὶ μνήματα ἀνερρήγνυντο. In τῶν κεκοιμημένων there is not, as some imagine, as Hebraism, for the idiom occurs in the Classical writers.

53. καὶ ἐξελθόντες—εἰσῆλθον, &c.] In this narrative there are three points which demand our attention. 1. Who were the οἱ κεκοιμημένοι. 2. What was the purpose of their being raised from the dead. 3. What was the time at which it took place. As to the first, they were doubtless holy persons, whether Jews (as old Simeon), or such as had lately died in the faith of Christ. They must have been persons not long dead, or they would not have been recognised by their contemporaries. The purpose is, with most probability, supposed to have been, to show that the power of the grave was destroyed, by life and immortality being brought to light in the Gospel; and thus a pledge given of the general resurrection. As to the time, that will depend on whether the phrase μετὰ τὴν ἔγερσιν αὐτοῦ be taken with the preceding or the following words; on which Interpreters, ancient and modern, are divided in opinion. The former method seems the best founded. We need not, however, suppose, with some who adopt this view, that the resurrection in question was gradual,—began at the rending open of the graves, and accomplished after the resurrection of Christ. That would be too hypothetical; nor is it required by the declaration of the Apostle at Col. i. 18. and 1 Cor. xv. 20, that 'Jesus was the first born from the dead, and the first fruits of them that slept.' It is better to suppose (with some ancient and a few modern Commentators), that the words are inserted somewhat out of place, and perhaps belong to ἠγέρθη. As to the hypothesis of the sceptical school in Germany, that the verses are spurious, it is destroyed by the fact that the words are found in all the MSS. and Versions, and are so alluded to by the early Fathers, as to show their existence in their time; and interpolation at an earlier period was next to impossible.

54. ἀληθῶς—οὗτος.] I have proved at large in Recens. Synop. that Θεοῦ Υἱὸς cannot mean, as Grotius, Markland, Campbell, Rosenmüller, and Kuinoel maintain, 'an innocent and just man,' or a son of a God (i. e. a demi-god); but the Son of God, the Messiah. The soldiers could not but know Jesus's pretensions to be such; and the import of the phrase must have been familiar to them. And seeing the awful and pre-natural circumstances which accompanied his death, it was natural that they should exclaim, one of them, This was truly an innocent and just person! and others. This was truly the personage he affirmed himself to be—the Son of God! See Note on Matt. xiv. 33.

55. [See Luke viii. 2.]

57. ἀπὸ Ἀρ.] scil. ἁν. This sense of ἀπὸ for which ex is sometimes used) corresponds to the Latin ex, the Welsh ap, and our of. The iche and honourable station of Joseph are mentioned, to show the fulfilment of Isai. liii. 9. The best Commentators are agreed that Joseph was not of the Sanhedrim; for βουλευτὴς may be taken improprie for ἀρχων. [Comp. John xix. 31.]

—ἐμαθήτευσεν] for μαθήτης ἦν. Of this inimitative sense examples are adduced by Weta. and Kypke from Plutarch and Jamblichus.

58. ᾔησεν τὸ σῶμα.] Though the bodies of crucified persons were not interred by the Romans, yet they were generally given, on application, to their friends for burial. This would be more especially done in Judaea; because the custom of the country (founded on the Scriptural command, Deut. xxi. 23.) required the bodies to be buried before sun-set; and particularly in the present case, on account of the approaching festival.

—ἀποδοθῆναι] 'to be given up,' the word literally signifying, 'to give away from oneself [to another].'

59. ἐνετύλιξεν—σινδόνι.] Similar language is found in Herodot. ii. 86. in his description of embalming. The σινδὼν was a veil, or wrapper of fine linen, which was used for the same purpose as our sheet (see Thucyd. ii. 49, and my Note there), and also employed to roll around a corpse, previously to interment or embalming, being then secured by linen bandages.

60. ἐν τῷ καινῷ αὐτοῦ μν.] These two circumstances are mentioned, to show the honour paid to our Lord by Joseph, and to preclude any cavil of the Pharisees; as if the corpse had been resuscitated by touching the bones of some prophet; see 2 Kings xiii. 21. [Comp. Isa. liii. 9.]

—ὃ ἐλατόμησεν ἐν τῇ π.] For sometimes persons during their lifetime built tombs for themselves. So of Herod Philip, we learn from Joseph. Ant. xviii. 4, 6. αὐτοῦ κομισθῆντος ἐπὶ τὸ μνημεῖον, ὃ ἐπὶ πρότερον ἐκδομένησιν αὐτὸς.

—τῇ πέτρᾳ.] The Article here is very significant, and has reference to the rockiness of the country; on which we have the testimony of Strabo and Josephus, and also that of modern travellers.

—προσκύλισεν λ.] The Commentators remark, that it was an Oriental custom thus to guard the entrances of caves and subterranean sepulchres. This was, however, not confined to the East, but extended to the West; as appears from the Classical passages adduced by Grotius and by myself in Recens. Synop.; whence it appears that in the early ages stones were generally used in the place of doors to caves or vaults. The stone panelled doors, which close many of the Egyptian monuments, were an invention midway between the block of stone of the primitive times and the wooden door of after ages.

Κέλευσον οὖν 64 ἀσφαλίσθηναι τὸν τάφον ἕως τῆς τρίτης ἡμέρας· μήποτε ἐλθόντες οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ [νυκτὸς] κλέψωσιν αὐτὸν, καὶ εἰπωσιν τῷ λαῷ· Ἠγέρθη ἀπὸ τῶν νεκρῶν· καὶ ἔσται ἡ ἐσχάτη πλάνη χείρων τῆς πρώτης. ceding any sabbath or festival, as being that on which the preparation for its celebration was to be made. See Horne's Introduction.

— συνήχθησαν πρὸς Π.] 'convenerunt ad Pilatum.' There is a significatio prægnans for, they went to and assembled at his house.

63. πλάνος.] This word, like the Latin planus, signified properly a vagabond, and, from the adjunct, a cheat, impostor, &c. Μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας, i. e. within three days, equivalent to the third day. See Note on Matt. xvi. 21. That the Jews so understood it, is plain from the next verse. To which of the prophecies (whether that at Matt. xii. 40, or at Matt. xxvi. 61,) they alluded, is not clear. Certain it is, however, that our Lord's declaration that he should rise from the dead, was publicly known.

64. καὶ ἔσται ἡ ἐσχάτη πλάνη, &c.] A proverbial saying, importing that it would be worse if the whole people should acknowledge him as Messiah, and thus rise up in rebellion. Νυκτὸς ἐφ' αὐτοῦ is wanting in most of the best MSS., Versions, and some Fathers, and is cancelled by Griesbach, Fritze, and Scholz.

65. ἔχετε κουστωδῖαν.] The Commentators are not agreed whether ἔχετε should be taken in the Indicative, or in the Imperative. Either method is admissible; but as no example has been adduced of such a sense of ἔχειν as to take, though found in the corresponding term of modern languages; and especially as the sense thus yielded is not so suitable to what follows, the former method (which is confirmed by some ancient and the best modern Commentators) seems preferable. Render, 'ye have a guard;' namely, that stationed in the Castle of Antonia, and which was meant to quell any tumult in the city.

— ὡς οἰδατε.] Of this disputed expression the best rendering is that of Grotius, Schleusner, Rosenmüller, Kuinoel, Fritz., and others, 'quantum potestis.' In fact, there is an ellipse of ἀσφαλίστατα, to be supplied from ἀσφαλίσασθε. The literal sense is, 'as safely as ye know how,' i. e. can.

66. σφραγίσαντες.] A mode of security in use from the earliest times, when it supplied the place of locks. See Dan. vi. 17. and the Classical citations adduced by Wetstein and myself in Recens. Synop. In the present case, the sealing material is supposed to have been affixed to the two ends of a cord or band brought round the stone. Μετὰ τῆς κουστωδίας may either (by such a transposition as that supra ver. 53.) be referred to ἡσφάλισαντο τὸν τάφον; or rather, the words may be taken as a brief expression for μετὰ τοῦ προσθεῖναι τὴν κουστωδῖαν, 'together with (a setting of) the guard,' i. e. at the same time that they set the guard.

XXVIII. 1. ὁψὲ δὲ σαββ.] This must be explained, 'after the sabbath,' i. e. as Mark more clearly expresses it, διαγενομένου τοῦ σαββάτου. Of which signification the Commentators adduce examples from Philostr., Plutarch, Ælian, and Xenophon. On the genit. here see Buttm. Gr. Gr. § 132. 4, 2, 6. [Comp. John xx. 1.]

— τῇ ἐπιφωσκούσῃ.] An elliptical expression for ἅμα τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐπιφ. The complete one occurs in Herodot. iii. 86. and ix. 44. The word is used properly of the first appearing of the heavenly bodies, and may be paralleled by our verb to dawn. Μίαν is for πρώτην, by an idiom often found in the Sept., and derived from the Hebrew; though it exists, more or less, in most languages. On the evidence for our Lord's resurrection, and the arguments establishing the credibility thereof, see Horne's Introd., vol. i. p. 239, 260. For a harmony of the various narratives, see West and Townson, and especially Townsend (Chron. Arr.) and Greswell. On the important point of the change of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week, which arose out of our Lord's resurrection on the latter, the reader is referred to Horne's Introd., to a pamphlet of Dr. Miller of Armagh, and especially to an elaborate Sermon with Notes by Professor Lee, Cambridge, 1833. From which works it appears, that there is a sufficient warrant in Scripture for the change of the Sabbath, without recurring to the Romish doctrine of independent tradition; and also that there is great reason to think the Patriarchal Sabbath coincided with our Sunday; also that, as it was thrown back to Saturday, in order to commemorate the Jewish Exodus,—so that the return to the original Sabbath, when the purpose for which the new one had been appointed was answered, was just as reasonable as its former change.

2. καὶ ἰδοὺ, σεισμὸς, &c.] I have in Recens. Synop. shown that the interpretation of σεισμὸς propounded by some Expositors (namely, a trempend or whirlwind) cannot be admitted: still less that of 'trembling' or 'fear.' Not merely absurd, but irreverent, is the interpretation of ἄγγελος by the Sceptical School of Theologians in Germany, whereby it is made to mean, not a person, but a thing; i. e. lightning or flames, which often accompany earthquakes.

Ἄ ἰδέα] form, figure, or appearance; a signification frequent in the best Classical writers.
 [Comp. Dan. x. 6.]

— λευκὸν ὥσεὶ χιών.] A simile of frequent occurrence in writers of every nation; whiteness having ever been a symbol of purity and sanctity.
 See Dan. vii. 9. Apoc. iii. 4. vi. 11. vii. 9, 13.
 Hence, among all the nations of antiquity, it was customary for those who celebrated divine worship to be clothed in white. But to this whiteness of garment there was, in these angels, super-added an undefinable and peculiar splendour; something like what is attributed to Christ in the transfiguration. (xvii. 2.) So Luke says they were ἐσθῆτες αὐστρατοῦσαι, a sign of celestial glory.

4. ἀπὸ τοῦ φόβου.] Ἀπὸ here denotes origina; an idiom common to both Greek and Latin.
 Ἐγείσθητε ὥσεὶ νεκροί is an hyperbolical phrase common to all ages and languages. [See supra xxvii. 65.]

6. τόπος.] The word here denotes the cavity, or cave, hollowed out in the vault, and in which was deposited the corpse. [Comp. supra xii. 40.
 xvi. 21. xvii. 23.]

7. [Comp. xxvi. 32.]

8. μνημείου.] The μνημεῖον, or monumentum, amongst the Greeks and Romans, and perhaps the Jews, consisted of the cave, ΠΥΛΩ, σπηλαῖον, and τειχίον, τὸ ὑπαιβρον, a small inclosure in the same ground around it. This whole μνημεῖον was also itself situated in a larger space of ground, outside of the inclosure, called by the Romans tutela monumenti; and here corresponding to the cultivated garden.

— μετὰ φόβου καὶ χαρᾶς.] The phraseology strongly expresses the mingled sensations of fear (or rather awe) at the appearance of the angel, and joy at the good news he announced.

9. χαίρετε.] This is wrongly rendered by Campbell 'rejoice.' It is a common form of salutation. So the Syriac renders, 'Pax vobis!'
 [Comp. John xx. 14, 16.]

— ἐκράτησαν αὐτοῦ τοὺς πόδας] i. e. in the manner of suppliants; who used to prostrate themselves, and embrace the feet of those from whom they sought protection. Brug., Lightfoot, and Rosenm., take it to mean 'kissed his feet';
 a custom also prevalent in the East, from whence it afterwards passed to the West. But the words will not admit such a sense. And, indeed, the deep awe which must have inspired their adoration (for such is the import of προσεκύνησαν, on which sense of the word see Note supra ii. 2, and also Smith's Scrip. Test. L. III. 3.) seems to have scarcely permitted an action rather importing affection than any more reverential feeling.

10. κακεῖ με ὄψονται] i. e., as Fritz. says, καὶ ἀπαγγ. ὅτι ἐκεῖ με ὄψονται.

12. ἀργύρια ἱκανὰ] ἱκ. for πολλὰ (like the Latin suis) which use is frequent when the word occurs with nouns signifying many. The Commentators regard ἀργ. as plural for singular. The truth is, that ἀργύριον denotes 1. silver in bullion; 2. silver coined; in which sense it is chiefly used in the singular; 3. silver coins; but chiefly the stater, tetradrachma, or shekel; in which sense it is generally used in the plural, mostly accompanied with numerals, or words that imply number, as many, few, &c.; 4. in the plural it denotes money, as here.

13. ἔκλεψαν αὐτόν] 'took him away clandestinely.' In this sense κλέπτω occurs in 2 Sam. xix. 41. Several examples from the Classical writers are adduced by the Commentators, but none quite apposite. One, however, exists in Thucyd. vii. 85.

14. ἐπὶ τοῦ ἡγεμόνου.] Here ἐπὶ is best taken with the Syriac, in the sense apud, coram; not as standing for ὑπὸ.

— πείσομεν αὐτόν] 'we will appease (his wrath), conciliate his pardon and favour; namely, by entreaties or gifts.' 'Ἀμερίμνους ποιεῖν is a phrase corresponding to the Latin indemnem vel securum præstare (scil. a malo), to make one safe and sure [from harm].

15. ὁ λόγος οὗτος] i.e. 'this story, about the stealing of the body,' which was put into the mouths of the soldiers. That it was studiously disseminated by the Jews, we learn from a passage of Justin Martyr cited by the Commentators: indeed, traces of it are found in the Rabbinical writings.

16. εἰς τὸ ὄρος οὗ, &c.] Since neither by Christ himself, in his prophetic declaration at Matt. xxvi. 32, nor in his promise, supra v. 10, nor by the angel, v. 4, is any mountain specified as the place of meeting between Him and his disciples, it is argued by Whitby, Mackn., and others, that the words οὐ ἐτάξατο must be referred, not to ὄρος, but to Γαλιλαίαν. This, however, would be doing such violence to the construction, that it cannot be admitted. At the same time, there is little doubt that the Apostles did assemble for that purpose on a mountain (for the same reason that our Lord chose mountains, for prayer, &c.); and probability and ecclesiastical tradition concur in pointing out Tabor as the place. Are we, then, to suppose that there is, in the passage before us, a reference to a particular spot of meeting, which, nevertheless, has not been mentioned by the Evangelist, where one might have expected it, supra v. 10? But neither do the other Evangelists, who have supplied what Matthew here omits, make mention of this circumstance; which yet would not be likely to be omitted. And it is scarcely probable that our Lord would appoint the place, and not fix the time: since any long continuance in so wild and desert a place as Mount Tabor, must have been very inconvenient to the disciples. I cannot help suspecting, that the words εἰς τὸ ὄρος (which ought to be rendered, not 'into a mountain,' but 'unto the mountain'), are not genuine. They are not found in six MSS., and therefore I have thought proper to place them within brackets. They seem to have arisen from a marginal remark of those who were well aware of the Ecclesiastical tradition, that this transaction took place at Mount Tabor; whence it seems others afterwards introduced them into the text, as thinking them required by the οὐ, and as serving to make the thing more definite. By their removal the difficulty in question will vanish; since the οὗ will thus refer to Γαλιλαίαν just before, and the reference to v. 9 will be more distinct; vv. 11—15 being in some measure parenthetical. The οὗ is thus used for οἱ, whither, as at Luke x. l. xxiv. 28, and 1 Cor. xvi. 6.

The above Commentators are of opinion, that although the Evangelist does not mention more than the Eleven, yet that we may suppose there were many more witnesses; namely, the Seventy and other recently converted disciples, so that the number may coincide with the 500 mentioned by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 6. But thus what is said v. 19, πορευθῆναι μαθητ. x. τ. f. would have to be referred to the whole; which cannot be meant. Besides, St. Paul there expressly distinguishes the appearance to the Apostles (the Twelve or Eleven) from that to the 500 (meaning the disciples at large).

17. οἱ δὲ ἰδίστασαν.] There has been some difficulty raised both as to the construction, and to the persons meant by οἱ δὲ. As to the former, there can be no doubt but that the οἱ δὲ is rightly taken, by some ancient and several of the best modern Commentators, for τινε δὲ; of which many examples are adduced. But the latter difficulty is not so easily removed. To resort to conjectural alteration, with Beza, is to cut the knot. To take ἰδίστασαν, with Grotius, Doddridge, and Fritz., as a pluperfect ('had doubted'), is harsh, and too much like a device for the nonce. In Recena. Syn. and the first Edition of this work, I gave the preference to the interpretation of Whitby, West, Owen, and Kuinoel, who

refer the words to the seventy disciples, some of whom might have scruples remaining, and who would probably attend together with the Eleven. But I am now persuaded that that view is inadmissible; not so much because it has no countenance from St. Matthew, as because it is contradicted by the express words of St. Paul. Nor are we compelled to take the οἱ δὲ of one only, Thomas; for we may suppose, that although he alone expressed his doubts, yet there might be at least one more besides, who felt distrust, doubting the holy presence of the Lord.

18. ἰδόθῃ μοι πᾶσα ἐξ.] all power of every kind, the highest authority δοξα προαιώνιος. See John xvii. 5, 24. These words have been by some so explained as to derogate from the Divinity of Christ. But, when properly understood, they will by no means lead to any such conclusion. It is justly argued by Whitby and Mede, that as in his Divine nature our Lord doubtless had this power from all eternity, so, if this declaration be supposed to be made with respect to his Divine nature, it must be understood of him as being God of God, deriving his being and essence by an eternal generation from the Father. But he was also perfect man, as well as perfect God; and therefore the words may have been spoken in reference to his state of humiliation, now about to terminate in glory at the right hand of God; before which time he could not exercise the power, though he had before received it. In short, such unlimited power could neither be received nor exercised by any being less than God. Christ therefore is God. For, as observes Dr. Pye Smith, Scrip. Test., vol. ii. p. 186, 'The mediatorial function, and the assuming of human nature in order to discharge that function, constitute a new office, a new character, new manifestations of the uncreated glory to intelligent beings, a new kind and course of relation to those beings. In the contemplation of these, nothing can be more proper than to say that the dominion and glory of Christ are the GIFT to him of the Divine Father, "of whom are all things;" while the essential excellences of his superior nature remain necessarily unchangeable, because they are infinite.'

19. πορευθ. οὖν μαθητ., &c.] Here we have that great commission granted by Christ to his Apostles and their successors, with respect to all nations (both Jews and Gentiles) embracing three particulars, μαθητεύειν, βαπτίζειν, and διδάσκειν, i. e. 1. to disciple them, or convert them to the faith; 2. to initiate them into the Church by baptism; 3. to instruct them when baptized, in the doctrines and duties of a Christian life. From the present passage we may infer three things, 1. the necessity of baptism; 2. the lawfulness of infant baptism; 3. the doctrine of the Trinity: since we are baptized into (or unto, noting design) the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, without any mention of difference, distinction, or superiority. With respect to the second point, 'no argument can,' as Dr. Doddridge says, 'be drawn from these words to the prejudice of infant baptism,' because, though especially adapted to adults, as necessarily forming the bulk of the first converts; yet it need not be thought to exclude infants, who cannot be expected to have faith, in order to be baptized. And this inference would necessarily be drawn by the Jews, since they were accustomed to see infants baptized; and would naturally conclude, that as no alteration was announced, the mode of admission into covenant with God remained the same. The propriety of infant baptism may be inferred from the strong analogy which the rite bears to circumcision, and the baptism of proselytes, which included their children as well as themselves. There is precisely the same reason why the children of Christians should be admitted from their infancy into the Christian covenant, as why the infants of Jewish parents should be admitted into the Mosaic covenant. Infants being as capable of covenanting in the one case as in the other. And if God did not consider their age any objection against even circumcision, or the baptism of the children of Jewish proselytes; we have no reason to urge it as an objection against being received to Christian baptism. In short, it may be confidently pronounced, that Infant Baptism has subsisted from the times of the Apostles to the present day. Timothy was brought up a Christian, ἀπὸ βρέφους, as multitudes of others must, when whole families were baptized. So also Justin Martyr, Apol. i. says that there were then many of both sexes, 60 or 70 years of age, οἱ ἐκ παιδῶν ἐμαρτυρήσαν τῷ Χριστῷ, ἀπόβοροι διαμύνονσι. And certain it is, that in Tertullian's day the practice was general. 'In fact, had infant baptism not subsisted in the time of the Apostles, what, (as Wetstein observes) would have been done with the infants, or male children of Christians? Were they to be circumcised? certainly not. Were they then to be brought up in neither Judaism nor Christianity, but with their minds a mere tabula rasa? certainly not. "Bring them up," says St. Paul, "in the fear and nurture of the Lord." Otherwise they would have been in a worse condition than if their parents had never been Christians. And though nothing is said in Scripture to enjoin infant baptism, it was not necessary that it should be expressly enjoined; just as neither the age nor sex of those admitted to the Lord's Supper is mentioned or prescribed. On the other hand, there was a good reason why that should not be done; namely, lest superstitious persons should stick at the bark only of the doctrines, and give their chief attention to what is ceremonial, to the neglect of what is essential.'

20. ἰδού, ἐγὼ μεθ' ὑμῶν.] That this proves omnipresence, and consequently Divinity, is proved by Dr. Smith, Scrip. Test. iii. 3, 4, 5.

I. The writer of this Gospel is almost universally admitted to have been John, surnamed Mark, who was sister's son to Barnabas, and son of Mary, a pious woman, at whose house the first Christians usually assembled at Jerusalem. This is, indeed, denied by Grotius, and, after him, by Dr. Burton; but the objections of the former have been overruled by Fritz. And as to what is urged by the latter, that 'if the Evangelist died, as we are told by Eusebius, in the 8th year of Nero (i. e. A. D. 61 or 62), he could not be mentioned in the 2d Epistle to Timothy, which was not written till, at the earliest, A. D. 64;' we are surely not authorized to reject, on so slender a ground, what rests on high probability, supported by the earliest Ecclesiastical tradition, on a point where it could scarcely fail to preserve the truth. It is more reasonable to suppose, either that Eusebius was misinformed as to the exact date; or rather that there is some mistake of the scribes in the figure. Probably for H we should read II (13.)

Mark was not an Apostle, nor probably one of the Seventy disciples, especially as St. Peter (1 Pet. v. 13.) calls him his son [namely, in the faith], i. e. his convert. For the outlines of the Evangelist's history, traced from the New Test., and the early Ecclesiastical writers, the reader is referred to Mr. Horne's Introduction. The time when this Gospel was written is much disputed, and cannot be determined with certainty; but it is with most probability fixed at A. D. 66 or 67, and a little after the time when St. Luke published his Gospel: certainly not till after the death of St. Peter, and probably St. Paul. This matter is, however, closely connected with another question, of far greater importance, — whether, in writing his Gospel, Mark made use of the Gospel of Matthew? On this the opinions of the learned are at the antipodes; some maintaining that Mark's Gospel is only an abridgment of Matthew's; others, that Mark made no use of that Gospel — nay, was totally unacquainted with it: indeed, that the Gospels were all of them formed without knowledge of, and independently of each other. Now here, if ever, 'in medio tutissimus ibi.' The instances of verbal coincidences are so striking (nearly the whole of the Gospel being found in Matthew), as to forbid the latter supposition. And as to the former, it may, with equal confidence, be maintained, that this Gospel is not a mere abridgment of St. Matthew's, since it differs from it (as we shall see) in many important respects. The question whether St. Mark made use of St. Luke's Gospel is of more difficult determination. Dr. Hales thinks that Griesbach has, by an elaborate process, furnished strong internal evidence of the priority of Luke's Gospel to Mark's. In using these Gospels, Dr. Hales thinks that Mark in general rather adopted the language of Matthew, but the order of Luke; yet neither implicitly. Besides, he is more circumstantial and correct than either of them in the relation of joint facts. Now Dr. Hales argues, had Luke followed Mark (as is the common opinion), it is not credible that he would have omitted all those; since even John has used some. And this priority of Luke to Mark is not only maintained by many eminent moderns, but was held by the ancients. Thus Clem. Alex. attests that Gospels with the genealogies were first written. And so Julian mentions them in the order—Matthew, Luke, Mark, and John. We can, as Dr. Hales observes, account thus far the order in which they at present stand. 'From the time that the notion prevailed that Mark's Gospel was an abridgment of St. Matthew's, it was natural to place it next to St. Matthew's.' This (I would add) might take place, even on the opinion that Mark chiefly followed Matthew. Thus, also, when Tertullian ranges the Gospels of Matthew, John, Luke, and Mark, he classifies them into original, and, in some degree, complementary compositions. To advert to a yet more important subject—it may be thought surprising, that persons of acknowledged ability should have adopted opinions so diametrically opposite to each other, as to the origin, or source, and nature of the Gospels. But the truth is, that the existence of such striking verbal coincidences between Matthew, Mark, and Luke, when coupled with the remarkable variations, and almost discrepancies ἀποστέλλω τὸν ἄγγελόν μου πρὸ προσώπου σου, ὅς κατασκευάσει τὴν ὁδὸν σου [ἐμπροσθέν σου,]

in their respective accounts, presents a most perplexing phenomenon. Hence men of talent have set themselves to devise such hypotheses, respecting the origin of the Gospels, as may satisfactorily account for these phenomena; and, as might be expected, they have, to a certain degree, been successful. Of the many that have been pronounced, none alone deserve any attention. 1. That one or two of the three Gospels were taken from the third. 2. That all three were derived from some original document, Greek or Hebrew, common to all three. 3. That they were derived from detached narratives of parts of the history of Christ, communicated by the Apostles to the first converts. 4. That they were derived from oral tradition. Now as to the traditionary hypothesis, suffice it to say, that, besides proceeding on a wholly gratuitous assumption (as to the existence of verbal Gospels), and taking for granted things (as to the length of time which elapsed before a Gospel was committed to writing, &c.) only brings upon us new and real difficulties in the place of alleged ones (especially as to the uniformity of such tradition), and is utterly inconsistent with the striking verbal coincidences found in the Gospels. As to the documentary hypothesis, even in its most modified and least objectionable form (No. 3.), it is liable to the same objections as No. 2, of complexity and artificialness; and that fatal one, the silence of all ecclesiastical antiquity as to the existence of any such primary document, or documentary narratives. In short, of all these three hypotheses (namely, 2, 3, 4), we may truly say, that, while they are such as by no means to command our reverence, they detract not a little from the authority of the first three Gospels as inspired compositions. Whatever may be the modifications with which either the documentary or the traditionary hypothesis may be brought forward—whatever may be the refinements resorted to—they are sufficient to elude the plain inference implied in each and all, that the Evangelists are scarcely to be regarded as regular, much less as inspired historians. There is, indeed, the smaller excuse for resorting to these hypotheses, since it is wholly unnecessary so to do; as will appear from an examination of the first-mentioned hypothesis, which has been held, with various modifications, by many of the most eminent Theologians and commentators, ancient and modern. Even to his view, indeed, objections may, and have been made, which are thus summed up by Mr. Horne, vol. i. 494, 496: ‘1. The Evangelists could have no motives for copying from each other. 2. It does not appear that any of the ancient Christian writers had a suspicion that either of the first three Evangelists had seen the other Gospels before he wrote his own. 3. It is not suitable to the character of any of the Evangelists, that they should abridge or transcribe another historian. 4. It is evident, from the nature and design of the first three Gospels, that the Evangelists had not seen any authentic written history of Jesus Christ. 5. All the first three Evangelists have several things peculiar to themselves, which show that they did not borrow from each other, and that they were all well acquainted with the things of which they undertook to write a history.’ On a close examination, however, of these objections, some, it is conceived, will be found groundless, others to proceed from misapprehension, or taking for granted what has not, and cannot be proved: in short, that all put together have not weight enough to decide even a doubtful case. That there should have been such various modifications of the hypothesis now under consideration, is no proof, as the objectors to it allege, that it is wholly unfounded. Extremes have in all ages produced extremes. From the strong verbal coincidences between this Gospel and that of St. Matthew, many, from the time of Augustine downwards, have regarded Mark as a mere epitomizer of Matthew. Now this is at variance with the universal testimony of early antiquity, and is forbidden by the alterations in the order of time and the arrangement of facts, and the addition of much matter not found in Matthew. The strong coincidences may serve to prove that he often followed Matthew; but his frequent deviations from Matthew show that he was by no means an abridger. But, on the other hand, that the ucceeding Evangelists did not see each the Gospel of his predecessor, is, as Dr. Hales observes, ‘a negative which cannot be proved. Whereas the affirmative is highly probable, from the intimate connection and correspondence between them, and appears to be sufficiently established from internal evidence.’ Upon the whole, there seems no good reason to reject the first-mentioned hypothesis; which will, I apprehend, have only to be duly modified, and properly limited, to free it from all reasonable objection. The state of the evidence as to the verbal coincidences is, as we have seen, such as to utterly exclude the notion (otherwise improbable) that the Evangelists who followed the first did not know, much less make use of, their predecessors’ works. The case seems to have been this: 1. That the Gospels of Matthew and Luke were original and independent narratives, except that Luke probably made some use of the Hebrew original of St. Matthew. 2. That Mark’s Gospel appeared after those two; and that the Evangelist freely used the matter contained in one or the other, according as it suited his purpose, and was agreeable to his plan. 3. That such parts as are not found in Matthew or Luke were either derived from St. Peter (under whose sanction and direction he wrote), or at least from the testimony of ‘eye-witnesses and ministers of the word.’ As to the discrepancies (which, however, have been much exaggerated) between his Gospel and that of St. Matthew, they will (as Dr. Hales observes) ‘not prove that he could not have known of it, or used the Gospel, but only that he felt himself authorized to claim the character of an original historian; which, considering his many advantages for arriving at the truth, and the countenance and direction of St. Peter, he might well do.’ This view, while it satisfactorily accounts for the verbal coincidences, cannot, when properly understood, be justly thought to derogate from the credit of St. Mark’s Gospel, as a Canonical work, or one written under Divine inspiration. To advert to the purpose of this Gospel, ‘A brief and plain account (to use the words of the same writer) of the grounds of the Christian religion was, even after the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, wanted for plain and unlettered persons. And this Mark, under the sanction, and with the occasional assistance of St. Peter, undertook to draw up, at the request (as we learn from early Ecclesiastical writers) of the Christian converts of Rome, who had attended on St. Peter's preaching. In compliance with their request, Mark most judiciously selected, and sometimes enlarged, the more important parts of Matthew and Luke, and adapted them to his peculiar purpose; which was to give a succinct history of our Lord's ministry, commencing from the preaching of the Baptist to his Ascension, and concluding with the preaching of the Apostles every where throughout the world. Hence we are enabled to account for his omission of certain portions of their Gospels, either entirely or partially; on the same principle that John, coming after him, omits considerably more, so as to form a distinct Gospel, which may be considered as a supplement to the rest [See, however, Intr. to St. John's Gospel. Ed.], with only the insertion of so much matter common to the former, as to connect his Gospel with theirs.

There are indeed not wanting those who, strenuously contending for the Gospels being formed independently of each other, are of opinion that these coincidences in the writings of the Evangelists may be sufficiently accounted for without having recourse to the supposition that the later Gospels were, in some degree, formed on the preceding ones. According to this view, the verbal coincidences are ascribed to the uncommon attention with which Christ's sayings were treasured up in the memories of his hearers, and the supernatural aid promised to 'bring all things to their remembrance, whatever he had said unto them.' (John xiv. 26.) See Bp. Gleig and Archdeacon Nares cited by Mr. Horne. But this, it should seem, is ascribing more to memory than, even under the most favourable circumstances, it can be expected to supply. At all events, it is not well judged to bring in the principle of strict verbal inspiration in direct opposition to the strongest internal evidence of one Gospel, at least, being partly formed from the other two. There is nothing, it is apprehended, in the above view derogatory of the true claims of either Evangelist; especially of Luke, as will appear from his own preface to his Gospel; on which see the Notes in loco. Inspiration, as far as it was needed, was, we may believe, so far granted; and to suppose it to have proceeded beyond that, is to run counter to the usual course of God's operations, whether in the natural or the moral world, in which a beautiful economy is observable.

The authenticity of this Gospel is established on an unbroken chain of testimony, commencing from the time even of St. Clement, in the first century down to the fourth century. As to the date of this Gospel and St. Luke's, it appears, from Irenæus, that neither was published till after the death of St. Peter and St. Paul. Hence we cannot assign an earlier date than 65 to either of the Gospels, nor a later one than 68 (both being confessedly written before the destruction of Jerusalem), and probably Luke's Gospel and Acts were published in 66, and Mark's Gospel in 67.

With respect to the style of this Evangelist, it is such as is well adapted to the purpose of the writer; the instruction of plain and unlettered persons; being simple and concise, though not devoid of energy. And however it may be deficient in purity of style and exactness of composition (abounding, as it does, with Hebraisms and Latinisms), yet its authenticity is thereby the more strongly attested; it being plainly the work of a Jew, chiefly conversant with the Syro-Chaldean, and who had learnt his Greek chiefly from the Sept.

Finally, with respect to the persons for whom this Gospel was intended, the truth here, as often, will be found in medio. It was probably written chiefly, though not exclusively, for the Gentile converts and the Hellenists, chiefly of the West. Since nearly the whole of this Gospel (i. e. with the exception of twenty-four verses, and some short inserted clauses or words) is contained (at least with an occasional change of terms) in one or both of the two parallel Gospels of Matthew and Luke, it has been thought proper, in order to avoid all needless repetition, to give comparatively little of explanatory annotation on such portions as are common to those Gospels; the reader being referred for all such (with the exception of a few words and phrases which are, for some particular reason, explained on St. Mark, but not on St. Luke) to the Notes on the parallel passages of those Gospels, indicated in the margin.

V. 1. ἀρχὴ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου—Θεοῦ.] On the construction, and consequently the sense, of the first four verses of this Chapter much difference of opinion exists. Some, as Euthym., Theophyl., and Grotius, place a comma after Θεοῦ, and lay down the sense as follows: 'The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus the Messiah thus happened, as it is written in the Prophet.' Yet thus (as Fritz. observes) the Article would be required at ἀρχὴ, a particle (γάρ, or such like) at ἵνα ἔσται; and οὕτως and a verb would have to be supplied. Hence it is better with Beza, Le Clerc, Wetstein, Campbell, Rosenm., and Kuinoel, to regard v. 1 as a separate sentence, forming a kind of title to the work. 'It was not unusual (says Campbell) with authors to prefix a short sentence, to serve both as a title to the book, and to signify that the beginning immediately followed. So Hosea i. 1.' In this view they quote the commencing sentences of the History of Herodotus, to which I have, in Recens. Synop., added the Proems of Thucyd., Procop., Ocell., Luc., Timæus, and some other writers. Thus the ὅς, which may be rendered sicut, refers to v. 4, as the completion of the prophecies mentioned. It is, however, not necessary (with Kuinoel and others) to supply hæc scripsi at ἀρχὴ, since (as Fritz. observes) the pronoun is never required in a title, because the very situation of the title prefixed to a book, shows it to belong to the book to which it is prefixed. For the same reason the Article is not wanted at ἀρχὴ. After all, however, there is something weak in the proofs supporting this mode of interpretation; for not one of the passages cited from the beginnings of the historians above mentioned and Hosea are quite to the purpose. And as to the custom (to which Campbell appeals) of scribes placing incipit at the beginning, and explicit at the end of their transcripts, it is nothing to the purpose. If, therefore, it be thought admissible, we may adopt the mode of taking the passage proposed by Erasmus, Zeger, Markland, and Fritz. To this interpretation there is nothing to object on the score of grammatical propriety; and though this suspension of the sense be somewhat awkward, yet the style of the Evangelist is occasionally rough and harsh. The sense thus arising is excellent; for that from the preaching of John arose the commencement of the Gospel, is certain from Luke xvi. 16. See also Note on Luke ii. 2.

2. ἐν Ἡραία τ. πρ.] This is the reading of several of the best MSS., and all the most important of the ancient Versions, and it is preferred by some of the most eminent Commentators, and is edited by Griesbach, Knapp, Tittm., and Scholz; the superior weight of MS. authority for the common reading ἐν τοῖς προφήταις being overbalanced by critical reasons. Yet even thus the passage may be considered as not quite correct. There is surely as great reason to think that Ἡραία came from the margin, as there is to suppose τοῖς προφήταις to have arisen ex emendatione. It is not found in some ancient MSS. and the Syr., Pers., Goth., Vulg., and Ital. Versions; and is cancelled by Fritz; rightly, I think; for, as Dr. Mill remarked, there is every reason to think, that the original reading was ἐν τῷ προφῆτῃ, from which the other two arose—namely, from those who took upon themselves to supply, in two different ways, what seemed to them a deficiency.

The first passage is taken from Malachi iii. 1, the second from Is. xl. 3. The neglect of the formula citationis, before the second passage, is agreeable to a not unfrequent custom of Jewish writers, on which see Surenh. βιβλ. καταλλ. p. 45.

— Ἐμπροσθίν σου.] These words are omitted in a few ancient MSS., some Versions, and Origen and Victor, and are cancelled by Griesbach, Fritz, and Scholz, who suppose them to have been introduced from Matt. xi. 10, and Luke vii. 27. Fritz sees no reason why they should have been cancelled, if they had been written by the Evangelist. But as the number of MSS. in which they are omitted is very small, may we not suppose them to have been omitted propter homœoteleuton? [Comp. John i. 15, 24.]

4. [Comp. John i. 31. Acts xix. 4.]

5. οἱ Ἱερ.] seems to mean the inhabitants of the city, in opposition to those τῆς Ἰουδ. χώρας, the country, q. d. not only the inhabitants of the country, but of the city.

7. κύψας λῦσαι τὸν ἱμάντα τ. ὑπ.] Render, 'the strap (or strapping), or lacing of whose sandals.' And indeed our latchet means no more; coming from the old French lacet, and that from the Italian laccio, derived from the Latin laqueus. For the plural ὑποδ. here, John i. 27, uses the singular. In κύψας there is an allusion to the posture in which the action was done. And, indeed, as the sandals were fastened to the foot by very complicated straps they could not be loosed without some trouble. This was therefore esteemed a menial and servile office.

8. [Comp. Acts i. 5. ii. 4. xi. 16. xix. 4.]

9. καὶ ἐγένετο—ἦλθεν.] A construction frequent in the Gospels, and derived from the Hebrew. See Genesis xiv. 1, 2. Most Commentators supply ἔτι. But it is justly observed by Fritz, that the construction may be considered as bimembris; wherein the first member is explained by the second; which is added per asyndeton, and may, in translation, be introduced by namque. The more usual form of the idiom is, when the ἐγένετο is followed by a καὶ.

— ἐν ἐκείναις ταῖς ἡμέραις.] Namely, when John was preaching in the desert the baptism of repentance. Τῆς Γαλιλαίας is added to Nazareth, to determine its situation, it being an obscure place. Εἰς is not here for ἐν, as most Commentators imagine, who adduce examples which are quite inapposite. The sense of ἐβαπτ. εἰς is, was dipped, or plunged into. Or we may suppose, that (as in the phrase λούεσθαι εἰς βαλανεῖον) there is a significatio præniana, for 'to be washed [by being plunged] into the water.' [Comp. John i. 32.]

10. εὐθὺς.] This ought here to be construed with εἶδε, which must, with the best Commentators, be referred to Jesu,—not, with others, to

John. An exactly similar construction is found at Mark v. 36.

— σχιζομένους.] Elsner and Wetstein adduce numerous passages in which mention is made of the heavens being cleared with lightning. But it is truly remarked by Fritz., that they are all dissimilar; for (to use his own words) ‘hic cælum dehiscit, ut divinus Spiritus, relicto domicilio, ad Jesum desuper possit allabi.’ So Matt. iii. 16, ἀνεψύχθησαν οἱ οὐρανοί, and Luke iii. 21.

— ὡσεὶ.] Many MSS., and indeed most of the ancient ones, have ὡς, which is edited by Griesbach, Fritz., and Scholz, who think that the common reading was derived from the other Gospels.

11. ἐν ᾧ.] Several ancient MSS., and almost all the Versions have ἐν σοί, which is confirmed by Luke iii. 22, and is edited by Griesbach and Fritz. This may be the true reading; but there is not sufficient authority to warrant any change. Even internal evidence is against σοί. [Comp. infra ix. 7. Ps. ii. 7. Is. xlii. 1. Matt. iii. 17. xvii. 5. 2 Pet. i. 17.]

12. ἐκβάλλει.] Not, as it is expressed by Grotius and others, ‘discedere jubet,’ or ‘cmisit sine vi;’ or ‘sendeth forth,’ as Newcome renders. For the word must here be taken of the strong and efficacious, though not overpowering, influence of the Holy Ghost. So in the passage of Matthew: ἀνίχθη εἰς τὴν ἔρημον ὑπὸ τοῦ Πνεύματος; and Luke: Ἰησοῦς δὲ Πνεύματος ἁγίου πλήρης—ἤγατο εἰς τὴν ἔρημον. Hence the expression is not well rendered driveth. Rather, ‘hurrieth.’

13. καὶ ἦν μετὰ τῶν θηρίων.] These words describe the scene of the temptation, which was one of the wildest parts of the desert; in the words of the Poet, ‘in silvis inter deserti ferarum Lustra domosque.’ Virg. Æn. iii. 646. Similar to what we read in Josephus, Ant. xv. 10, 1, ὑποφυγαὶ κατὰ τῆς γῆς καὶ (delend. sup.) σπήλαια, καὶ κοινὴ μετὰ τῶν βοσκημάτων διαίτα.

14. [Comp. John iv. 43.]

15. πεπληρωται] ‘adest, n̄c.’ Time is said πληροῦσθαι, partly when it is gone, and partly when any particular period approaches. So John vii. 8. Luke xxi. 24. Wetstein compares Josephus, Ant. vi. 4, 1, ἐξεδίχετο τὸν καιρὸν γενέσθαι πληρωθῆντος δὲ αὐτοῦ κ. τ. λ., Act. vii. 23, 30. ‘The time here spoken of (says Campbell) is that which, according to the predictions of the Prophets, was to intervene between their days, or between any period assigned by them, and the appearance of the Messiah. This had been revealed to Daniel, as consisting of what, in prophetic language, is denominated seventy weeks, that is (every week being seven years) 490 years; reckoning from the order issued to rebuild the Temple at Jerusalem. However much the Jews misunderstood many of the other prophecies relating to the reign of this extraordinary personage, what concerned both the time and the place of his first appearance seems to have been pretty well apprehended by the bulk of the nation. From the New Test., as well as from the other accounts of that period still extant, it is evident that an expectation of this great deliverer was then general among them.’ [Comp. Gal. iv. 4. Eph. i. 10; and see Dan. ix. 25.]

— μετανοεῖτε.] See Note on Matt. iii. 2.

16. βάλλοντας.] Most of the ancient MSS. have ἀμφιβάλλοντας, which is edited by Griesbach, Fritz., and Scholz. But as no example has been adduced of the compound in this phrase (where the ἀμφι is rendered by Fritz. hinc illuc), there seems no sufficient authority to alter the common reading; and probably the ἀμφι originated in a mere error of the scribes, from the word following.

discuss whether this clause should be understood imperatively, or declaratively. The result generally prefer the latter mode. But point and spirit, and perhaps more the former. By ἀπολίσσαι is not meant (as most of the Commentators imagine) ἀπολίσσαι (though the term in this connexion is used by Matthew) but rather, as Euthym. explains (in a popular sense), 'to destroy our power,' by expelling us from earth; so ἀπολίσσαι expresses the final end of them, namely, the being consigned to hell torments. Ὁ ἅγιος τοῦ κυρίου signifies, by the force of the Article, the Messiah, as being such κατ' ἐξουσίαν. An expression occurring also at Luke iv. 34, and John vi. 69 (in some of the most ancient MSS.), and on which comp. Ps. xvi. 10. Dan. ix. 24.

26. σπαράξαν.] Σπαράσσειν properly signifies to tear, lacerate; but here and in Luke ix. 39, it signifies to throw into violent convulsions and spasms, such as accompany epilepsy, and which are sometimes called σπασμοί, though usually σπασμοί by the Greek Medical writers. In the parallel passage of Luke the expression is, ῥίψαν αὐτὸν εἰς μίσην, alluding to the effect of such convulsions, the being prostrated on the ground, with violent agitation of the limbs.

tion as admiration. The whole may be rendered thus: 'What is this? of what sort is this new
(i. e. extraordinary) mode of teaching? for he [the teacher] gives his command authoritatively to the unclean spirits, and they obey him!' Of this sense of καὶ οὗτοι examples are found in Acts xvii.

self-derived and independent authority, as opposed to that of the Jewish exorcists.

tors are not agreed whether this denotes 'the country round about Galilee,' or 'the region of Galilee.' If the former method be adopted, the sense must be, 'not only throughout Galilee itself, but the circumjacent regions.' But this is at variance with the parallel passage of Luke iv. 37, eis πάντα τόπον τοῦ περιχώρου, and it would require καὶ τὴν περίχ. Thus the latter interpretation is preferable: in the sense 'the surrounding country of Galilee.' This signification of περίχ. is often found in the Sept., and also the New Test., as Matt. xiv. 35. See Mark vi. 55. Luke iii. 3. iv. 37.

30. κατέκειτο.] Κατακεῖσθαι, like the Latin jacere, is a term appropriate to one who is confined to his bed by sickness; and though generally used absolutely, is sometimes, as here, followed by a participle of some verb denoting sickness; either a general term, as νοσῶ and ἀσθενῶ, or a particular one, as here. ἤγειρεν κρατήσας τ. χ. must be considered in the same light as the ἤψατο τῆς χειρὸς αὐτῆς—namely, as an instance of Christ accompanying his words ('Be thou healed,' or the like) by a corresponding action; either simply touching the hand, or raising the person from his couch, as symbolical of recovery. Inasmuch that ἐγείρω sometimes denotes to heal.

32. ὅτε ἔδυν ὁ ἥλιος.] They waited till that time, (which was the end of the Sabbath) before they would bring their sick: since even to seek medical assistance in the day, unless in extreme danger, was thought a breach of the Sabbath.

34. πολλούς.] Matth. says, πάντας. But the one term is not inconsistent with the other. Jesus healed many, even all who were brought to him. [Comp. Acts xvi. 17, 18.]

— οὐκ ἤφι—αὐτόν] scil. τὸν Χριστὸν εἶναι, as is expressed in many MSS. and in Luke iv. 41. The sense is, 'He would not suffer them to speak, because they knew, and would address him as Messiah;' a title to which our Lord as yet made no public claim, lest he should excite tumult among the people.

36. κατεδίωξαν.] This word not only signifies persecuti, but insequi. See Hos. ii. 7. It here implies the ardent desire which Master Simon had of finding and accompanying his Master. In the passage of Luke this is ascribed to οἱ ὄχλοι. Yet there is, in effect, no discrepancy; since the two circumstances may both have taken place. First, it should seem, his disciples 'hunted him out' (as κατεδίωξαν literally means), and said what is recorded in Mark; and then the multitude, coming up, said what is recorded in Luke.

— ζητοῦσί σε.] The Ed. Pr. and very many MSS. have σε ζητοῦσι, which was edited by Griesbach, Matthæi, Fritz., and Scholz. But there seems no sufficient reason for change. External evidence is greatly in favour of the received reading, and internal scarcely less so: for it should seem that the ancient Critics changed the position, in order that the sentence might have a better termination, or for the sake of promoting euphony.

38. τὰς ἐχομένας 'neighbouring.' This signification of the word thus arises. Ἐχέσθαι τι signifies properly to hold oneself by any thing; then, to adhere to it; keep close to it; to be close to it, be near it, be neighbouring.

— κωμοπόλεις] This is a rare word, and occurs elsewhere only in Strabo, Ptolemy, J. Malala, and Isidore; and signifies a place between a city and a village, i. e. a country town, such as Joseph. Bell. i. 3. 2. says there were many in Galilee.

For κακεῖ I have edited καὶ ἐκεῖ, with Griesbach, Fritz., and Scholz, from very many MSS. and many early Editions: not merely, however, on account of MS. authority, but because the καὶ is emphatical; and wherever it is so, no crasis can be admitted. Ἐξεληλυθα is a stronger term than ἐληλυθα, meaning, 'I am come forth.'

39. ἐν ταῖς συν.] Griesbach, Tittmann, Voss, and Scholz edit ἐν τὰς συναγωγὰς, from a few MSS., as being the more difficult reading. But the Critical canon which prefers such has its exceptions; one of which is when (as here) it introduces what is quite contra linguam consuetudinem. For the use of eis for in will not here apply.

43. ἐμβριμησάμενος] 'having given him a strict charge.' See on Matt. ix. 30. Ἐξέβαλεν α. for ἀπέλυσεν, dismissed him quickly.

44. See Levit. xiv. 2.

45. κηρ. π. καὶ διαφ.] Here the latter term διαφ. (which occurs in the Classics) is intended to strengthen the former. Render: 'to publicly proclaim and divulge the thing.' Λόγον is used as at Matt. iv. 8, and elsewhere, by Hebraism, since τὸ is so employed. Compare Eurip. Cress. frag. vi. 3. κρύπτουσα, καὶ μὴ πᾶσι κηρύσσειν τάς. This circumstance is alone expressly mentioned by Mark, though it is implied in the words of Luke v. 15.

II. 1. δι' ἡμερῶν.] Euthymius and Theophyl. rightly take this for διελευσῶν ἡμερῶν τινῶν, 'after some days had intervened.' This sense of διὰ, mostly in composition, occurs both in the New Test. and the Sept., and in the best Classical writers. For πάλιν εἰσῆλθεν I have, with Matthæi, Fritz., and Scholz, edited εἰσῆλθε πάλιν in many MSS., with the Syr. and other ancient Versions, some Fathers, and the Ed. Pr. — εἰς οἶκον] domi, at home, namely, in the house in which he sojourned.

2. ὥστε μηκέτι χωρεῖν, &c.] Τὰ πρὸς τὸν εἰς τὸ πρόθυρον, the vestibule. The sense of the passage is, 'So that there was no longer place for them in the vestibule [much less the house itself].'

— τὸν λόγον.] Used κατ' ἔξοχην for τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ, or τῆς βασιλείας.

4. αἰρόμενον ὑπὸ τεσσ.

persons; namely, 'on a litter.' The construction is, καὶ ἔρχ. (scil. ἄνθρωποι) φέροντες πρὸς αὐτὸν παραλυτικὸν αἰρόμενον ὑπὸ τ.; namely, as we learn from Matthæi. and Luke, on a litter carried by them.

4. ἀπεστέγασαν τὴν στίγην, &c.] In the interpretation of this passage there are some difficulties, which have appeared to many Commentators so formidable, that they have endeavoured to remove them by resorting to various methods, almost all of them at variance with the meaning of the terms ἀπεστέγασαν, στίγην, and ἐξορύξαντες. The interpretation of Lightfoot, Whithy, Kuin., and Winer, is the least liable to objection, which supposes that the bearers brought the paralytic to the flat roof of the house by the stairs on the outside, or along the top, from an adjoining house, and then forced open the trap-door which led downwards, to the ὑπέρθυρον. But this forcing open the trap-door rests on mere supposition, without any support from the context; nay (as Fritz. remarks), the words ἀπεστέγασαν τὴν στίγην ὅπου ἦν can only mean that the bearers tore off the tiles in the very place under which they knew Jesus to be. We may suppose that, not able to approach Jesus in the room where he was (probably an upper room), they ascended to the flat roof by the outer stairs, and having uncovered the roofing (whether tiles or thatching), and dug through the lath and plaster, about the place where they understood Jesus to be, they let the couch down through the orifice. No other method could have effectually attained the object; namely, of bringing the litter to Jesus without having to pass through the crowd.

 8 26 ἐναντίον πάντων· ὥστε ἐξίστασθαι πάντας, καὶ δοξάζειν τὸν
 Θεὸν λέγοντας· Ὅτι οὐδέποτε οὕτως εἶδομεν.

— Ἐξορ. has here a significatio prænans, i. e. digging through and scooping out. So Joseph. Ant. xiv. 15, 12. καὶ τοὺς ὁρόφους τῶν οἰκῶν ἀνασκάπτων, digging up, and removing.

— χαλῶσι.] So Acts ix. 25. χαλάσαντες αὐτὸν ἐν σπυρίδι. and xxvii. 17. 2 Cor. xi. 33. Jerem. xxxviii. 6. The word does not, in this sense, occur in the best Classical writers.

5. ἰδὼν τὴν πίστιν α.] Namely, in these effects of it.

— σοι.] Griesbach, Tittmann, and Fritz. edit σου, omitting the σου following, from some MSS., confirmed, as they think, by ver. 9. But those MSS. are too few to have much weight; and ver. 9. can have none; for supposing σου there to be the true reading, yet what is so likely as that when a formula, such as ἀφένται σοι αἱ ἁμαρτίαι σου, is not employed directly, but put hypothetically, that it should be shortened.

6. οὕτω.] This, not found in some MSS., is cancelled by Fritz. But it is better retained, as being highly significant. Render: 'How does that man [dare to] so speak blasphemy!'

7. εἰ μὴ εἰς ὁ Θεός.] Some point εἰ μὴ εἰς, ὁ Θεός, in the sense, 'but one—that is God.' And they adduce as examples Matt. xix. 17. and Mark x. 18. But even in those passages εἰς ὁ Θεός may be the true pointing. And such is here required by the parallel passage of Luke. [Comp. Job xiv. 4. Is. xliii. 25.]

8. τῷ πνεύματι αὐτοῦ.] Some ancient and early modern Commentators take this to designate Christ's Divine nature, which consequently imparted omniscience. Others interpret it, 'by the Spirit,' i. e. the Holy Spirit, which, as man, our Lord had received. But of these interpretations the former is destitute of proof, and the latter is negatived by the αὐτοῦ added. There is, I think, no doubt that by πνεύματι is simply meant spirit. Upon the whole, there seems every reason to prefer the interpretation of Rosenmüller, Kuinoel, and Fritz., 'in his mind,' i. e. in himself. And though this is not expressed in Luke, yet it is implied in the word ἐπιγινούς, which is for γινούς ἐφ' αὐτῷ.

— αὐτοῖς.] This word (as also the reading σοὶ for σοὶ just after) is found in a great majority of the MSS., several Versions, Theophylact, and the Edit. Princ. It has been admitted by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, Fritz., and Scholz.

— τί.] In the passage of Matthew is added γάρ. Ταῦτα, scil. κωνηρά, expressed in the passage of Matthew.

9. ἔγειραι.] So Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittmann, Vater, Fritz., and Scholz edit, with several of the best MSS. and some early Editions, for ἔγειρε, which is a very irregular form. Yet it may have been a popular form, like some others used by Mark; and the reading is, in all the passages to which they appeal, doubtful. It is surely uncritical to dismiss an uncommon (and probably Hellenistic) form, and introduce a common one. Hence in all those passages I have left the received reading unaltered. The καὶ following is omitted in several of the best MSS. and some Versions, and is cancelled by almost all Editions from Griesbach to Scholz.

10. ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς ἀφίεναι.] This position, instead of the common one ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς is found in very many MSS. and Versions, and is adopted by Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, Fritz., and Scholz.

12. κράββατον.] A low and mean sort of bed, only large enough for one person, and so light as to be portable.

— ἐναντίον] 'coram.' This is not a mere Hebraism, but is a use found in the Classical writers. At οὕτω Heupel would supply τί and γενομένου. Fritz. maintains that it signifies hæc modo, equivalent to ut hæc res est. The sense, however, seems to be simply: 'Never did we see any thing so extraordinary; for at οὕτω we be supplied παράδοξον, lit. from the thought. So Luke: οἰδαμὶ παράδοξα σήμειον.

14. καὶ παράγων, &c.] Meaning, 'passing them, to go by the sea-side' (namely, to some other towns along the coast). The sea-side was the very place where the τελῶναι would be likely to be.

15. ἦσαν γὰρ—αὐτῷ.] These words have been variously rendered. Most Commentators, after Grotius, take the καὶ for the relative οἱ, and render, 'for there were many who had followed Levi, and had sat down to table with him.' But this involves a needless repetition, and it should rather seem that the αὐτῷ is to be referred to Jesus, the sense being, 'for there were many present [in Levi's house], and they had followed Jesus into the house.' Render: 'for there were many who had followed him (i. e. Jesus), and sat down to table with him.' So in the passage of Luke: καὶ ἦν ὄχλος τελωνῶν πολλῶν, καὶ ἄλλων, οἱ ἦσαν μετ' αὐτῶν κατακείμενοι. By αὐτῶν understand Jesus and his disciples.

16. τί θρῆ.] The sense of this idiom (which occurs both in the Scriptural and Classical writers) is, 'What is [the cause] that?' 'How is it that?' In the Classical writers a particle is generally interpolated. Luke uses διατί.

17. εἰς μετάνοιαν.] These words are wanting in many of the best MSS., in nearly all the Versions, and in some Fathers, and are cancelled by Griesbach, Fritz., and Scholz, being supposed to have been introduced from Luke v. 31. [Comp. I Tim. i. 15. infra xix. 10.]

18. οἱ τῶν Φαρισαίων.] Mill and Bengel would read οἱ Φαρισαῖοι, from most of the best MSS. and Versions, which is edited by Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz. But there is scarcely sufficient authority for the alteration.

— σοὶ μαθηταί.] It is strange that almost all Commentators should take this σοὶ as a Dative for Genit. For although the Dative is used for the Genitive, both in the Scriptural and Classical writers, yet only under certain circumstances, which here do not exist. Fritz. rightly remarks, that many such passages are either corrupt, or wrongly understood. And he adds, that unless a Dative can depend on the idea included in the subst., or be inserted by the bye, or be a Dativus commodi, or the like, it cannot be coupled with a substantive. He very properly takes the σοὶ as the Nominative plural of σὺς, σή, σόν.

20. ἐν ἐκείναις ταῖς ἡμέραις.] Several MSS. and Versions have ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ, which is preferred by Mill and Bengel, and edited by Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz; but without good reason; for, as Fritz. observes, it can on no account be admitted, since the plural refers to the preceding ἡμέραι. I would remark, too, that the testimony of the Versions is not of much weight, since in some of them the singular might be taken of time in general, and therefore be a free translation of the plural. A little reason is there for cancelling the καὶ just after, as is done by Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz, from many of the best MSS.; for the copula cannot be dispensed with.

9. 5. ράπτει ἐπὶ ἱματίῳ παλαιῷ· ἡ δὲ μὴ, αἶρει τὸ πλήρωμα αὐτοῦ τὸ καινὸν τοῦ παλαιοῦ, καὶ χεῖρον σχῆμα γίνεσθαι.

 4 4 αὐτοῦ; πῶς εἰσῆλθεν εἰς τὸν οἶκον τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἐπὶ Ἀβιά-26 θαρ τοῦ ἀρχιερέως, καὶ τοὺς ἄρτους τῆς προθέσεως ἔφαγεν,

21. αἶρει—παλαιῷ.] The construction is, τὸ πλήρωμα αὐτοῦ τὸ καινὸν αἶρει (τι) (ἀπὸ) τοῦ παλαιοῦ, 'its new supplement taketh (something) from the old [garment].' That the ancients supplied ἀπὸ, is plain from its appearing in the MSS. in various positions in the passage; but, no doubt, always from the margin. Πλήρωμα is for ἀναπλήρωμα, the supplementary piece.

23. ἐν τ. σάββ.] Luke vi. 1. says, more definitely, ἐν σαββάτῳ δευτεροπρώτῳ.

— παραπορεύεσθαι—σπορίμων.] Παραπ. is not here put (as many imagine) for πορεύεσθαι; nor is the sense of παραπ. διὰ τῶν σπ. what Abr., Pal., and Krebs. say, 'to pass by near the corn-fields.' The full sense is, 'to pass along (i. e. through) the corn-fields.' See Deut. xxiii. 25.

— ἤρξαντο ὁδὸν ποιεῖν τίλλοντες τ. σ.] This is (as Beza and Schleusner remark) an interchanged collocation (the primary notion being seated in the participle instead of the verb), for ἤρξαντο ὁδὸν ποιοῦντες τίλλειν, &c., as xi. 5, and Acts xxi. 13. Ὅδον ποιεῖν is Hellenistic Greek (with some tincture of Latinism) for ὁδὸν ποιεῖσθαι; the distinction between the Active and Middle voice being, in the later writers, often neglected.

24. Ἴδε τί—ἔξεστι.] Render: 'See! why (or how) are they doing on the Sabbath what is not lawful to be done?'

25. ὅτε χρεῖαν ἔσχε] 'when he was pressed by necessity.' See 1 Sam. xxi. 6.

— αὐτὸς—αὐτοῖς.] This is said κατ' ἐπινόρθωσιν. See Note on Matt. xii. 3.

26. ἐπὶ Ἀβιάθαρ τοῦ ἀρχ.] The sense of this disputed passage (found only in St. Mark) seems to be, 'during the High-priesthood of Abiathar.' But from the passage of the Old Test. alluded to (1 Sam. xxi. 6.), it appears that, at the period when the circumstance here adverted to took place, Ahimelech was High Priest; and other passages show that Abiathar was son of Ahimelech. To remove this difficulty, many methods have been proposed. Some would cut the passage out altogether; others admit that it was an error of memory in the Evangelist—methods alike exceptionable. Others endeavour to remove the difficulty by modifying the usual signification of ἐπὶ, or adopting other senses. But that is too precarious and inefficient a mode to deserve attention. Several recent Commentators suppose that the Evangelist has followed the Rabbinical mode of citation; which consists in selecting some principal word out of each section, and applying the name to the section itself. So Rom. xi. 2. ἐν Ἠλῆ. and Mark xii. 26. ἐπὶ τῇ Βάτρ. Thus the sense will be: 'In that portion of the book of Samuel where the History of Abiathar is related.' But this is not permitted by the collocation of the words; nor will ἐπὶ with the Genit. admit of such a signification. Neither is Abiathar called a High-Priest in 1 Sam. xxi. 2. seq. Others, again, think, that father and son had two names, and that the father was also called Abiathar. A solution manifestly made 'for the nonce,' and grounded on no proof whatever. Equally gratuitous is the supposition of some, that Abiathar was the Sagan, or Deputy to his father Ahimelech, and is therefore styled High-Priest. This, indeed, will not endure the severe historical touchstone applied to it by Fritz. Bp. Middleton, however, thinks that a great deal of learning and ingenuity have been employed to remove a difficulty which does not exist. This, he says, has arisen from imagining that the words of St. Mark, explained in the obvious way, would mean, 'in the priesthood of Abiathar;' a sense which, indeed, they will not admit. Without the Article, indeed, (continues he) such would have been the meaning, as in 1 Macc. xiii. 42. Luke iii. 2. ἐν ἀρχιερίῳ Ἄννα καὶ Καϊάφα. Demosth. i. 26. Thucyd. ii. 2. In fact, nothing is more common in the Classical writers. Now (argues the learned Prelate) in these examples the Article would imply, as in the case of Abiathar, that these persons were afterwards distinguished by their respective offices from others of the same name. And that the name Abiathar was not an uncommon one among the Jews, is certain. And this might render the addition τοῦ ἀρχ. natural, if not absolutely necessary. Thus the sense will be, that 'this action of David was in the time of Abiathar (as we should say, when he flourished), i. e. the noted person who was afterwards High-Priest.' So Luke iv. 27. ἐπὶ Ἐλισσαίου τοῦ προφήτου.

 Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου.] (Grotius, Campkessfeld, Kuinoel, and Fritz., strenuously that the sense here is not 'the Son of it a son of man.' For (says Campbell) & words are introduced as a consequence it has been advanced, the Son of man & be equivalent to men in the preceding, a term is introduced into the conclusion
 a not in the premises.' But this interpretable to very serious objections. Suffice
 1. that such a signification of Υἱὸς τοῦ founded in the New Test.; and 2. that use of κύριος no where exists either in the writers of later Greek, or the New a short, the interpretation can by no admitted, as introducing, on insuffienda, a very strong expression; which id to a laxity of opinion and practice as observance of the Sabbath, such as our id not mean to inculcate. Nor is it nes to interpret; for the ὅστε here may lative, but consecutive. Or, with Malmay be considered as completive. This strongly confirmed by the manner in Luke introduces the words. Besides, the pretation is negatived by the kai (even) sent passage; which has great force, and as Doddridge justly observes) that 'the was an institution of high importance; perhaps also refer to that signal authority rist, by the ministry of his Apostles, exert over it, in changing it from the the first day of the week.' We may this was a delicate way of claiming to be SAH, as in the words uttered by our another occasion (Matt. xii. 6.): 'There nothing greater than the Temple.'
 & the reasoning seems to be this: that Sabbath was an institution meant for the man, the relaxation of the strict observ-might, in some extreme cases, be justithat of David, and in this of his disci-
 , if that were not the case, that His use and permission were a sufficient au-

)L. I.

III. 1. πάλιν.] Namely, as is expressed in the passage of Luke, ἐν ἑτέρῳ σαββάτῳ.

2. παρετήρουν.] Παρατηρεῖν signifies, 1. to keep one's eyes fixed beside or close to (παρὰ) any person or thing; 2. to watch, whether for a good, or (as generally) for an evil purpose. Here there may seem to be a slight discrepancy between this account (together with that of Luke) and Matthew's. But, in fact, the circumstances are independent of each other, and may both have taken place. First, it should seem, the Pharisees watched to see what Jesus would do. And, when it seemed doubtful whether he would go and heal the cripple, they (to entrap him at least in his words) propounded a pretended question of conscience, — whether it was lawful to heal on the Sabbath-day. Our Lord, however, knowing the evil motive which prompted their inquiry, vouchsafed no answer to it,—but proceeded immediately, in contempt of their treacherous plot, to heal the man; and afterwards (as was customary with the Jewish disputants) replies to a question by another question.

3. Ἐγείραι εἰς τὸ μέσον.] St. Luke adds, ὁ δὲ ἀναστὰς ἔστη.

4. Ἐξίστι τοῖς σάββασιν ἀγαθὸν. ἢ κακόν.]
 By interruption (far more pointed and significant than the mere declarative form) our Lord thus answers question by question (as it is said in the passage of Luke, ἐπαρωτήσω ὑμᾶς τι, &c.); so leaving themselves to decide the point. By the expression ἀγαθοποιῆσαι he adverts to the healing of the cripple; and by κακοποιῆσαι to the designs against his own life, which the Pharisees were plotting even on the Sabbath. This appeal (as we find from the passage of Matthew) our Lord made the stronger by the apt illustration of an ox or an ass fallen into a pit on the Sabbath-day; from which he draws the inference, 'How much then is a man better than a sheep? Wherefore it is lawful to do good on the Sabbath-days.'

5. μετ' ὀργῆς.] It is not necessary here to discuss, with Commentators, the question, whether our Lord really felt anger, or not; or what is the true definition of anger; for the word ὀργή does not here denote anger, but (as sometimes in the Classical writers) indignation; a view established by the word following συλλυπούμενος, 'being grieved in mind,' which was, no doubt, meant to qualify ὄργη, intimating that with the indignation was mingled concern and grief at the fate reserved for his adversaries. Comp. Matt. xxiii. 37. Πῶρός· (from πῶρος, a hard piece of skin) signifies callousness, perversity.

— ὡς ἡ ἄλλη.] These words, which are omitted in several MSS., most of the Versions, and some Fathers, are rejected by most Critics, and cancelled by almost all the Editors from Griesbach to Scholz as introduced from Matt. xii. 13. 'Ἀποκαθιστάναι signifies generally 'to restore any thing to its former state,' and is, in the Passive, by Hippocrates, and the late Greek writers, including the Sept., used of restoration from sickness to health. So Hippocrates, Epidem. p. 1222, ἡ γλῶσσα ἀποκαθίστατο εἰς ταῦτό. [Comp. 1 Kings xiii. 6.]

6. [Comp. Matt. xxii. 16.]

7. τὴν θάλασσαν] i. e. the sea of Galilee or Tiberias. [Comp. John vi. 1. Matt. iv. 25.]

8. οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰδουμαίας, &c.] Here, we see, commenced the fulfilment of that prophecy, Is. xlii. 4, as expressed by Matt. xii. 21, καὶ ἐν τῷ ὄνόματι αὐτοῦ ἔθνη ἐλπίουσι.

— οἱ περὶ Τύρον καὶ Σιδῶν.] Meaning (as Grotius rightly observes) not the Tyrians and Sidonians, but those who inhabited the confines of Tyre and Sidon. In short, περὶ here is used for ἀμφὶ, circa, circum, as Thucyd. vi. 2, ἔκοντο Φοίνικας περὶ πᾶσαν τὴν Συρίαν.

9. πλοίαριον] a skiff or barge. Προσκαρτερῇ αὐτῷ, 'should attend upon him.' Προσκαρτερεῖν signifies, 1. to persevere in, and continue intent on any thing; 2. to attend on any person. So Acts viii. 13, βαπτισθεὶς ἦν προσκαρτερῶν τῷ ἑλπίῳ, and also in several passages of the Classical writers cited by the Commentators.

10. μᾶστιγας] i. e. 'grievous disorders,' such as are, as it were, a scourge to the sufferer.

11. πνεύματα τὰ ἀκάθαρτα—προσέτινται] Camer., Rosenm., and Kuinoel, take πνεύματα to denote the persons who were troubled with demons. But, as Fritz justly remarks, 'there is here ascribed to demons, what the persons possessed by them did, because those persons were not their own masters, but were governed by the demons.'

— ὅταν αὐτὸν ἐθεώρει] for ὅτε &c. θεώρειν is often as they saw him.

12. [Comp. supra i. 25.]

14. ἐποίησι] 'appointed.' As in Apoc. i. 6, καὶ ἐποίησεν ἡμᾶς βασιλεῖς καὶ ἱερεῖς τῷ θεῷ, and sometimes in the later Classical writers. So the Heb. עשה in 1 Sam. xii. 6, and sometimes the Latin facere, as in Cicero pro Plancio, 4 [Comp. Matt. x. 1. Luke ix. 1.]

15. ἱερωσύνην.] The word here signifies rather power than authority.

16. πρῶτον Σίμωνα.] Beza, Schmid, Glos, Scott, Newcome, Wakef., Campbell, and Fritz, introduced this addition, on the authority of at least four MSS., as being necessarily required to complete the sense; for the vulg. introduced an intolerable roughness and negligence of style. There is, indeed (as Matthæi admits), a manifest lacuna, which is supplied in various ways, in the MSS., but in none so satisfactorily as in the above manner. It has, indeed, been objected, that it supposed to be introduced from Matt. x. at passage, as Fritz. observes, is very I cannot, however, help suspecting ὅτι ἐξέστη was derived from that source; little doubt but that the true reading without πρώτων, which is confirmed the passage of Luke vi. 14. Besides, it is probable that one word should have been than two. And thus we are enabled for the omission, on the principle of omission, or rather general similarity; for right characters Σίμωνα is not unlike Πέτρον. That would cause the omission in Mark; though I have no doubt but that, in Mark, occasioned by its standing by itself, it forms no part of the construction; belongs to the preceding ἐποίησε δάτε in the Cod. Vatic. In four other places was inserted (though probably not originally), because it softens the seeming which, however, is less, if we consider words preceding ἰτα ὡς—δαιμόνια are, source, parenthetical.

καὶ ἐπέθηκε—Πέτρον are here etymologically; because, in fact, this sur- given to Simon when on the Mount of Olives. See Matt. xvi. 18. John i. 42. πῶς.] With this word the Commenda- such perplexed. One thing is certain, as not correctly represent the Syro- sem. What that was, the Commenda- is agreed. Most think, with Jerome, the word is Βασιλεία, from the Heb. in Heb. מלך often signifies thunder. and too much from the vestigia litera- rums derive it from the Heb. מלך מ- rnotes further, and only signifies 'sons r sound. The best derivation seems to Latinus, De Dieu, and Fritz., מלך מ- Syriac and Arabic signifies thunder. מלך seems to be a slight corruption מלך. On the reason for this appella- sion's introd.

20. ἔρχονται εἰς οἶκον.] The full sense is, as Fritz. points out, 'et relicto monte, domum veniunt.'

— μήτε ἄρτον φαγεῖν] i. e. not even to take food (by a common Hebraism); much less to attend to any thing else. [Comp. vi. 31.]

21. καὶ ἀκούσαντες—αὐτόν.] Several ques- tions are involved in the discussion of the sense of this passage: 1. who are the οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ? 2. to what report may ἀκούσαντες be thought to have reference? 3. what is the sense of ἐξῆλθον and of κρατῆσαι? 4. who those are that are represented as saying ἐξέστη? Fritz., after a long and minute discussion, determines (as I had my- self previously done in Rec. Syn.) that the true sense is that of the ancient and many eminent modern Commentators (Grotius, Beza, Kypke, Campbell, Wetstein, Valcqn., and Kuinoel), as follows: 'When Jesus' kinsfolk (i. e. his mother and brothers, see ver. 31.) had heard (that he was at Capernaum, and what had taken place), they went out from their house, in order that they might lay hands on him; for, said they, he is surely beside himself.' Fritz. remarks that the Greeks say εἶναι παρὰ τινος, in the sense 'to be of any one's nation or family'; as in Susanna, ver. 33, ἐκλαιον δὲ οἱ παρ' αὐτῆς. Κρατῆσαι signi- fies to lay hands on and hold fast; yet it does not necessarily imply violence, but sometimes only friendly earnestness, as in 2 Kings iv. 8, and Mark ix. 27. 'Ἐξέστη (sub. τοῦ νοῦ, or φρονέω, some- times expressed, γνώμη) is to be taken in a figu- rative sense for 'he is transported too far.'

22. Βεελζὺ ἔχει] i. e. he is possessed of Beel- zebub. [Comp. Matt. ix. 34. John vii. 20. vii. 48. x. 20.]

23—29. In these verses is shown, 1. the ab- surdity of the charge; and 2. the wickedness of it; it being of so deep a dye, that it will never be for- given.

from the adjunct, to be at variance, and in opposition. In which case it carries with it the regimen of verbs of opposing.

27. οὐ δύναται οὐδεὶς.] A great number of MSS., some Versions, and the Edit. Princ., have οὐδεὶς δύναται, which is edited by Griesbach, Matthæi, and Scholz; but injudiciously: for the common reading, as being the more difficult, is to be preferred, and is very properly retained by Tittman, Vater, and Fritz. This idiom of the double negative is frequent in Scripture (as John vi. 63. ix. 33), though it was generally stumbled at, more or less, by the scribes. In τοῦ ἰσχυροῦ the force of the Article is that of insertion in Hypothesis. See Middleton, Gr. Art. c. lii. § 2, 1.

28. καὶ αἱ.] Thus several of the best MSS. read for καὶ. And so Griesbach, Tittman, Fritz., and Scholz edit: very properly: since it is far easier to account for the omission than for the insertion of the αἱ. Besides, the article is here as much required as at ἀμαρτ. just before. [Comp. Luke xii. 10. 1 John v. 16.]

29. βλασφ. εἰς τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγ.] See Note on Matt. xii. 31. A similar mode of expression occurs in Josephus, Bell. ii. 8, 9, βλασφημῶν εἰς τοῦτο, i. e. the name of Moses.

— κρίσεως.] The ἀμαρτήματος (or ἀμαρτίας), which Grotius, Mill, Griesb., Rosenm., and Kuinoel, would read, is a mere emendation of the common reading to improve the antithesis; which, however, is unnecessary.

30. ὅτι ἔλεγον—ἔχει.] These are the words of the Evangelist, not of our Lord.

31. ἔρχονται οὖν.] The οὖν is here, as often; resumptive, taking up the thread of the narrative from ver. 21. Instead of οἱ ἀδελφοὶ καὶ ἡ μήτηρ, a few ancient MSS., and most of the Versions have ἡ μήτηρ καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοί, which is edited by Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz. But there is no sufficient authority for the change; which may, with Wetstein and Fritz. be accounted for from a wish to do honour to the mother of Christ. By ἔξω is meant, not outside of the house, but outside of the crowd.

— φωνοῦντες αὐτόν.] Render 'calling him forth.'

32. καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοὶ σου.] Many MSS. and the Edit. Princ. add καὶ αἱ ἀδελφαὶ σου, which words are introduced in the text by Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz; but are, with more reason, rejected by Kuinoel and Fritz.

IV. 1. ἤρξατο διδάσκειν] for εἶδεν, my most Commentators. But, as Fritz. shows, the phrase may have its full force. The sense being, 'He began to teach by the sea;' and then, by the increasing crowd of auditors, he was compelled to embark on board the vessel (mentioned supra iii. 9), and there to instruct the people, seated on ship-board at sea (as opposed to ἐν τῇ γῇ just after); for such is the sense of this expression καθ. ἐν τῇ θαλ. Comp. Prov. xxiii. 34, κατακίση ὡς περὶ ἐν καρδίᾳ θαλάσσης. By εἶshow it. That it must be retained is nec it is the more difficult reading, and ἱερμῶν καὶ πλοῦτον καὶ ἡδονὰν τοῦ τὸν οὐκ ἔδωκε] 'did not yield fruit.'

 not necessary to be said of the former first growth justly afforded some hope ous increase. (Rosenmüller.) It

 x. 8. Exod. xviii. 3, 4.

9. αὐτοῖς.] The word is omitted in very many MSS., nearly all the Versions, and the early Editions, and is cancelled by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz.

10. καταμόνας.] Sub. χώρας, apart, what is in a manner 'at [a separate] part.' The expression occurs both in the Scriptural and Classical writers.
 Οἱ περὶ αὐτὸν means 'those that were about him.' By which expression are designated the stated attendants on our Lord's ministry, his regular disciples, probably (as Euthym. thinks) the Seventy disciples. So Jamblich. Vit. Pyth. 17, οἱ περὶ τὸν ἄνδρα means Pythagoras's disciples. The construction ἡρωτῶν τινα τί is remarkable.

11, 12. On the sense of this passage see the Note on Matt. xiii. 10, 17, where we have the citation in a complete state, and doubtless as our Lord quoted it; from whence it appears (to use the words of Mr. Ogilvy, Bampton Lect. 103), that 'a mode of expression which at first sounds like a statement of the final cause is, in truth, to be understood in a milder sense, and implies no more than that between our Lord's chosen method of teaching, and that moral condition of his hearers which the Prophet described, there was a designed coincidence; in other words, that the former fitted and suited, and was meant to fit and suit, the latter. In this and the parallel passage of Luke there is a brief mode of quotation, or of reference; and it was the object of both Evangelists, in perfect agreement with St. Matthew, to point out a two-fold fulfilment of a remarkable passage of Scripture, as that passage related, on the one hand, to the moral condition of the hearers of the Messiah, and on the other to the peculiar manner of instruction which he adopted. [Comp. Is. vi. 9 John xii. 40. Acts xxviii. 26. Rom. xi. 8.]

those of Is. vi. 9, καὶ ἰάσωμαι αὐτούς; the Hebrews viewing all severe disorders as the punishment of sin. And that those were really such under the Mosaic dispensation, Abp. Magee (on Atonement, vol. i. p. 433) thinks we may fairly infer from John v. 14. But the Hebrew is ἡ נַפְתִּי, 'ne gens salva evadat.' For, as Fritz, observes, the Heb. נַפְתִּי (as also the Chaldee נַפְתִּי) to heal, often signifies to forgive, offences being compared with wounds and disorders.

13. καὶ πῶς.] 'And how then?' Among the other significations of kai when prefixed to interrogations is that of drawing a consequence, as in Matt. iii. 14, and here.

14. ὁ σπείρων—σπείρει.] A brief and popular form of expression, of which the sense is, 'The sower [mentioned in the parable] is to be considered as one sowing the Word [of God].'

15. ὁ παρὰ τὴν ὁδὸν] scil. σπειρόμενοι, or σπαρέντες. "Ὅπου is for οἴς, whom, which is, indeed, found in some MSS. and the Syr., but is doubtless a gloss. So the Latin ubi for in quo.

16. ὁμοῖοι] i. e. 'by a similar mode of explanation.' [Comp. Is. lviii. 2. Ezek. xxxiii. 31.]

18. οὗτοί εἰσιν.] These words are omitted in many MSS., the Ed. Princ., and Bengel, several Versions, and some Fathers, and are with reason cancelled by Wetstein, Matthæi, Tittman, Vater, and Fritz.

19. τούτου.] Griesbach and Fritz, cancel this word, on the authority of some MSS., as being introduced from the other Gospels. But the sense will scarcely dispense with the word, and the custom of the New Test. requires it. It is, besides, absent from so very few MSS., that the omission may be thought accidental, or introduced elegantia gratiâ,—for the passage reads better without it.

— ἡ ἀπάτη τοῦ πλούτου.] Some recent Interpreters take ἀπάτη for τίρψις. But there is no reason to abandon the common interpretation, 'the deceptableness or deceiving tendency of riches,' which is expressive of those various deceits which accompany riches, producing disappointment, and throwing a veil over the heart, as to real happiness here and hereafter. See 1 Tim. vi. 17.

— αἱ περὶ τὰ λ. ἐπιθ.] The sense seems to be, 'the desires conversant about the rest of the gemma of life' (to use an old English term). Δορὰ alludes to what are called by St. Paul the τῆς σαρκὸς ἐπιθυμίαι, and by Luke viii. 14, ἀδολαί τοῦ βίου. Mr. Greswell, Parab. vol. i. p. 51, shows that αἱ μέρμυραι τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου refers to the ambitious, whose desire is after power and influence: the ἀπάτη τοῦ πλούτου, to the man of business, whose aim is to amass wealth; and αἱ περὶ τὰ λοιπὰ ἐπιθυμίαι to the notaries of pleasure and sensual gratification; and that not merely corporeal, but even mental and intellectual. And what, adds he, is this but some one or other of the manifold shapes under which the same common property of apparent good presents itself in the form of the pleasant?

20. παραδέχονται] 'receive and entertain it, assent to it.' Ἐν τριάκοντα, &c. The best way of accounting for this use of ἐν where we should expect εἰς is to suppose (with Grotius and Fritz), that the Evangelist suddenly returns back from the thing, and the application, to the parallel itself.

21. αὐτοῖς] i. e. the disciples, not the people at large. Compare vv. 21, 24, 26, and Luke vii. 16—18. And although vv. 21—25 are brought forward in another sense at Matt. v. 15; x. 26; vii. 2, 13, yet proverbial sententiae like this are (as Grotius observes) applicable in various views. On the sense here see Whitby.

— μήτι] 'num quid.' An adverb sometimes

22 νην; οὐχ ἵνα ἐπὶ τὴν λυχνίαν † ἐπιτεθῇ; Οὐ γάρ ἐστὶ τι κρυπτόν, ὃ εἰάν μὴ φανερωθῇ· οὐδὲ ἐγένετο ἀπόκρυφον, 23 ἀλλ' ἵνα εἰς φανερόν ἔλθῃ. Εἴ τις ἔχει ὥτα ἀκούειν, ἀκου-24 ἔτω. Καὶ ἔλεγεν αὐτοῖς· Βλέπετε, τί ἀκούετε. Ἐν ᾧ 18 μέτρῳ μετρεῖτε, μετρηθήσεται ὑμῖν, καὶ προστεθήσεται ὑμῖν 25 τοῖς ἀκούουσιν. Ὃς γὰρ ἂν ἔχῃ, δοθήσεται αὐτῷ· καὶ ὅς οὐκ ἔχει, καὶ ὃ ἔχει ἀρθήσεται ἀπ' αὐτοῦ.
 26 Καὶ ἔλεγεν· Οὕτως ἐστὶν ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ, ὥς εἰάν 27 ἄνθρωπος βάλῃ τὸν σπόρον ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, καὶ καθεύδῃ καὶ ἐγείρηται νύκτα καὶ ἡμέραν· καὶ ὁ σπόρος βλαστάνῃ καὶ 28 μῆκύνῃται, ὥς οὐκ οἶδεν αὐτός·—αὐτομάτῃ γὰρ ἡ γῆ καρποφορεῖ, πρῶτον χόρτον, εἴτα στάχυν, εἴτα πλήρη σίτον ἐν 29 τῷ στάχυν·—ὅταν δὲ παραδῷ ὁ καρπός, εὐθέως ἀποστέλλει τὸ δρέπανον, ὅτι παρήσθηκεν ὁ θερισμός.

involving affirmation, sometimes, as here, negation, in which case Hoogen. says it is emphatic. ἔρχεται, for φέρεται, Neuter for passive, by an idiom common to both Greek and Latin, as spoken of epistles; though occurring also in other cases, as Thucyd. i. 137. ἤλθα γάρ, scil. χρόματα αὐτῷ ὕστερον ἐκ τῶν Ἀθηνῶν.

For ἐπιτεθῇ several MSS. (some of them ancient) and Theophylact have τισθῇ, which was proposed by Mill, and edited by Griesbach and Fritz. But there is not sufficient authority for the alteration, which seems to be a mere emendation of the Alexandrian school. As little ground is there for the omission of the τι just afterwards by the same Editors.

By κλίσην must be understood a couch, which, as Grotius observes, had such a cavity as to admit of a candelabrum being put under it; nay, it seems, any thing much larger. Indeed, from the citations adduced by Wetstein, it appears to have been used by the ancients as a common hiding-place. [Comp. Matt. v. 15. Luke xi. 33.]

22. οὐδὲ ἐγένετο ἀπόκρυφον, ἀλλ' ἵνα, &c.] An elliptical form for οὐδὲ ἐγένετο ἀπόκ. (ἀλλ' ἐγένετο ἀπόκρυφον) ἵνα, &c. Render: 'but that it shall be revealed.' εἰάν μὴ being taken, as in Mark x. 30, as equivalent to ἀλλ' ἵνα in the other clause. [Comp. Matt. x. 26. Luke xii. 2.]

24. βλέπετε τί ἀκούουσιν.] There is an obscurity about this verse, which, as usual, has given rise to several readings, and induced Editors to adopt various expedients to remove it. Griesbach and Tittman expunge the clause καὶ προστεθήσεται—ἀκούουσιν, with a few MSS.; and Vater, from some MSS., cancels the τοῖς &c. But Fritz. shows that neither emendation can be received; and he himself edits βλέπετε, τί ἀκούετε, καὶ προστεθήσεται ὑμῖν τοῖς ἀκούουσιν. Ὡς μέτρῳ μετρεῖτε, μετρηθήσεται ὑμῖν. By this emendation the thought is expressed more logically and neatly. Yet as there is no direct authority for the change, and as the Evangelist is by no means characterized by exact composition, it ought not to have been introduced into the text.

The τι here answers to the ὥς of Luke. [Comp. Matt. xiii. 12. xxv. 29. Luke viii. 18. xix. 26.]

26—32. There is here a continuation of our Lord's discourse, which is now addressed to the people at large. On the bearing and application of the following parable Commentators differ; some referring it to the seed which fell on good ground, in the preceding parable of the sower. While others think the correspondence in many respects fails; and they are of opinion, that it should be taken in connection with the preceding verses, and was intended to prevent the Apostles from being dispirited, when they did not see their labours attended with success.

27. καθεύδῃ καὶ ἐγείρηται, &c.] This expression is like that of Ps. iii. 5. ἐκοιμήθην καὶ ὑπνῶσα, ἐξηγήσθην, and is an expressive image of easiness and unconcern, security and confidence. This verse is, as Mr. Gresswell observes, (vol. ii. 125.) parenthetical (its object being to explain the conclusion of the preceding verse); for v. 29 is connected with the foregoing context by a δι resumptive, and ἀποστέλλει, which is without a governing substantive; while, by the usual rules of syntax, it would either be referred to καρπός just before, or to γῆ at v. 28, here must evidently be to ἀνθρ. at v. 26.

28. αὐτομάτως properly signifies self-moved, and is here (as often in the Classical writers) used of that energy of nature which is independent of human aid. Καρποφορεῖ is generally taken for φέρει; the καρπο being inert, as in Diod. Sic. p. 137. ἀμπαλός—καρποφορεῖ τὸν οἶνον. But Beza, Pisc., and Fritz. more properly give it the full sense fruges fert, and take φέρει from it in the next clause.

—χόρτον.] For want of some such definite term as our blade, the Greeks and Romans were obliged to use the same word as denoted grass. Χόρτον and στάχυν are put in the singular, because they are used in a generic sense, which implies plurality. Στάχυν (derived from στάω) denotes the ear in its green state, and it is so called from the peculiarly erect form it then has. Πλήρη σίτον means the complete, perfect, and mature grain. So Gen. xli. 7. στάχυας πλήρεις. Here, then, the several stages of the mysterious process carried on by nature are expressed by a sort of natural climax.

29. ὅταν δὲ παραδῷ ὁ καρπός.] With this

34. ἐπὶ ἑαυτὰ πάντα] 'gave solutions of every thing' (that was obscure to them). 'Ἐπιλύειν (as the Heb. נָתַן and the Latin solvere) often has this sense. Its primary signification is to untie a knot.

36. παραλαμβάνουσιν—ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ.] On the interpretation of this passage Commentators are not agreed. Most take ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ as put for ἐν τῷ πλοῖον in this sense: 'after he had dismissed the multitude, his disciples took him, just as he was (i. e. unprepared as he was, and without delay), on board the ship.' As, however, this taking of ἐν for ἐν is here somewhat harsh, I should be rather inclined to agree with Euthym. and some other ancients, together with several modern Commentators, in joining ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ with ὡς ἦν; which renders any emallage unnecessary. Thus the sense will be, that 'on the dismissal of the multitude, they carried him off, just as he sat in the boat [out of which he had been teaching.] Yet such a reference to the boat mentioned supra v. 1. involves a certain harshness, and the sense arising is unsatisfactory. 'Ἦν is a term not significant enough to have ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ joined with it; which words are plainly joined in construction with παραλαμβάνουσιν. Moreover, ἐν τῷ πλ. is, strictly speaking, not used for ἐν τῷ πλοῖον, but as a phrasis pragmatica (and hence the dativus is used for the Accusative) denoting, 'they took him on board, and carried him in the bark,' [namely, that mentioned supra v. 1.] See Note on Matt. xiv. 32. In this sense παραλαμβάνουσιν is used in Thucyd. i. 111. et alibi. To advert to the expression ὡς ἦν, this need not be understood in the somewhat jejune sense just as he was, i. e. without waiting for refreshment or accommodations for the passage. It may simply be taken to mean, as in many passages of the best writers, 'quasi coarctissime.' See my Note on Thucyd. iii. 81. ὅσπερ ἔχομεν. This was done agreeably to their Master's injunction, and probably because the evening was coming on. See Fritz., who here aptly compares Lucian Asin. c. 24. κάτω ἀφῆκαν ὡς ἦν ἐν τῷ δέσμῳ.

— μετ' αὐτοῦ] i. e. with Jesus's vessel. This being an example of the figure, by which the vessel is put for the crew, or the crew for the vessel. Add Thucyd. iv. 120. 2. ὅπως εἰ μὴν τιμὴ τοῦ κίλητος μίξουσι πλοῖον περιτυγχάνουσι, ἢ τριήρης ἀμυνοὶ αὐτῷ.

37. λαίλαψ] a whirlwind; for the ancient Lexicographers explain it by συστροφή, and Aristot. de Mundo, by πνεῦμα βίαιον, καὶ εἰλούμενον κάτωθεν ἄνω. It seems derived from λαί, very, and λάπτειν, to snatch, take off, carry away. 'Ἐπίβαλλε is to be taken in an intransitive sense for se injiciant, irruciant. Γεμίζεσθαι. Supply ἐκ τῶν κυμάτων from the preceding.

— τὰ δὲ κύματα, &c.] Render: 'And now the waves,' &c.; for the δα has the exemplificatory force treated on at John iii. 1.

38. τῇ πρύμνῃ] i. e. the place where the steersman sat, and the most commodious one for a passenger. Τὸ προσκεφ. must be rendered, the pillow. The Article having a peculiar force, as pointing to a particular part of the furniture of the ship. This seems to have been the leather-stuffed cushion, which was occasionally used as a pillow.

— ἀπολλύμεθα] 'we are perishing.'

39. σιώπα, πεφ.] The αἰνιγματώδης here is very suitable to the gravity of the address, and the dignity of the occasion. Moreover, the use of two terms, however seemingly synonymous, ἀνέμῳ and θαλάσῃ, the sense. Thus even in the form with which cryers, or heralds, commenced their addresses, 'Ἀκουε, σίγα. [See Ps. cvii. 29.]

41. ἔλεγον.] Meaning, not the disciples only, but the mariners also.

V. 1. Γαδαρηνῶν.] See Note on Matt. viii. 28.

2. ἀνθρώποις ἐν πν. ἀκ.] Subj. αὐν. See ver.

25. γυνή τις οὕσα ἐν ῥύσει αἵματος. * On with in is equivalent to ἐνεχόμενος, 'labouring under.'

3. τὴν κατοίκησιν.] The Article refers to αὐτοῦ understood; and the force of the Imperfect in εἶχεν is that of use and habit. Μνήμασι, instead of the Vulg. μνημείοις, is read in a great part of the MSS. and the Edit. Princ. It was with reason preferred by Mill, adopted by Wets., and edited by Bengel, Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, Fritz., and Scholz. The common reading arose, no doubt, from ver. 2. The tombs of the ancients, especially in the East, were tolerably roomy vaults, and would be no indifferent shelter for the houseless, or such poor wretches as demonsiacs or lepers, driven from human habitations. Indeed, from Diog. Laert. ix. 38. ἐρημῶν ἐνίοτε, καὶ τοῖς τάφοις ἐνδιατρίβων, we find that they were sometimes used as places of abode. See also Is. lxxv. 4. The tombs in question were doubtless hypogææ, caverns cut out of the mountains, doubtless similar to those at Telmessus and Petra; and which, as we learn from travellers, still remain, and form, at the present day, habitations for the living.

5. ἐν τοῖς—ᾤν.] This punctuation I have adopted with the Vulg., Syr., E. V., Doddridge, Winer, and Fritz., as being required by propriety. To place the comma after κρᾶζων, as is generally done, would yield a false sense. The position ἐν τοῖς μν. καὶ ἐν τοῖς ὄρεσιν for the common reading ἐν τοῖς ὄρεσιν καὶ ἐν τοῖς μν., is found in many of the best MSS., and almost all the Versions, and is edited by Griesbach, Fritz., and Scholz. Here, indeed, it is the more suitable, since the words will thus be placed in the same order as νυκτὸς καὶ ἡμέρας; an order most proper and correct, the sepulchres being probably their habitation by night, and the mountains by day. For those, too, were used occasionally as habitations. So Aristoph. Lysist. 781, ὅτι φιλόγων Ἰάμον, ἀφικετ' ἐς ἐρημίαν, κύν τοῖς ὄρεσιν ᾤκει.

—κατακόπτων.] This is not well rendered cutting. The κατὰ is highly intensive; κατακόπτω answering to the Latin considero, and meaning to cut up, to hack and hew. In which sense the word occurs, both in the Sept. and the Classical writers. This circumstance of cutting himself with sharp stones, instead of a knife (which, of course, would not be granted him) is quite in the manner of maniacs; who often tear their flesh, and cut it with whatever they can lay their hands on. So Pausan. Lacon., cited by Wetstein, says of one: ἐπιτρώσκει αὐτὸν αὐτὸν, καὶ διέξῃ τὸ σῶμα ἅπαν, κόπτων τὰ καὶ λυμαίνόμενος. See also Just. xiii. 6, 17. In the present instance, however, it was manifestly the result of demoniacal possession.

7. Θεοῦ τοῦ ὑψίστου.] The epithet ὁ ὑψίστος, as applied to God, occurs no where else in the Gospels, and only once elsewhere in the N. T., i. e. Heb. vii. 1, taken from Gen. xiv. 22. It corresponds to the Heb. גָּדוֹל. The appellations seem to have been at first given with reference to the exalted abode of God, i. e. in Heaven. See Isa. lxvi. 1. They may also refer to the supreme majesty of the Deity. Hence in the Old Test. גָּדוֹל is almost always used to distinguish the true God from those who were called gods.

—ὀρκίζω σε τὸν Θεόν.] This formula usually denotes to put any one on his oath. See Note on Matt. xxvi. 63. But here (as Grotius, Roscman, and Kuinoel have shown) it has the force of swear, obtestor te per Deum, and thus is equivalent to the diœmal σου of Luke vii. 28.

—μή με βασανίσῃς.] Namely, as some ancient and modern Commentators explain, 'by compelling me to depart from the man.' But this interpretation, however agreeable to the context, is somewhat harsh, and is not permitted by the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke; from whence it appears that the word is to be taken of the mode of torment, which was supposed to be apportioned to demons, after being compelled to come out of possessed persons, namely, the being forced (as Luke expresses it) εἰς τὴν ἀβυσσὸν ἀπελθεῖν (see 2 Pet. ii. 4. and Apoc. ix. 1, 2 xi. 7, &c.), a term applied by the Greeks to their Tartarus. The words of ver. 10, καὶ παραβῆμι—ἔξω τῆς χώρας may, indeed, seem to favour the first-mentioned interpretation. But they are equally suitable to the other. The demons retreat that if they must depart from the man, they may at least not be compelled to leave the country; which was but another form of proffering the first-mentioned request, that he would not send them away to the place of torment.

8. ἔλεγε γάρ.] Render (with Tindal, and after him Newcome and Campbell) 'had said.'

—τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἀκάθαρτον.] This I have pointed off, because (though the Editors have not seen it) πνεῦμα is as it were a Vocative. The Nom.

with the Art. being put for the Voc., as at ix. 25. In such a case the word is most usually a masculine or feminine; yet the nouter sometimes so occurs; as Luke xii. 32, μή φοβού, τὸ μικρὸν πομπιόν, Eph. vi. 1, τὰ τέκνα, ὑπακούετε, &c.

9. ἀπεκρίθη λέγων.] Many MSS. (some of them ancient) and most of the Versions read λέγει αὐτῷ, which is preferred by Bengel, and edited by Griesbach, Vater, Fritz., and Scholz. But there is no sufficient reason for the alteration.

— τί σοι ὄνομα.] Spirits, both good and evil, are always represented in Scripture, as having names: assumed, as Commentators think, in accommodation to human infirmity. Be that as it may, our Lord did not ask the name through ignorance, but (as Euthym. suggests) to thereby elicit an answer; that the bystanders might have the more occasion to admire the stupendous power by which the miracle was wrought.

— Λεγεῶν.] This word (from the name of a well-known Roman body of troops) was often used by the Jews to denote a great number. That the term has that sense here (and not that of Chief of the Legion) is plain from the words following, and those of vv. 10, 12.

— ὅτι πολλοὶ ἐσμεν.] In the passage of Luke it is, ὅτι δαιμόνια πολλὰ εἰσῆλθεν εἰς αὐτόν. The full sense here is, 'for we (who have entered into him) are many in number.'

10. πολλὰ] for πολλοί, very much. Αὐτοῖς, i. e. himself and his fellows, who called themselves by the name Legion.

11. πρὸς τῷ ὄρει.] This reading, for πρὸς τὰ ὄρη, is found in the greater part of the MSS., namely the whole of the Versions, is confirmed by Luke viii. 32, and is adopted by Wetstein, Bengel, Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, Tittman, Fritz., and Scholz. Render, 'juxta montem,' meaning the Acropolis. See Note on Matt. viii. 28, and especially the passage of Eusebius there cited. The swine, it should seem, were grazing at the foot of the mountain, and probably not more than a mile from the shore of the Lake.

12. The πάντες here is not found in many MSS., and all the best Versions; and is cancelled by Griesbach, Vater, Tittman, Fritz., and Scholz.

13. καὶ ἐπνίγοντο] lit. 'were suffocated,' i. e. by drowning, or 'were drowned,' as in a passage of Plutarch cited by Wetstein. So our δρουσι comes from the Saxon Druncian, to choke. Those who adopt the hypothesis which supposes the demoniacs to have been lunatics, are here involved in inextricable difficulties; for the words of Mark (as Fritz. truly observes) 'can be no otherwise understood than as asserting that the demons ejected from the man really entered into the bodies of such of the swine as they chose.'

14. οἱ δὲ βόσκοντες.] The participle has here the force of a substantive, as Matt. viii. 28. Luke viii. 34. vii. 14. 'Ἀπήγγειλαν (for the Vulg. ἀνήγγ.) is found in several MSS., and is edited by Griesbach, Vater, Fritz., and Scholz. I long hesitated to receive this reading; because, though strict propriety requires ἀπήγγ., not ἀνήγγ., yet in such a writer as Mark, that is not decisive; and there are in the New Test. a few instances of ἀναγγ. for ἀπαγγ., a signification which is noticed by Hesych. Yet I know none followed, as here, by eis with an Accusative of thing for person; in which case ἀπαγγ. (which is a stronger term) seems requisite.

By τοὺς ἀγρούς is meant the country around Gadara.

— ἐξῆλθον] scil. ἀνθρώποι. Ἰδεῖν τί ἐστὶ τὸ γεγονός. This may be regarded as a popular mode of expression, meaning to examine into the reality of any reported occurrence. So Paleph. p. 32 (cited by Wetstein) ἰθαύμαζον τί ἂν εἴη τὸ γεγονός.

15. θεωροῦσι τὸν—λεγεῶνα.] There is no reason to adopt any of the changes here found in MSS., and supported by Critics; not even the cancelling of καὶ before ἰματισμένων, for it tends to strengthen the sense. And although there may seem an unnecessary addition in τὸν ἐσχηκότα τὸν λεγεῶνα after τὸν δαιμονιζόμενον, yet the latter is far more significant; and there is a sort of climax. Render, 'They see the demoniac seated; both clothed and in his right mind; him [I say] who had been possessed by the demons who called themselves Legion.' The being seated is mentioned, as a proof of sanity of mind, since maniacs rarely sit, see Note on Acts iv. 14. Ἐφοβήθησαν is by most Commentators understood of fear lest they might suffer a yet greater calamity; but it rather denotes awe at the stupendous miracle.

17. καὶ ἤρξαντο παρακ.] Render, 'whereupon they fell to beseeching him,' &c. This sense of καί, like that of the Heb. ו, is frequent in Scripture, and sometimes occurs in the Classical writers. Τῶν ὁρίων α., 'their district.' See Note on Matt. viii. 28. [Comp. Acts xvi. 39.]

18. ἵνα ᾗ μετ' αὐτοῦ·] might accompany him.' Many Commentators suppose this was from fear lest the demons should again enter into him. But a better motive may fairly be ascribed.

19. οὐκ ἀφῆκεν αὐτόν.] The reasons which influenced our Lord's refusal have been variously conjectured; any, or indeed all of which combined, may have had effect. Τοὺς σους suppl. οικείους, to be taken from οἶκον.

— πεποίηκε.] This reading (instead of the Vulg. ἐποίησε) is found in the greater part of the MSS., some Fathers, and the Edit. Princ.; and is, with reason, adopted by Bengel, Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, Fritz., and Scholz. Propriety, indeed, as well as MS. authority, would seem to require the preterite; for (as Fritz. observes) 'in the dispossessed person, the effect of the things which the Lord had done remained; but the compassion (denoted by ἡλέησέν σε) was a matter which would be transient.' Yet ἐποίησε occurs in the parallel place of Luke, from which it was probably introduced here. In καὶ ἡλέησέν σε there is a variation of construction.

22. εἰς τῶν ἀρχισ.] Ἀρχισυναγωγοί properly signifies a president of a synagogue. But there was but one synagogue at Capernaum; and from the expression εἰς τῶν ἀρχισυν., taken in conjunction with Acts xiii. 15, and what we learn from the Rabbinical writers, we may infer that in a synagogue there was not only one who was properly President, but others, consisting of the more respectable members, who also bore the title; either as having exercised the office of President, or because they occasionally discharged its duties; which were to preserve decorum and the proper forms of worship, and to select and invite those who should read or speak in the congregation.

23. ἐσχάτως ἔχει] 'in ultimis est,' 'is at the last stage of the disease.' The phrase ἐσχάτως ἔχειν, which occurs only in the later Greek writers, as Diod. Sic., and Polyb., is equivalent to the more classical ἐσχάτως εἶναι, or δεικνύσθαι. Compare πονηρῶς ἔχειν, Xen. Cyr. vi. 5, and θανάσιμῶς ἔχειν, Attian Epict. iii. 26.

— ἵνα ἐλθὼν ἐπιθῇς, &c.] There is here a difficulty of construction, which some attempt to remove by supposing an hyperbaton. But others regard the expression as a circumlocution, for the Imperative; ἵνα with a Subjunctive being put for the Imperative, as in Ephes. v. 23. Thus the sense is, 'Come, and lay thy hands upon her.' Yet some verb must be supplied at ἵνα; either δίδωμαι, or rather παρακαλέω, in the sense of δίδωμαι.

25. οὖσα ἐν ρύσει αἵματος.] This construction is thought by some a Hebraism, by others a Latinism; but it is common to both Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. Thus the Greeks say εἷμα ἐν νόσῳ (Soph. Aj. 273), and the Romans in morbo esse.

26. πολλὰ παθοῦσα.] The expression is a strong one (like the 'diu à medicis curatus' of

- τὰ παρ' αὐτῆς πάντα, καὶ μηδὲν ὠφεληθεῖσα, ἀλλὰ μᾶλλον MT. LU. 9. 8.

Celsus); yet when we consider the ignorance of Jewish physicians, and the various nostrums prescribed in such a case (on which see Lightfoot), many of which would be nauseous and strong, and all of them injurious to a habit of body so languid as in this disease, we may conceive that her sufferings would be great. At πολλῶν the Commentators compare the saying of Menander, πολλῶν ἰατρῶν ἐσθόδε μ' ἀπώλεσα.

— αὐτῆς.] This (for vulg. αὐτῆς), is read in most of the best MSS. and Theophyl., and rightly edited by Matthæi, Griesbach, Fritz., and Scholz: The phrase may (as Fritz. suggests), be best explained, by regarding it as one of those in which the παρὰ with a Genit. does not in sense differ from a simple Genitive. This, however, seems like avoiding the difficulty. It is better to suppose the Genitive here used, where strict propriety would require the Dative or Accus., 'apud sese.'

— εἰς τὸ χεῖρον ἐλθοῦσα.] Literally, 'having come into a worse condition.' This use of εἰς or εἰς with adjectives of the Comparative degree, importing 'for the better,' or 'for the worse,' is frequent in the best writers.

On the construction in ver. 25—27 (which is somewhat anomalous), Fritz. remarks, that the Participles ἀκούσασα and ἐλθοῦσα have nothing to do with the preceding ones οὖσα and ἐλθοῦσα, but are put ἀσυνδέτως. The difficulty, may, however, he thinks, be removed by considering the words οὖσα ἐν ῥύσσει—εἰς τὸ χεῖρον ἐλθοῦσα as quasi-parentheticals, and showing the nature of the disease. Thus καὶ γυνὴ τις will connect with ἀκούσασα περὶ τοῦ Ἰ., ἐλθοῦσα for ἡλθε καὶ, &c. This, however, is so like re-writing the sentence, that it is perhaps better to consider the whole as one of the many examples of anacoluton, which occur in the New Test.

28. Διὰ γὰρ.] Several MSS. and some Latin Versions add ἐν αὐτῷ, which Fritz. thinks so indispensable to the sense, that he receives the words into the text; utterly disallowing the examples which have been adduced of a similar brevity of expression in λέγειν and the Heb. על. But, whatever propriety may dictate, and the usage of the best writers confirm; certain it is, that in the popular and familiar phraseology of most languages, the idiom is found; though it rarely, if ever, occurs, except when, from the circumstances of the case, no mistake can arise from the omission in question.

29. Ἐξηράνθη ἡ πηγὴ τ. α.] Campbell translates 'the source of her distemper.' But this is neither a correct version, nor a good explanation. Πηγὴ must be taken in a physical sense, and ἡ πηγὴ τοῦ αἵματος αὐτῆς must be closely kept together, in which πηγὴ τοῦ αἵμ. is for ῥύσσει τοῦ αἵμ. found in Luke (answering to the Heb. פְּרִי הַיָּד in Levit. xii. 7, and xx. 18), a bloody flux.

— τῷ σώματι.] 'by her body,' i. e., as Euthym. explains, διὰ τοῦ σώματος μηκέτι ῥαίνοντος τοὺς σταλαγμοὺς; for it is plain (as Fritz. observes) that the woman had been then suffering under the disorder in its greatest violence. "Ὅτι ἴσται 'she had been healed;' for it is the preterite, not the present (ἴσται); implying the completeness as well as suddenness of the cure, and showing, as Grotius says, the stupendousness of the miracle. Ἐγνώ is a very significant term, and denotes full conviction from actual experience.

30. ἐπιγνούς—ἐξελθοῦσαν.] These words are thought to involve some obscurity. One thing, however, is plain,—namely, that from hence, and from Luke vi. 19, it appears that the power of performing miracles was not, with our Saviour—as in the case of the Prophets and Apostles—adventitious (in consequence of which they ascribed their miracles to God), but inherent in him by his Divine nature. This, however, is but an inference from the words; in discussing the sense of which, even the best Commentators have not a little perplexed themselves and their readers. It is needless to advert to the unhallowed speculations of those who refer to animal magnetism: nor can those be commended who ascribe the cure to an effluvia, or emanation. It is best to suppose the words not meant to be taken in a physical sense;—or to teach us the mode whereby the miracle was performed: but rather to be considered as a popular mode of expression (like διὰ τῶν χειρῶν, often used of the working of miracles); and, therefore, not to be rigorously interpreted, or bound down to philosophical precision; and only importing, that Christ was fully aware that a miracle had been worked by his power and efficacy. The sentence is, however, obscure, from ellipsis and transposition; and the construction is, ἐπιγνούς ἐν αὐτῷ τὴν δύναμιν ἐξελθοῦσαν ἐξ αὐτοῦ; where at τὴν δύν. must be supplied ἐν αὐτῷ οὖσαν from ἐξ αὐτοῦ ἐξελθ., 'knowing that the power of working miracles, which was inherent in him, had gone out of him,' as it were by the performance of a miracle through him. This force of δύναμιν is indicated by the Article, from inattention to which many of the best Commentators take τὴν δύναμιν to simply signify 'a miracle;' which obliges them to interpret ἐξελθ. in the far-fetched sense, 'rim excrevisse.' [Comp. Luke vi. 19.]

 εἶπε δοθῆναι αὐτῇ φαγεῖν.

32. περιεβλέπετο] for περιέβλεπε, by a use peculiar to the New Test.

33. εἰδυῖα δ γέγονεν ἐπ' αὐτῇ.] Render, 'knowing what had happened to her, or been done to (so the Pesch. Syr. Version), not in her,' as it is rendered in almost all our English Versions, probably from the rendering of Tyndal, 'within her;' and that from a misunderstanding of the Vulg. 'in se,' which means 'unto her.' The sense in or within would require ἐν αὐτῇ, which is indeed found in one, and only one, MS. of inferior note; but evidently by a mistake of ν for π.

— πᾶσαν τὴν ἀλ.] The full sense is, 'the whole truth [respecting the affair in question].' In this absolute use of the phrase (with which Fritz. compares Demosthenes, πάντα γὰρ εἰρήσεται ἀλήθῃ πρὸς ὑμᾶς), there is an ellipse of τοῦ ἔργου, or the like.

34. ὕπαγε εἰς εἰρήνην.] This and the kindred phrases πορεύεσθαι, and βαδίζειν εἰς εἰρήνην were founded on the Heb. עָלָה שָׁלוֹם and were forms of affectionate or condescending valediction, often found in the Old T. (see 1 Sam. i. 17. xx. 42), and meaning, 'i secundo omine,' 'Go in God's name.' But as used by our Lord, they have a far higher sense; inasmuch as they imply a granting of the boon entreated, and, accordingly, are equivalent to βαδίζε ὑγιαίνων at Exod. iv. 18.

35. ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀρχισ.] literally, 'from the Ruler's house,' for he was now with Jesus. So John xviii. 28, ἀγούσιν οὖν τὸν Ἰησοῦν εἰς τοῦ Καϊάφα. The idiom is also found in Latin, and indeed in modern languages.

38. κλαίοντας καὶ ἀλ.] scil. τοὺς ἀνθρώπους. These words are in apposition with and explanatory of θορυβόν. Ἀλαλάζειν, from ἐλελε, seems to be akin to the Heb. הָלַל, from whence came ἐλελεῖν, and our halloo. Both denoted the shout uttered by the soldiers of all the ancient nations, previous to battle. Ἀλαλάζειν, however, was sometimes used of any shrill vociferation, especially of grief, as here and in Jerem. xiv. 34, 47, and Eurip. Elect. 843, ἡσπαιρεν, ἠέλελε.

39. [Comp. John xi. 11.]

40. ἐκβαλὼν πάντας.] This merely means, 'having ordered all to be removed.' Jesus retained just so many as were sufficient to prove the reality of the cure. To have permitted the presence of more might have savoured of ostentation. Πάντας for πάντας, is found in very many MSS., and the Edit. Princ., and is adopted by Bengel, Wetstein, Mill, Griesbach, Tischendorf, Vater, Fritz., and Scholz. The only difference is, that πάντας signifies omnes, πάντας, omnes. [Comp. Acts ix. 40.]

43. ἵνα μηδεὶς γινῇ τούτου.] A popular form of expression, importing, 'that nothing of this should be made known.' The order, however, could not be meant to enjoin perpetual secrecy, but present suppression; in order to avoid drawing together a concourse, and raising a tumult. Εἰς is for διότι. The order (remarks Grot.) was given that it might be apparent that the maid was not only restored to life, but to health.

VI. 1. πατρίδα αὐτοῦ] 'the place where he was brought up,' namely, Nazareth.

2 καὶ γενομένου σαββάτου, i. e. it being the Sabbath day, 'on the Sabbath day'; γὰρ. for ὅτι. Ἀκούοντες, 'on hearing him.' Fritz. renders it audientes. But that would require the Article. Ἐξεπλήσσοντο, scil. ἐπὶ τῇ διδασκῇ αὐτοῦ, which is added at i. 22. and Matt. xxii. 33. Πόθεν τούτω ταῦτα; sub. ἐκεῖ, in the sense constitutum. A fuller account of this transaction is given by Luke iv. 16. seqq. Τίς, γινώσκων. The οὐκ just after is omitted in the greater part of the MSS. (or ὅτι put in its place), and is cancelled by Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, and Scholz; but retained and ably defended by Fritz., who remarks, 'that all the various readings are only so many corrections of librarii, who did not comprehend the argumentation from miracles to prove divine wisdom; which is well stated by Grotius.' The sense is, 'Whence have these talents fallen to the lot of this man; and what is this wisdom given him from above; inasmuch that (not only he teaches us the way of salvation, but) even such miracles (as we have heard related) are performed by him?' Διὰ τῶν χειρῶν, by Holism (like τῶν) for δὲ αὐτοῦ.

3. ἀδελφαί. Some MSS. have δ τοῦ τέκτωνος αὐτοῦ. But this is rejected by almost all the Editors, who are, with reason, agreed that it was introduced from the passage of Matthew, and sprung from those who wished to consult the dignity of our Lord. That our Lord, however, was a carpenter, is testified by nearly all the MSS., confirmed by general tradition, and the authority of the Fathers (Origen excepted); of whom Justin Martyr says that Christ ἀργυροῦτο ἔργον καὶ ἔργον. That our Lord should have been taught some handicraft occupation, the Jewish law required, and the poverty of Joseph would render necessary. And what was so likely as that he should be brought up to his father's trade; which, though lowly, was not degrading? [Comp. John vi. 42. — ὧδε πρὸς ἡμᾶς] 'hic apud nos.'

4. [Comp. John iv. 44.]

5. καὶ οὐκ ἠδύνατο—ποιῆσαι.] These words, in their common acceptation, present a seeming difficulty, to avoid which, some Expositors (as Wolf and Kuinoel) suppose a pleonasm, taking οὐκ ἠδύνατο ποιῆσαι for οὐκ ἵκοντο. But (as Fritz. has shown) this pleonasm is fictitious. Others take οὐκ ἠδύνατο for voluit. This, however, as Fritz. shows, is even more destitute of foundation than the former sense. The true interpretation seems to be that of many ancient Commentators (as Chrysostom, Euthymius, and Theophylact), and of the moderns, Grot., Whitby, Le Clerc, Bentley, and Fritz.; the sense being, 'Our Saviour could not, not because he wanted power; but that the subjects of it were unbelieving, and therefore wanted the condition on which alone it was fit he should heal them. He could not, consistently with the rules on which he invariably acted in performing miracles,—namely, to require faith in his Divine mission of those who sought them, perform them. So infra ix. 23. εἰ δύνασαι πιστεύσαι—πάντα δυνατόν τῷ πιστεύοντι. It is, indeed, conformable to the Hebrew manner of speaking (see Gen. xix. 22.) to say, that that cannot be which shall not, or ought not to be; of which idiom abundance of examples have been adduced from both the Greek and Latin Classical writers.

6. θαύμαζε.] Schleusner, Kuinoel, and others take the word rather of indignation than wonder; a signification, indeed, not unfrequent in the Classical writers, but perhaps not to be found in the New Test. Far simpler and more satisfactory is the common interpretation, 'he wondered at their want of faith' and perverseness, in rejecting his claims on such unreasonable grounds. This construction of θαύμαζω with διὰ and an Accusative is very rare (the usual one being θαύμαζον, ἐπὶ τινι, or παρὶ τινος), but found in John vii. 21. and Isocr. ὥστε καὶ τοὺς αἰδόμενους—θαύμαζον διὰ τὴν καρτερίαν ταύτην.  1 7 Καὶ ἤκουσεν ὁ βασιλεὺς Ἡρώδης—φανερὸν γὰρ ἐγέ- 14

Κύκλω must be joined with περιῆγε, not κύμας. The word is by the Classical writers often subjoined to verbs compounded with περί.

7. δύο δύο 'by twos.' An idiom called Hebrew. It is, however, not confined to the Heb., but found in the Classical writers. So in Æsch. Pers. 915. we have μυρία μυρία for κατὰ μυριάδας. [Comp. Luke vi. 13.]

9. ἐνδύσασθαι. 'Ἐνδύσασθε' is found in some of the best MSS., and in the Syr., Vulg., Goth., and Coptic Versions, as also in the Edit. Princ. and Steph. 1, 2; and it has been edited by Mill, Bengel, Matthæi, Griesbach, and all other Editors down to Scholz, except Fritz., who has recalled the Vulg. ἐνδύσασθαι; and, I think, rightly. He shows that ἐνδύσασθε would involve an extreme harshness. In ἐνδύσασθαι there is either an anacoluthon, or a variation, by means of two constructions. Thus, after ἀλλ' from the words ἵνα μηδὲν αἰρ. εἰς ὁδόν, we must supply λέγειν, or βαδίζειν.

11. ἐκτινάξατε τὸν χοῦν, &c.] Besides the parallel passage, comp. Luke x. 10, 11. Acts xiii. 51. The words Ἀμὴν λέγω—ἐκείνη are not found in some ancient MSS., and the Italic, Vulgate, Arabic, Coptic, Persian, and Armenian Versions. They were rejected, as not genuine, by Erasmus, Beza, Zeg., and Mill, were bracketed by Griesbach, Knapp, Tittman, and Vater, and cancelled by Lachm. But, as Matthæi and Fritz. show, without reason. Certainly the authority of about seven MSS. (abounding with all sorts of daring alterations) and some second-rate Versions, generally treading in each other's steps, and coinciding with those altered MSS., cannot be considered as sufficient authority for the cancelling of any clause, even when internal evidence may be unfavourable to it. Which is not the case here; for good reasons may be given why it should have been omitted. As to the Versions, the clause being found in the three Syriac Versions far more than overbalances the whole authority of Versions against it. [Comp. Luke x. 10—12. Acts xiii. 51. xviii. 6.]

13. ἤλειφον ἐλαίῳ.] It appears from various passages of the Medical and Rabbinical writers cited by Wetstein and Lightfoot, that oil (which in the Eastern and Southern countries is of a peculiarly mild quality) was used by the ancients, both Jews and Gentiles, as a medical application. And that it was so employed by the Apostles, is the opinion of almost all the recent Commentators. But surely this circumstance, that the Apostles had successfully made use of a well-known medicine, would ill comport with the gravity and dignity of the preceding context; which, I think, compels us to suppose (with all the ancient and early modern Commentators) that the healing was so much miraculous as the casting out of the demons: as to the anointing, it was only employed as a symbolical action, typical of the oil of gladness and grace to be imparted by Divine assistance. For the first Christians, being accustomed to represent, in visible signs, the allegorical allusions in Scripture, used oil not only (as the Jews had done) as a remedy, which had from high antiquity become sacred; but also (from that sacredness) as a religious rite at baptism, confirmation, and prayers for the sick. Thus the anointing may be regarded as one of those significant actions by which both the Prophets of the O. T. and the Apostles (after their Lord's example) out of indulgence to human weakness, accompanied their supernatural and miraculous cures. See James v. 14. In all which cases, the methods adopted in those actions (which were various) contributed nothing to the cure; that being effected by means of which we can form no conception.

14. ἤκουσεν ὁ βασιλεὺς.] There is here, seemingly, a want of the Subject to the verb. With this the early Critics (as the various readings show) have indeed furnished us, supplying τὸν δαυὶ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, which Beza approves, and Fritz. inserts in the text. But it is surely better to retain a harshness, than to get rid of it by such means. Grotius proposes to put φανερόν γὰρ ἐγίνετο into a parenthesis. This, however, would involve a harsh transposition. The best mode is, either to take τὸ ὄνομα αὐ. twice, or to supply the subject αὐτῶν from the context, which is suggested in τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ, or τὰ γεγένηκα ἐν αὐτῷ from the subject-matter.

15. ὅτι προφήτης—προφητῶν.] There has been much discussion on the reading and the sense of these words. If the testimony of MSS. and ancient Versions can prove any thing, it is certain that the true reading is ὅτι προφ. ἐστίν ὡς εἰς τῶν προφ. (for the ἡ is absent from every MS. of note, nearly all the Versions and early Editions, and is cancelled by all the chief recent Editions); by which the sense will be, 'he is a prophet resembling one of the prophets [of old times].' [Comp. Matt. xvi. 14.]

16. ἐν ἡμέρᾳ—ἐστίν.] This sort of attraction is frequent both in the Scriptural and Classical writers; but it is here adopted to give greater strength to the asseveration. The ἡμέρα also seems to be emphatical.

17. ἐν τῇ φυλακῇ.] The τῇ is omitted in several MSS., and is cancelled by Bengel, Matthæi, Osiander, Tittman, and Scholz, but retained by Fritz; and with reason: for the number of MSS. is not such as to warrant its being cancelled; and we can more easily account for its omission than its insertion. [See Luke iii. 19.]

18. ἐνείχεν αὐτῷ.] Not 'had a quarrel with,' as E. V.; but, 'bore a grudge against him.' Ἐνείχων (equivalent to ἐγκοτιῶν) signifies to harbour (literally, 'have in mind,') κότον, a grudge or resentment against any one. The complete phrase occurs in Herodot. i. 118. vi. 119. and viii. 27. the elliptical one in Luke xi. 53. Genes. xlix. 23. (answering to עָנָה) and Job xvi. 9.

20. ἠδύνατο τὸν Ἰ.] The term here denotes a mixture of awe and reverence. On the sense of συνετήρει there is much difference of opinion. L. Brug., Hammond, Le Clerc, Wetstein, Campbell, Kuinoel, Schleusner, and Wahl, take it in the sense, 'preserved him,' i. e. from the malice of Herodias; literally, 'kept him near himself,' i. e. for protection. While the Syriac, Arabic, Italic, and English Versions, adopted by Erasmus, Grotius, Whitby, Wakefield, Rosenmuller, and Fritz., explain 'observabat eum,' 'observantiâ prosecutus est,' 'magnum eum faciebat.' So Diog. Laert. φίλους συντηρεῖν. The former interpretation yields the best sense, but is weak in authority. Καὶ ἀκούσας αὐτοῦ, 'and when he had heard him,' i. e. his admonitions. Πολλὰ ἐποίει, scil. ἐντάλματα αὐτοῦ, injunctions. [Comp. Matt. xxi. 26.]

21. ἡμέρας εὐκ.] Here, again, Expositors are divided in opinion; the ancient and early moderns rendering it 'an opportune season,' namely, for working on the mind of Herod, and obtaining his order for the execution of John. But almost all since the time of Glass and Hammond take it to signify 'a festival day.' The expression, however, as Fritz. proves, can only mean 'a leisure day.' And thus it exactly answers to our term holiday. [Comp. Gen. xi. 20.]

— τοῖς μεγιστάσιν magistrates, or great men, the monarch's counsellors. A word occurring in the later writers (as Josephus and the Sept.), and formed from μέγιστος, as μῦθον from μῦος. Τοῖς πρώτοις denotes the principal persons for wealth or consequence of those in a private station. So Joseph. Ant. vii. 9, 8, οἱ τῆς χώρας πρότεροι.

23. ἔως ἡμίσεος τῆς βασι.] Many Commentators supply μῦθον. But there is perhaps no ellipse; for ἡμῖνον seems to have been as much a substantive as our half. The promise involved a sort of hyperbole, and was (as appears from the Classical citations of Wetstein) a not unusual manner of expression with Kings. [Comp. Esth. v. 3.]

25. μετὰ σπουδῆς.] Heb. ῥῆῡῡῡ. For ἐν σπουδῇ, i. e. σπουδαίως, promptly, with alacrity. Ἐξαυτῆς is for παρ' αὐτῆς, forthwith, as in Diod. Sic. xv. 43. The earlier authors generally write ἐξ αὐτῆς, scil. ἑαυτῆς. There will be no occasion for the ellipse of ἑαυτῆς, which Kuin. and others suppose, before τοὺς ὄρκους, if περίλυπος γινόμενος be rendered 'although he was very sorry.'

26. ἀθετῆσαι α.] 'to set her at nought; i. e. by refusing her request. This sense is chiefly confined to the later writers, who use the word either absolutely, or with an Accusative of person, sometimes accompanied with eis; rarely with an Accusative of thing.

27. σπεκουλάτωρα.] This term, from the Latin speculator, denotes one of the body-guards; who were so called, because their principal duty was that of sentinels: for I agree with Casaubon, Wetstein, and Fritz., that they had their name from their office speculari, and not, quasi speculatores, from speculum; because the former alludes to their chief business. They had, however, other confidential duties; and among these, that of acting, like the Turkish soldiers of the present day, as executioners.

29. τῷ μνημείῳ.] The τῷ is rejected by all the Editors from Matthæi to Scholz; and with reason: for it is liable to objection on the score of propriety, and is found in scarcely any MS. except Cod. D., being introduced, perhaps inadvertently, by Stephens, in his 3d Edition.

31. ὑμεῖς αὐτοί.] This must be rendered not 'vos ipse,' or 'vos quousque,' with most Commentators, but (with Erasmus, Schleusner, Kuinoel, and Fritz.) 'vos soli,' on which use of αὐτοί see Robinson's Lex. On ἠυκαίρουν comp. ἠυκαίρουν iii. 20.

32. [Comp. John vi. 16.]

33. καὶ εἶδον—πρὸς αὐτόν.] Editors and Commentators are alike agreed that this passage has suffered grievously from transcribers; and the unusual diversity of readings, has here (as in many other cases) led Critics too readily to interpolation for granted; and, in order to kill the plethora, pruning has been unscrupulously played by the recent Editors. Griesbach thus: καὶ εἶδον αὐτοὺς ὑπάρχοντας καὶ ἔγνωσαν πολλοί· καὶ περὶ αὐτοῦ πολλοὶ συνειδράμοντες. But for this, and of the other alterations that have been there is little authority. Indeed, there are no grounds for alteration, except for the omission of ὄχλοι, which is scarcely found in any MS., and has no place in the early Edd., or Erasmus, 4, 5, from which it was introduced Steph. 3. It has been, with reason, repe Mill and Wetstein, and cancelled by Griesbach, Vater, Tittmann, Fritz., and Thus πολλοί becomes the subject of εἶδον and ἐπέγνωσαν. To this, howe is great objection. It is frigid as reg and as concerns ἐπέγνω, inapposite; for bell remarks, 'the historian would not to say that many knew him, since, as long occupied in teaching and healing would be comparatively few who did him.' I cannot, therefore, but suspe seems not to have occurred to any of and Commentators) that πολλοί, th authorities for its omission are but not be here. Yet it does not, I quite for nothing; but, as it is scarce us to dispense with a subject, and passages of Matthew and Luke

35. ἦδη ὥρας πολλῆς γιν. Almost all Commentators take the sense to be, 'it was now late in the day.' But unless this be a Lutinium, we may better explain the phrase (with Fritz.),
 'when much of the day was now past.' [Comp.
 John vi. 5, 7.]

37. ἐπελθόντες—φαγεῖν.] The best Commentators are of opinion that this sentence contains an interrogation implying admiration, and perhaps indignation; q. d. 'What must we go and buy?' &c. There is reason to think that the sum in question was a proverbial one, as we say, a good round sum. [Comp. Numb. xi. 13, 22. 2
 Kings iv. 42, 43.]

38. λέγουσι.] John, vi. 8, ascribes this to Andrew, Simon Peter's brother; who, it seems, spoke for the rest. [Comp. John vi. 9.]

39. συμπόσια συμπόσια i. e. κατὰ συμπό-σια, in a distributive sense; an idiom common in Hebrew. See Note supra, ver. 7. Συμπόσιον signifies properly a drinking together, or a common entertainment; and then, by a metonymy common in our own language, it designates the party assembled. [Comp. John vi. 10.]

—χλωρῷ χύρτῳ.] Casaub. and Wetstein say that χλωρῷ is added because χόρτος properly signifies hay. It simply, however, means fodder; and though in the Classical writers it almost always denotes dry fodder, yet in the New Test.
 it as constantly signifies herbage of any kind, both of grass and corn.

40. Πρασιά properly signifies a plot of ground, such as in gardens are employed for the growth of vegetables. It is strange that the latest Commentators should adopt the derivation of Hesych.
 from πείρας, 'quasi πρασιαί,' when the Etym.
 Mag. and Zonaras Lex. offer so much better a one;—namely, from πρᾶσος, an old word signifying a leek or onion. Thus the term signified properly as onion-bed, and then any plot of ground of a regular form, as square or parallelogram. See my Note on Thucyd. ii. 56. Hence it denotes regular and equal companies, like squadrons of troops. In fact, our word squadron (from quadra), if taken in the primary sense (found in Milton and other of our old writers), would be no bad version. The repetition of the term without the copula denotes (as in the phrase δύο δύο) distribution. So μυρία μυρία in Æschyl. Pers. 974, Blomf. This method of distributing into companies of 50 and 100, was doubtless adopted in order that the multitude might thus know their own number.

42. καὶ ἔφαγον πάντες, καὶ ἔχορτ. Comp. John vi. 12, where it is added, ὡς δὲ ἐνεπλήσθησαν, λέγει τοῖς μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ· Συναγχατε τὰ περισσέυσαντα κλάσματα, ἵνα μὴ τι ἀπόληται.

45. [Comp. John vi. 17, and see Note on Matt. xiv. 22.]

46. ἀποταξάμενος αὐτοῖς [‘having dismissed them;’ lit., ‘bid them (i. e. the multitude) farewell.’ The phrase ἀποταξέσθαι τινα, in this sense, is not Attic Greek, but that of the later writers. It comes to have this sense from its primary use as a deponent, ‘to range off or apart,’ and, in a Middle sense, ‘to separate oneself from, bid farewell to.’

47, 48. [Comp. John vi. 16, 17.]

— ἐν τῷ ἐλαύνειν.] There is here an ellipse of κάπην or ναῦν, which is sometimes supplied; as in Hom. Od. xv. 502. Βασανίζουσιν, laborantes, distressed. [Comp. John vi. 18, 19.]

— ἤθελε παρελθεῖν αὐτούς.] Much trouble might have been spared to Expositors by considering the phrase as a popular one, for ‘he would (i. e. he was about to) have passed them;’ i. e. ‘he made as though he would have passed by them.’ So of Jesus it is said, Luke xxiv. 28. Καὶ αὐτὸς προσεποιεῖτο πορεύεσθαι.

52. οὐ γὰρ συνῆκαν ἐπὶ τοῖς ἄρτοις.] By ἄρτοις is meant, as Krebs observes, τῷ ἑαυτοῖς τοῖς ἄρτοις γενομένῳ. That Commentators, however, and Kuinoel, seem wrong in ascribing to ἐπὶ the sense post. It is rather per, by, denoting the efficient cause; as in Matt. iv. 4. [Comp. infra viii. 17.]

53. προσωρμίσθησαν] scil. ἐκτὶ. Προσωρμίσθαι signifies ‘to bring a ship πρὸς ὄρεον, to a port;’ or, as here, to a place fit for drawing to ashore.

54. ἐπιγνόντες αὐτόν.] In some MSS. οἱ Versions is added οἱ ἄνδρες τοῦ τόπου ἐκείνου words, no doubt, derived from Matt. xiv. 12. It may seem harsh that the subject of the verb should be suppressed; to soften which, ἦλθον would take the words ἐπιγνόντες—ἀφ’ ὧν put impersonally. But it will be more satisfactory to suppose an ellipsis of the subject; namely, the common one, corresponding to the man of the Germans and our men, which will here denote the inhabitants of that country. This obscurity is perhaps meant to be somewhat cleared up by the ἐκείνη following, which is equivalent to ἐκείνου τόπου.

55. For περιφέρειν some MSS. have φέρειν; others, ἐκφέρειν; and others, again, προσφέρειν, which Fritz. edits; but wrongly; for the var. lect. arose from the librarians stumbling at the use of περιφέρειν here, which has a significatio pragmatis, including the senses expressed by the above various readings; q. d. 'they carried them about (i. e. up and down) and brought them to those places where they heard he was.'

— ὅπου ἤκουον ὅτι ἐκεῖ ἐστὶ.] I would not, with Palairet and Schleus., take the ὅπου as put for quoniam; neither would I, with others (as Beza, Grotius, Wetstein, Kuinoel, and Wiener) regard the ἐκεῖ as redundant. It may be best to suppose this an abbreviation of the more complete and primitive mode of expression, which would have been, 'carried them to the place of which they had heard it said, he is there.' Thus the ἐκεῖ will be least of all pleonastic. [Comp. 1 Kings xviii. 10.]

56. ὅπου ἂν εἰσῶν., &c.] On this use of ἂν with the Indicative, where Classical usage would require the Optative, see Robinson's Lex. on ἂν II. 1.

— παρεκάλουν αὐτόν.] It is not clear whether this is to be understood of those who laid the sick persons down, or of the sick persons themselves. The former method is more suited to the construction; but the latter is more agreeable to probability.

— ὅσα ἂν ἤπν.] The ἂν is not without force, denoting the uncertainty of the number. Render, 'as many as might have touched.'

VII. 2. κοιναῖς.] It was quite in the Jewish idea to oppose common to holy, the most usual signification of the latter word in the Old Testament being 'separated from common, and devoted to sacred use.' Compb. Κοινὸς here (as often in Josephus) signifies what is ritually impure; thus, as regarded the hands, it denoted that they were not washed ritually, i. e. just before the meal; though they might otherwise be clean.

— ἐμέμψαντο.] This word is omitted in several MSS. and some Versions, is rejected by Mill and Bengel, and is cancelled by Griesbach, Tittman, and Scholz, but retained and defended by Fritz. strenuously, but not, it should seem, successfully. No tolerable reason has ever been given why, supposing it to have been originally in the text, it should have been thrown out. On the other hand, it is easy to see how it should have been added, namely, by those who were not aware of the true construction of the whole passage, and did not see that vv. 3 and 4 are parenthetical.

3. πάντες i. e. all those who observed the traditions; for the Sadducees and a few others (comparatively a small part of the nation) rejected this custom.

— πυγμῇ.] There are few expressions on which the Commentators are more divided in opinion than this. The early Versions show that the ancients were as much perplexed with it as the moderns. The Vulg. and some others give the sense sæpe; whence it has been supposed, that they read πυκνῇ, which might be taken for πυκνῶς, and that for πυκνῶς. But (as Fritz. observes) there is no proof of the existence of any such adverb as πυκνῇ; and the sense sæpe would be inapposite. To advert to the interpretations of those who retain the common reading; several Commentators, ancient and modern, take πυγμῇ to mean 'up to the elbow.' But even though πυγμῇ should be proved to have the signification elbow; yet such a one as 'up to,' inherent in the Dative, cannot be tolerated. For the same reason, the interpretation of Lightfoot, Hammond, Schoetzg., and Heupel. 'up to the wrist,' must be rejected. Others, as Wetstein, Pearce, Campbell, and Rosenm. endeavour to remove the difficulty by taking πυγμῇ to mean 'a handful of water,' such as the contracted palm will contain; or rather a quartarius, the smallest measure allowed for washing the hands. And this mode of interpretation Campbell supports, very ingeniously, but not convincingly; for that sense would require πυγμῇ ὕδατος. In short, πυγμῇ can only mean the doubled or closed fist, in which sense the word is here taken by Scalig., Beza, Grotius, and Fritz.; who, however, are not agreed as to the manner of the action. The most probable view is that of Beza and Fritz., who render 'unless they have first washed their hands, rubbing them with the fist;' which explanation is confirmed by the customs of the Jews, as preserved in the Rabbinical writers, and even yet in use.

4. ἀπὸ ἀγορᾶς.] Sub. ἰδόντες, or γενομένοι; of which ellipse the Commentators adduce many examples, as also of the complete phrase.

— ἐὰν μὴ βαπτῇ.] This is best explained by Grotius and Fritz., 'unless they wash themselves,' i. e. their bodies (namely in opposition to the washing of the hands before mentioned); because after coming from a place of such public resort, and where people in a crowd must touch one another, they might unintentionally have touched some impure person or thing, and hence might require a more exact ablution than merely washing the hands. Here, however, we are not to suppose immersion implied (that being never used except when some actual, and not possible pollution had been incurred); but merely ordinary washing; or perhaps, on occasions of urgent haste, sprinkling. Hence the gloss (for it is no more) of some MSS., βαπτίσωνται.

— ἃ παρέλαβον κρατεῖν.] The full sense is, 'which they had received [from their ancestors], that they may firmly keep them.' Ξιστῶν, from ξίστην, a liquid measure, holding a pint and a half. The word is frequent in the later writers, and is from the Latin Sextus. Χαλκίῳ, copper or brazen vessels. Earthen vessels are not mentioned, because those, if supposed to be polluted, were at once broken. See Levit. xv. 12.

6. See Ia. xxix. 13.

7. [Comp. Coloss. ii. 18. seqq. Tit. i. 14.]

9. καλῶς ἀθετεῖτε.] The best Commentators are agreed that this is to be taken as an ironical reproof. Thus the καλῶς corresponds to our finely; a use frequent in the Classical writers. Some Expositors, who are averse to imputing irony to our Lord, devise other modes of interpretation; all of them, however, either open to strong objections, or closely bordering on irony. However, it should be remembered that (to use the words of Mr. Greswell), 'irony, when in the mouth of superior virtue and wisdom,—when levelled against the opposite vice or folly, is dignified, though keen, rebuks; and instances of irony so employed by our Saviour himself, the account of his discourses in the Gospels (especially when speaking of his enemies, the Scribes and Pharisees,) would supply in abundance.'

11. ἐὰν εἴπῃ—ὠφελῇθῃς.] Something seems wanting in this sentence; to supply which, Pica, Beza, and Casaubon understand inasmuch as, while Kreb, Kuinoel, and Fritz. here suppose that idiom of the Greek, by which in a sentence some verb of a contrary signification is left to be repeated from the preceding sentence; which would here be μὴ ῥατὰ τελευτάτω; q. d. 'he shall not suffer the punishment denounced.' This method, however, has something in it too artificial to suit the simple style of the New Test. We may rather, I think, suppose something left to be supplied per oppositum; not, however, inasmuch as, but inasmuch as, it is enough.

12. καὶ οὐκ ἐτί ἀφίετε, &c.] Here καὶ has the same force as in the parallel passage of Mark xv. 6. Render: 'Nay, ye permit him not any longer to, &c.; namely, out of the money so consecrated; because the devotion of it was made with an imprecation against the devotee, if he employed the money to any other purpose.'

13. ἢ παρδ.] This is not, as some think, placuit, but signifies 'quæ propagare soletis,' as Fritz renders. The ἢ is, by attraction, for ἢν.
15. ἀκούετε μου πάντες καὶ συν.] [Comp. Prov. viii. 5. Acts x. 15. Rom. xiv. 17, 20. Tit. i. 15. 1 Tim. iv. 3.]

19. καθαρίζον πάντα τὰ β.] In this passage there is much variety of reading and diversity of interpretation. The varr. lectt., however, are, as Fritz has shown, of such a nature as to afford no reason to call in question the common reading; they being either slips of the pen, or glosses. And the conjectures of Critics are entitled to no attention; unless it can be shown that the common reading is incapable of any tolerable explanation, which is not the case. For although most of the many modes of interpretation adopted are quite inadmissible, and some even border on absurdity, yet a tolerably good sense may be extracted from the words. Such, I conceive, is that which I, with some hesitation, propounded in Roman Synop., where καθαρίζον is taken as a denominative absolute, and rendered 'purifying by removal.' This I find confirmed by the authority of Fritz, who, after a minute discussion of the same, adopts that view. Of course, the Participle with ὃ and χρόμα understood, must be considered as standing for ὃ and a verb in the Indicative, i. e. ὃ καθαρίζει; q. d. 'which circumcises' (namely, that the meats are cast into the john) makes them all alike pure.' This use of the Participle (which often takes place in παρδν, συνίετε, δέξασθαι, &c.), I have more than once illustrated in Thucydides.

21. ἔσωθεν γάρ, &c.] This passage, as it involves not a few difficulties, has therefore been variously interpreted. In order to determine its complete sense, it is proper first to ascertain its scope. Now that undoubtedly is, to illustrate the teaching principle,—that vice and corruption spring from within a man. This truth is exemplified by adverting first to the principal vices of our corrupt nature, and then to the evil dispositions and habits which lead to their commission. καὶ πλεονεξίας and δόλος seem to denote those lesser degrees of theft which consist in rascality and artful overreaching in a bargain. (See Thucyd. iii. 45, 6, 82, 2.) So Xenophon, Cyr. 6, 82. enumerates κακουργίας καὶ ἀπάται, καὶ δολῶσεις, καὶ πλεονεξίας. Πονηρίας is by the early Commentators interpreted vice or wickedness, and by the later ones malignity or malevolence; of which senses the latter is preferable; at least, if we here suppose another class of vices intended. From the parallel passage, however, of Matthew, it should rather seem that πονηρίας and δολ. are meant to denote two species of the genus rapacity; of which the former may be supposed to mean much the same as our terms swindling, rogueery. And so it is used at Luke xi. 39. This view of the two expressions δολος and πον. is strongly confirmed by a passage of Jerem. ix. 1—6.

To these evil actions and habits are then subjoined the cognate evil dispositions—δολιγεία and ὀφθαλμοὶ πονηροί; of which the former expression denotes that spirit of craving for any object of sensual gratification, or whatever will procure it, which never knows when it has had enough. The latter (the ὀφθαλμοὶ πονηροί) denotes that grudging spirit which (as says Bp. Taylor) is a repining at the good of others, a grieving because he grieves not; and therefore nearly the same with φθόνος. See Prov. xxiii. 6. xxviii. 22. From its situation in the sentence it is plain that δολιγεία cannot be taken in the usual sense invidia or insolentia, injuria, as Kuin. explains. Indeed, as it seems primarily to mean excessive (thus Elian. ap. Suid. in δολιγεία says of a wind: πολλὸν καὶ δολιγὴν ῥίπτεται ἱκεῖσθαι), so it is well adapted to denote, as Bp. Taylor explains it, 'all manner of excess or immoderateness, in the use even of permitted pleasures.'

Of the last three terms, βλασφ. (as appears from the parallel passage), means, not blasphemy, but calumny. In determining the force of the two other terms, it is proper to consider their scope, which, I conceive, is to designate the evil dispositions which engender calumny. And as Solomon says (Prov. xiii. 10.) 'only by pride cometh contention,' so it may be said, 'only by pride and vanity come evil speaking and slanderous words.' So again we read in Prov. viii. 13. of 'pride and arrogance, and the tongue of perversity,' meaning slander. Thus at Prov. xvii. 20. it is said: 'the perverse in his tongue,' (ὁ πῶλῃ ᾤστῳ) i. e. 'he who perverts the truth shall fall into evil.' Ὑπερηφανία is defined by Theophrastus Ch. κδ. Ast. p. 29. καταφρόνησις τις πλὴν αὐτοῦ τῶν ἄλλων. The remaining term ἀφροσύνη is capable of several senses, and has been variously interpreted. As it seems to be closely connected with the preceding term ὑπερηφανία, it may denote (as Fritz. explains) 'that thoughtless levity and rashness which produce evil-speaking more frequently than even deliberate malice.' But it should rather seem (as Mr. Greswell suggests) that there is here meant that corruption of the natural light of reason and conscience which, as being the opposite moral quality to φρόνησις (the perfection of practical wisdom), forms, as it were, the dimas of a reprobate mind.

24. τὰ μεθόρια T. καὶ Σ.] This is by most Commentators taken to mean, that tract of country which divided Palestine from Tyre and Sidon. But Fritz. thinks the meaning is, that our Lord entered into the territory of Tyre and Sidon. In fact, the district in question was a strip of anciently debateable border land, but afterwards ceded by Solomon to the King of Tyre; though it long afterwards retained its original name of the border-land.

ning up and down, or lying on the ground. Vide supra v. 13.

31. ἀνὰ μέσον τ. ὁ. Δ.] The best mode of meeting the geographical difficulty raised in Pool's Synop. is to suppose, with Glass, that μέσον here, as elsewhere, must not be pressed on, but the expression ἀνὰ μέσον τῶν ὁρίων Δ. be taken for ἐπὶ τὰ ὅρια. And there is no difficulty, if we suppose our Lord to have passed from the Galilee where he had been, across the Antilibanus, and from thence through the borders of Decapolis, Bethsaida, and through Canatha, and from thence to Mount Hermon.

32. κωφὸν μογιλάλον.] Some ancient Translators, and early modern Commentators, take μογιλάλον to denote one dumb; which they seek to establish by the use of the word in the Sept. at 1. xxx. 5. But that version is erroneous, and therefore cannot afford any proof. In vain, too, do they appeal to Matt. ix. 33, and Luke xi. 14; for there is every reason to suppose this miracle a different one from that there recorded. Besides, the words used of the man after his cure (ἐλάλει ὁφθῆς) concur with the proper signification of the term (namely, one who speaks with difficulty), to show that the person was not dumb by nature, nor, probably, deaf by nature; otherwise it would have been needless to call him dumb (for such persons always are so); but was one who had a natural impediment to enunciation, or who, having early lost his hearing, gradually lost much of his speech, and had become a stammerer. Such an impediment is either natural, arising from what is called a bow, or ulcer, by which any one is, as we say, tongue-tied (of which Wetstein adduces some examples from the Classical writers, and I have myself, in Recens. Synop., added others more apposite, from Artemid. and Philostratus), or brought on, when, from an early loss of hearing, the membrane of the tongue becomes rigid and unable to perform its office. That the former was the case of this poor sufferer, would seem to appear from the expression at ver. 35, ἐλύθη ὁ ἑσθῆς τῆς γλώσσης αὐ. But even that may be taken figuratively (as in some of the passages cited by Wetstein), and the latter view is probably the true one. This sense of μογιλάλος is adopted by the Syriac Translator, and also by Beza, Grotius, and almost all of the recent Commentators; who answer the argument of their opponents, that at verse 37 we have καὶ τοὺς ὁφθῆς λαλεῖν, by replying that this is either a general expression, and not limited to this sense; or that ὁφθῆς is used by a common hyperbole.

33. ἀπολαβόμενος—ἰδίαν] 'taking him aside and apart from the multitude,' not, away from them, or out of their sight. A use of the word found in Josephus, the writer of the book of Maccabees, Appian, and Philostratus; though almost always in the active voice; as 2 Macc. vi. 21, ἀπολαβόντες αὐτὸν κατ' ἰδίαν. Josephus, Bell. ii. 2. This was probably done for the same reason as that which influenced our Lord in the miracle recorded supra v. 40. [Comp. infra viii. 23. John ix. 6.]

—ἔβαλε—τὰ ὕδατα αὐτοῦ.] Since this, and the other action mentioned, could contribute nothing to the cure, (though we find such used on other occasions, as viii. 23, and John ix. 6.) it has been asked why our Lord used them. Such inquiries are often rash, and we are not bound in all cases to give a reason, since our Saviour's adoption of an action shows its fitness; yet here we can be at no loss. The reason was, no doubt, that assigned by Grotius and Whitby, Kuinoel and Fritz.; namely, that Christ was pleased, in condescension to human weakness, to use external actions significant of the cure to be performed; meaning thereby to strengthen the faith and confirm the hopes of the sick persons, and those who brought them; and, moreover, to show that the power he was about to exert resided in himself. Our Lord adopted these actions, and also the usual one of laying his hands on the sick, in order to show that he was not confined to any one particular mode. [Comp. John ix. 6. Infra viii. 23.]

34. καὶ ἀναβλ., &c.] [Comp. John xi. 41. xvii. 1.]

—ἰστέναξε] 'he groaned;' in sympathy with human calamity. [Comp. Heb. iv. 15.]

—ἐφφαθά.] Syro-Chaldee, and the Imperative of the passive conjugation Ethpeel. Διανοίχθητι, meaning, 'Have the use of thine ears.' Λαλεῖν would indeed seem a more proper term, as applied to the tongue; but λαλοῦναι is adopted as being applicable to the removal of both obstructions. For in Hebrew phraseology to open any one's eyes or ears denotes imparting to him the faculty of sight or speech. Grotius observes, that such words are usually interchanged, 'per abusum.' But the reason rather is, that in words indicative of the deprivation of any natural faculty there is one common idea. Thus our words dumb, blind, and deaf, are all derived from past participles of verbs signifying to stop up.

35. ὅσον] for καθ' ὅσον, say most Commentators; who also at μάλλον supply ποσούτῃ. But Fritz., with reason, rejects both ellipses, and simply renders the words quantum—and magis. There is not (as some suppose) any pleonasm in μάλλον περ.; but the μάλλον adds weight and intensity to the following comparative περισσότερον, as in Aristoph. Eccl. 1131, μάλλον ὀλβιωτέρον. So μάλλον κρείσσον at Phil. i. 23.

VIII. 2. ἡμέραι.] This (for the Vulg. ἡμέρας) is found in very many MSS., and is preferred by Mill, Bengel, and Wetstein, and edited by Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, Fritz., and Scholz. See Note on Matt. xv. 32.

3. νῆστες.] Sub. κατὰ, from νήστις, literally 'at fasting'; or, in our ancient phraseology, ο-φαστίς. So α-ψύχτος, &c. Thus it came at length to have the force of an adjective. And the number (sing. or plur.) is accommodated to that of the subject of the assertion. For ἤκουσι some would read, from several MSS., ἤκουσι. But Fritz. shows that the use of the preterite ἤκουσεν, however it may be found in the Septuagint, Josephus, and Liban., cannot be proved to have been adopted by the writers of the New Test. Besides, there is no need of the change, since the Present of ἤκουω has often the sense of the Preterite. Thus we may render 'are come,' or 'had come.'

11. συζητεῖν αὐτῷ] 'to enter into discussion with him.' Συζητεῖν properly signifies mutual inquiry and discussion. [Cf. 16. John vi. 30.]

12. ἀναστανάξας τῷ πν.] The ἀναστανάξας signifies what is deep (for height and depth concur); i. e. 'he deeply groan, or sigh from the very heart' — εἰ δοθήσεται, &c.] The εἰ is imagined put for ὅτι; but this is a false asseveration (common in the Old Test. if ever, found in the Classical writ there is implied an imprecation; ut is omitted per apostrophe and gravis nature of the imprecation ('may I the like) will depend upon the speaker. It is supplied at Exek. The Classical writers use the compellative only, I believe, with ἐάν μή.

15. διετίλλετο αὐτοῖς] 'gave them this injunction.'

— βλέπετε ἀπὸ.] Equivalent to the προσ-ἔχει of Matthew and the φυλάσσετε of Luke.
 This use is Hellenistic. Καὶ τῆς ζύμης 'H.
 Matthew joins the Sadducees with the Pharisees, and makes no mention of Herod. But there is no real discrepancy; since Herod and the Herodians (i.e. his adherents and courtiers) were, no doubt, Sadducees; and there is every reason to think that their doctrines and morals were such as to justify the caution of our Lord. Ζύμη, by a striking metaphor, denotes the infection of false doctrines (so Matth. xvi. 12.), as well as of corrupt morals.

17. [Comp. supra vi. 52.]

19. πέντε ἄρτους ἐκλάσα εἰς τοὺς π.] There is here a pregnans constructio, by which is included the two senses,—to break the loaves, and to distribute them to the multitude.

20. πόσων σπυρ. πλ.] for πόσας σπυρίδας πλήρεις. [Comp. supra v. 8. Matth. xv. 34.]

22—23. This miracle is recorded only by Mark, though worthy of particular attention. [Comp.
 vi. 21.]

23. ἐξήγαγεν—κώμης] i.e., as most Commentators say, because he thought those who had seen so many miracles in vain, were not worthy to see more. The reason, however, seems rather to have been, that our Lord rarely chose to perform a miracle with a crowd pressing about him. See supra ii. 10. v. 23.

—ἐπιθείς εἰς τὰ ὄμματα.] Our Lord was here again pleased to vary the mode of the external action: and that the one adopted on this occasion was not unusual with those who pretended to cure blindness, we may suppose from its occurring in an account of a pretended miracle narrated in Suet. Vesp. 7. The spitting on the eyes was, as in some other miracles in John ix. 6, a significant action, denoting the treating of the malady; here the removal, by dissolution, of the obstruction to the sight, considered as a hard con-cretion.

24. καὶ ἀναβλέψας.] 'Αναβλέπειν signifies, not only to look up, but 'to recover the sight,' which latter signification many Commentators here adopt. That, however (as Campbell observes), only has place where a complete recovery is denoted; which was not the case here, the perfection of it being marked by the words ἀποκαταστάθῃ, καὶ ἐνέβλεψα τηλαυγῶς ἅπαντας.
 The best Commentators, ancient and modern,
 are agreed on the former signification, to look up.
 He looked up in order to ascertain whether he had recovered his sight.

—βλέπω τοὺς ἀνθρώπους—περιπατοῦντας.]
 These words have occasioned somewhat of perplexity. There is, as might be expected, great variety of readings; for several MSS. and early Editions read βλέπω τοὺς ἀνθρώπους· ἔτι ὡς δένδρα ὁρῶ περιπ. And this was edited by Steph.
 3, Schmid, Mill, Bengel, and Matthæi. But, as Fritz. has shown, this reading yields no tolerable sense; and he (in common with Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz) edits the words without the ἔτι and ὡς, as in the textus receptus. This, too, is found in the Edit. Princ. and the great body of MSS., confirmed by almost every one of the ancient Versions; and is doubtless to be preferred. The other seems to have arisen, as Fritz. remarks, from two modes of reading, i.e. βλέπω and ὁρῶ.
 ἔτι and ὡς. The words ὡς δένδρα are to be referred to the τοὺς ἀνθ., not περιπ.; and the sense is, 'I see men, as trees, walking;' i. e. I can distinguish men from trees only by their walking: a result of imperfect vision; since a confusion of vision in the objects is, as Plato observes, the first sign of returning sight. This view of the sense is confirmed by Victor, who, no doubt, derived it from the Fathers. From the above it is plain that the person was not born blind, but had lost his sight from disease.

 original state; either by dyeing them, or,

 its whiteness.

4. καὶ ἦσαν συλλαλοῦντες τῷ Ἰ.] In the of Luke are interspersed these words:
 ὁφείλιντες ἐν δόξῃ, ἔλγον τὴν ἔξοδον αὐτοῦ, ἡμῶν πληροῦν ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ. Ὁ δὲ ἱέρων καὶ οἱ σὺν αὐτῷ ἦσαν βιβλαρίμιοι αὐτοῦ, καὶ τοὺς δύο ἀνδρας τοὺς συνιστώσας

 τῷ. Καὶ ἐγένετο, ἐν τῷ διαχωρίζεσθαι ἀπ' αὐτοῦ, εἶπεν ὁ Πέτρος, &c.

7. ἐπισκιάζουσα αὐτοῖς.] This construction in the Dative is rare (that with the Accusative is the usual one), but it is found also in Acts 14. and Ps. xc. 3. Sept. It is suspended on ἐκεῖ.

—λέγουσα.] This is omitted in many MSS., in Versions, and Theophylact; and is cancelled Matthæi, Griesbach, and Fritz., as having introduced from the other Gospels. [Comp.
 Mt. 17. Luke 9. 22. 2 Pet. 1. 17.]

8. ἐκείνους.] This rather rare form is a neuter plural adverbially, of the old epic adjectives ἐκεῖνοι; whence the Ionic ἐκεῖνους, common by the Attics to ἐκείνους. Yet the old was retained by the Macedonians, and sometimes in the later writers, especially the X. In ἀλλὰ τὸν Ἰ., ἀλλὰ is generally taken for εἰ μὴ, which is found in the passage of 9. Fritz., however, supposes the particle not with reference to the negative in οὐκέτι, and supplies a verb of seeing; namely, ἐώρακον, from the preceding participle. Yet the former mode is defended and illustrated by our but, which has often the sense enim. The fact is, that in this case ἀλλὰ is for ἀλλ' ἢ, otherwise than.

9. διεστείλατο] 'strictly charged them'; Matt.
 xvi. 20. ἐντείλατο.

10. τὸν λόγον ἐκράτησαν, &c.] The sense of these words mainly depends upon the construction. Some construe them with the words following, πρὸς ἑαυτούς; others take them with the preceding, συζητούντες. The former method is preferred by some of the ancient, and the earlier modern Commentators; while the latter is adopted by almost all the later Expositors; and with reason: for such a construction as the former would be unprecedented. They are, however, not agreed on the sense of ἐκράτησαν; some rendering it 'retinuerunt,' others, 'animo exceperunt,' others, again, 'animo retinuerunt.'
 To all of these interpretations, however, objections have been made. Now κρατῆναι with the Accus. means to hold fast, and figur. not to let slip from one's memory, or attention; and also, as we say, to keep to oneself, reticeo. Either sense may be admitted. The former is more agreeable to what precedes; the latter, to what follows, and as being required by the construction, is preferable.
 τί ἐστι—νεκρῶν, quidnam esset ē mortuis redire, urrection, which all but the Sadducees believed:

 but they could not reconcile this language with what they had learnt in the law,—that Christ should live for ever, and hold an everlasting kingdom. Hence their slowness in comprehending the assurances,—so often reiterated to them by Christ,—of his death and resurrection. Insomuch that when the Lord was dead, their hopes died with him, and only revived at his resurrection.

11. Ὁ τι λέγουσιν.] Almost all Commentators take ὅτι in the sense why. Fritz., with reason, rejects this signification. He would read τί οὖν from some Latin Versions. But this is of slender authority, and the οὖν was doubtless derived from Matt. xvii. 10. If the common reading be correct, the best mode of interpretation will be, to supply τί ἐστὶ τοῦτο here and infra ver. 28. But as this is a very harsh ellipsis, we may suspect some corruption in the text. The true reading may be that of one or two MSS., τί for διὰ τί. This is confirmed even by those MSS. which are quoted in favour of τί οὖν, and perhaps by the Versions which are adduced in support of πᾶς οὖν. The ο might easily arise from the ε preceding. The authority, however, is too weak to be relied on; and the reading is probably no more than a conjecture to remove the difficulty; which may, perhaps, more effectually, and quite as allowably, be done by reading δ τι, which I have ventured to edit here and infra v. 28. This signification is not frequent, yet instances do occur. Steph. Thes. furnishes three; Hom. II. κ. 142. Odyss. τ. 463, where Eustath. rightly explains it by τί or διὰ τί, both in interrogation; of which Stephens gives one example from Isocrates, to which I am enabled to add the following: Thucyd. i. 90, fin. καὶ ὅποτε τις αὐτὸν ἔροιο τῶν ἐν τέλει ὄντων δ τι οὐκ ἐπύρεται, &c. (So Bekker and Poppo rightly edited, instead of the common reading ὅτι.) Xenoph. Ephes. iv. 2, fin. ἐκλείψει ἐπιμέλειαν ἔχειν πᾶσαν, ἴωε, ἔφη, μάθωμεν ὅστις ὁ ἀνθρώπος ἐστίν, καὶ δ τι ὅντως αὐτοῦ μίλει ἑοῖς, where ὅ τι was rightly emended instead of the common reading ὅτι. In such a case δ τι is for διότι. [Comp. Mal. iv. 5.]

12. Ἑλίας μὲν—πάντα.] Here there is not any irony (as some imagine), but rather a Synchoreia. Render, 'Elias is, indeed, first to come, and is to restore things to their former state.'

—καὶ καθὼς γέγραπται, &c.] Many are the attempts which have been made to assign a satisfactory sense to the words of the common text καὶ πᾶς. But all have failed; being more or less defective, either in sense or construction, or both. Hence the most eminent Commentators have been long agreed, that the passage is corrupt; and various modes of emendation have been proposed. Mere conjectures merit little attention. As to the various readings of MSS.,

not one is deserving of notice, except that for the Vulg. καὶ πᾶς, several ancient MSS., with the later Syriac Version, and Euthym. and Victor, read καθὼς. But even this will not render much service. Some, therefore (as Beza, Campbell, and Bp. Marsh), have resorted to the mild conjecture καὶ καθὼς. The sense assigned by Bp. Marsh is, 'And that, as it is written of the Son of man, he (John the Baptist) may suffer many things and be set at naught.' But this is too mild a medicine to be effectual. Hence some recent Commentators, Grotz., Schulz., and Fritz., have attempted to emend the corruption by stronger methods. And since it appears that in this passage (as in the parallel one of Matt. vii. 12, 13) the fate of John Baptist and of Christ are meant to be paralleled,—so they conceive that the substance of the two verses has been, by some accident, transposed; and they propose that the clause καθὼς γέγραπται—ἐξουδενωθῇ should be transposed, and placed after ὅσα ἠθέλησαν; the words καθὼς γέγραπται ἐπ' αὐτόν being cancelled, as a double reading of the former. Thus the passage will stand as follows: 'Ἑλίας μὲν ἔλθων πρῶτον ἀποκαθιστᾷ πάντα: ἀλλὰ λέγω ὑμῖν, ὅτι καὶ Ἑλίας ἐλήλυθε· καὶ ἐποίησαν αὐτῷ ὅσα ἠθέλησαν, καθὼς γέγραπται ἐπὶ τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἵνα πολλὰ πάθῃ καὶ ἐξουδενωθῇ. This yields an excellent sense, and the transposition is countenanced by the parallel passage of Matt. xvii. 12, 13. But as there is not the slightest authority for it, either in MSS. or Versions, it cannot be introduced into the text. Indeed it may, after all, be unnecessary; for, by adopting, as I have ventured to do, the reading, καὶ καθὼς, &c., we may supply after ἐξουδενωθῇ the clause corresponding clause (which is often, in such cases, left to be understood from the context) οὕτως πάσχει, 'thus he (i. e. John Baptist) is to suffer.' This is strongly confirmed by the οὕτως καὶ of St. Matthew. The words καθὼς—αὐτόν, at the end of the verse, are merely a various reading of the former, and therefore stand for nothing. Yet they strongly confirm the reading, καθὼς (which is so indispensable to the construction of the passage), especially as they are found in every one of the MSS. The omission of καὶ before καθὼς is very frequent in the MSS. of all writers. [Comp. Luke i. 17.]

14. πρὸς τοὺς μαθητὰς.] Namely, the day left behind on his going to the Mount.

17. ἡνεγκα—πρὸς σε.] The state of the case was, that the man had brought his son to Jesus to be healed by him. But our Lord not being immediately at hand, or the man not being willing to trouble Him, he presented his son to the Apostles for cure; since it was known that they had healed many such poor wretches.

—ἔχοντα—ἀλαλον.] Notwithstanding what some recent Commentators urge, who adopt Mele's hypothesis on the Demoniacs, this can only signify, as Fritz acknowledges, 'whose body was in the power of a demon who made him dumb.' So in Luke xi. 14, a deaf demon (i. e. one who causes deafness) is mentioned. Here Wetstein compares Plut. T. ii. p. 438 (speaking of the Pythian priestess), ἀλάλου καὶ ἀσπύματος οὕσα πλήρης.

18. ὅπου—καταλάβῃ.] Wetstein and others render, 'and wherever, or whenever, it may attack him:' for the verb καταλαμβάνειν, they say, is often used of the attack of any disorder, especially of epilepsy. But the context demands that we should take καταλάβῃ of the demon; and the sense is, 'whenever, or whenever, it lights on him;' a signification often found in Theophr.

—ῥήσσει αὐτόν.] Beza and others, with E. V., render it 'tears him.' But the true sense is that of the ancient Versions and Commentators, and most modern ones, 'dashes him on the ground;' of which signification many examples are confirmed by the Commentators.

—τρίζει τοὺς ὀδ. α.] 'grinds his teeth.' So Theophyl. Sim. p. 91, χαλεπαίνων καὶ ττριζόντων ὀδόντας. Aristoph. Ran. 926, μὴ πρίν τοι ὀδόντας. These and the other particulars in this verse and ver. 22, are, indeed, all symptoms of epilepsy. But if we even should suppose that the man was an epileptic; it would not follow that the disorder was not induced by demoniacal influences.

—ξηραίνεται.] Some ancient and several modern Commentators explain 'faints away,' 'falls into a swoon.' But however this may be a symptom of epilepsy, the word will not bear that sense, and can only mean 'pines away.' I agree with Fritz., that the word denotes, not so much what happens during the demon's attack, as it is a general consequence from thence. Thus Celsus says of epilepsy, 'hominem consumit!'

19. αὐτοῖς.] For vulg. αὐτῷ many MSS. and Versions have αὐτοῖς, which is edited by Griesb., Tittman, and Scholz; rightly, as far as regards suitability to the context. But as the MSS. in general fluctuate between αὐτῷ and αὐτοῖς, while some others have neither one nor the other, I cannot but suspect that both are from the margin.

20. ἰδὼν αὐτόν—ἐσπάραξεν.] Most Commentators take ἰδὼν for ἰδόντα. But that is a false view of the construction, which Fritz, rightly regards as an anacoluthon. The Evangelist meant to say καὶ ἰδὼν (ὁ πατήρ) αὐτόν, εὐθέως ὑπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος ἐσπαράσσετο, but then changed the construction; of which see another example in Acts xx. 3.

—ἐκυλίετο] 'rolled himself.' Midd. form of κυλίω, said to be a later form for κυλίω. But it is as old as the time of Homer; being, indeed, the primitive form.

21. ὡς] for ἐξ οὗ, ἀφ' οὗ ('since the time) when.' — παιδιοθέν.] This form, and the kindred, but more elegant one παιδόθεν, are of later Grecism. The earlier purer writers employed ἐκ παιδός, or ἐκ παιδίου.

22. τὸ πῦρ.] The Article (absent from vulg.) is found in many ancient MSS., and is adopted by Matthæi, Griesbach, Fritz., and Scholz, and confirmed by Matt. xvii. 15. John xv. 6. Acts xxviii. 5, and other passages. Propriety, indeed, would seem to require this, since it falls under that canon of Bp. Middleton, by which all those utensils or substances in a house, of which there is ordinarily but one, take the Article. Thus when πῦρ signifies the fire in any house, it requires the Article; when it signifies any other, or fire in general, it rejects it. But whether, even in the former case, the Article was not occasionally, in the common dialect, omitted is more than I would venture to affirm. Indeed it would seem so from John xv. 6, at least in the Vulg. and the bulk of the MSS., and in all of them at Matt. iii. 10. Luke iii. 9.

said to be supplicatory; but it is rather hortatory; and the idiom results (as Fritz. observes) from the Imperative, with which the particle is, in such a case, united. Εἰ τι δύνασαι is best regarded by Fritz. as a formula obtestationis, entreating help. I would compare Dio Chrysost. p. 81, ἐκείνης δεομένης τοῦ πατρὸς, εἰ τι δύναιτο, βοηθεῖν. See also Thucyd. vi. 25, and Herodot. viii. 57. Of course, the very nature of this formula implies some doubt of the power of the person whose help is implored.

23. εἰ δύνασαι—πιστεύοντι.] With this sentence Commentators have been somewhat perplexed; partly from the brevity and indefiniteness of the phraseology, and partly from the peculiar use of the τό. The conjectures that have been hazarded are very inefficient, and indeed unnecessary. Some endeavour to remove the difficulty as regards the τό by taking it for τοῦτο. But that is an exploded principle; and to supply κατά, as they do, is absurd. The best recent Commentators are, with reason, agreed that the τό is here meant to be applied to the whole of the sentence following, by a use common in the Classical writers. See Alt. Gr. Gr. p. 31, and comp. Matt. xix. 18. Some indeed (as Krebs, Rosenmüller, and Kuinoel) would extend the force of the τό to πιστεύοντι; taking the sense to be, 'If thou canst believe all things to be possible to him that believeth, [all will be well].' So inserting an εἶναι after πάντα, and supplying, at the end of the sentence, βοηθήσω σοι, or εὖ ἔχει. But had such a sense been intended, no reason can be imagined why the εἶναι should not have been expressed; and indeed the manner in which this sense is extracted is most harsh and unnatural. The only satisfactory solution of the difficulty is to suppose that after πιστεύσαι is to be supplied (what our Lord, from modesty suppressed) βοηθήσω σοι, or εὖ ἔχει; q. d. 'my power to heal thee depends upon thy power to believe.' Comp. supra vi. 5, 6. The δύνασαι, at which many have stumbled, is used with reference to the δύνασαι of the question, to which this is an answer; q. d. 'Say not, if thou canst; it depends upon thyself; If thou canst but believe, &c., all things are possible [to be done] for him that believeth.' Τῷ πιστεύοντι is a dat. commodi.

The use of the τό may be best accounted for by supposing, either that this mode of speaking was not unusual to our Lord, in cases where his aid was entreated with any sort of doubt; or rather, that it was used to indicate that the answer returned was well known; q. d. Jesus then addressed to him the [well known answer], If thou canst believe [all will be well]. [Comp. Luke xvii. 6.]

24. πιστεύω, Κύριε.] Κύριε is not found in a few MSS. and some Versions, and is canceled by Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz; but rashly: since not only external but internal evidence is greatly in favour of the word. For, as Fritz. observes, 'Nihil hæc voce, in humili et supplicii patris observatione, fingi potest aptius.' But how came it, some may ask, that a word so proper and suitable should have been omitted? I answer, it was, as the MSS. are so few, have been omitted inadvertently by those scribes who did not see its force. I rather, however, suspect it to have been omitted from design. The Alexandrian critic who first threw it out, no doubt thought there was more gravity in making the clause terminate with the most important word; which itself conveyed the answer (the very reason, it should seem, why our English Translators here render, Lord, I believe). And he would probably have emended Κύριε, &c. had it not been forbidden by propriety of language to commence an address with a vocative case; not having the good taste to see the propriety of making the profession of faith be accompanied by an address so adapted to entreaty.

— βοήθει μου τῇ ἀπιστίᾳ.] By ἀπιστία, as Grotius rightly observes, is here meant, not a total want of faith, but a deficient or wavering faith. The sense is, 'I have a faith, but it is feeble; supply its deficiency, regard it as complete, and heal my son accordingly.'

25. ἐπισυντρέχει] 'were running together towards him.' The τό at τῷ πνεύματι is a sign of the Vocat., the Nomin. being put for the Vocat. The ἄγως is authoritatively emphatical.

27. κρατ. αὐ. τ. χ.] 'having taken him by the hand.'

28. δ τι.] I have, at the Note supra, v. 14, sufficiently justified this deviation from all the Editors, instead of the vulg. δτι of the various readings of the MSS., namely, διὰ τί, or τί ὅτι; the former is manifestly derived from Matthew, the latter is a gloss.

31. παρεπορεύοντο] 'passed along;' namely, the lakia. See Note on Mark ii. 23. Οὐκ ἠέλω—γινῶ. A popular mode of speaking, like that at vii. 23, οὐδὲνα ἠθέλω γινῶσθαι, signifying that he wished to travel in a private character. The reason for this is subjoined in the next verse, which should be rendered, 'for he was teaching his disciples and telling them,' &c. In ἐδίδ. and ἔλεγ. there is an Hendiadys, it being for ἐδίδ. (addressed) λέγων.

31. παραδίδεται] 'is being delivered;' i. e. 'is about to be delivered.'

32. ἐναγκαλισάμενος.] Kypke, Elaner, and Wetstein observe, that as the child was of somewhat advanced years, the signification here is not strictly, taking up into the arms, but embracing.

37. [Comp. Matt. x. 40. Luke ix. 48. John xii. 20.]

37. ἀπεκρίθη τινα] 'addressed.' This may have been, as some say, one of John Baptist's disciples; or rather one of the Seventy originally sent out by Christ, and who though not personally in attendance on him, was yet permitted to have the power of working miracles.

—ἐν τῷ ὄν.] The ἐν is not found in several MSS., and is cancelled by Mill, Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz. But I think, VOL. I.

wrongly. It is defended by xi. 9. x. 16, 7. James v. 10. The early Critics, it seems, stumbled at the Hebraistic idiom; and hence either cancelled the ἐν, or changed it into ἐπὶ: which last reading (slenderly supported by MS. authority) ought not to have been edited by Fritz. [Comp. Numb. xi. 27, 28.]

39. οὐδεὶς γὰρ ἔστιν, &c.] The sense is, 'nemo enim meâ auctoritate miraculum edet, et poterit illico mihi conviciari.' This construction (similar to that at 1 Cor. vi. 5), is quite agreeable to Classical usage. So Plato Menex. p. 71. Α. οὐδεὶς ὅστις οὐ γελάσεται καὶ ἐρᾷ. Δυνήσεται ταχὺ signifies, 'will readily bring himself to,' &c. (Fritz.) [Comp. 1 Cor. xii. 3.]

40. Instead of the vulg. ἡμῶν—ἡμῶν, many MSS., Versions, and early Editions, have ὁμῶν—ὁμῶν, which is edited by Mill, Matthæi, Griesb., Vater, and Scholz. But, I think, without reason: for in external evidence the reading is not superior to the received one, (and if it were, Manuscript authority is of little weight in respect to words perpetually confounded in the MSS.), and in internal, greatly inferior; for, as Fritz, truly remarks, both here and at Luke ix. 50, 'de Jesu agitur, non de Apostolis. Et potuit Jesus includere simul discipulos, se excludere non potuit. Ille also observes that this verse contains a freeb reason why no molestation should be given to the person in question. [Comp. also Matt. xii. 30.]

are not found in very many MSS., Versions, and early Editions, and were thrown out of the text by Griesbach, Vater, Fritz., and Scholz: rightly, perhaps; for we may more easily account for the insertion than the omission of the words: especially as the force of the somewhat rare phrase ἐν ὀνόματι ὅτι hoc nomine vel titulo, 'on account of' found in Thucyd. iv. 60, was not likely to be known to the scribes. At the same time, it is not impossible, that the common reading may be the true one. At least the reasons alleged against it by Fritz. are not of any great weight. [Comp. x. 42.]

— ὅτι Χριστοῦ ἴσται.] It has been debated whether Χριστός in the New Test. be a proper name or an appellative. That it was originally an appellative, descriptive of office and dignity (like ὁ βαπτιστής), seems certain; and so frequent its use in the New Test., that some contend that it is never employed otherwise. But in Rom. v. 6. 1 Cor. i. 12, 23. 2 Cor. iii. 3. Col. iii. 24. 1 Pet. i. 11, to render 'the anointed,' or even 'the Messiah,' would be harsh. Hence Bp. Middleton maintains that in all those passages Χριστός is merely a proper name; and he contends that even during our Saviour's life it had become such. Finally, he compares Matt. xxvii. 17, 20, with Matt. x. 2; also a kindred one at 1 Cor. iii. 23, ὑμεῖς δὲ Χριστοῦ, Χριστός δὲ Θεοῦ. It should rather seem that the word was originally an appellative; but had passed over into a cognomen during our Lord's earthly career, after which it became a proper name. The phrase εἶναι τινος, 'to be devoted to any one,' occurs elsewhere in the Scriptural, and sometimes in the Classical writers. [Comp. Luke xvii. 1, 2.]

43. τὰς δύο χεῖρας] 'both of your hands. The Article has here the force of the possessive pronoun. [Comp. Matt. v. 29.]

44. ὅπου—σβέννυται.] The words are derived from Is. lxvi. 24, where the punishment to be inflicted, in this life, on those who are rebellious towards God, is vividly depicted, by the representation of their carcasses being subjected to the continual gnawing of worms, and the devouring of an unextinguishable fire; so as to be objects of detestation to all future generations. Here, however, they are applied to represent the eternal misery of another world, by images derived from Γέννα in this; on which, as a frequent emblem of torment, see Note at Matt. v. 22. The true rendering seems to be, 'where the worm is never to die, nor the fire to be quenched.' So the Sept. well expresses, ὁ γὰρ σκώληξ αὐτῶν οὐ τελευτήσει, καὶ τὸ πῦρ αὐτῶν οὐ σβέσθεται. Similar figures are found in Eccles. vii. 17. ἐκδικήσει ἀσάβους πῦρ καὶ σκώληξ, and

Judith xvi. 17. Κύριος παντοκράτωρ ἐκδικήσει αὐτοὺς ἐν ἡμέρᾳ κρίσεως, δοῦναι πῦρ καὶ σκώληκα εἰς σάρκα αὐτῶν καὶ καύσασθαι ἐν ἀσθῆσει ζωῆς αἰῶνος. Some difference of opinion, however, exists as to the nature of the punishments here designated by ὁ σκώληξ αὐτῶν καὶ τὸ πῦρ, (scil. αὐτῶν, i. e. of the wicked) namely, whether they are to be regarded as actual and positive inflictions, or as figuratively representing the gnawing of remorse and self-condemnation, and the torture of men's unavailing reproach, for having brought on themselves their own destruction. Many have been inclined to think that, though the fire be taken in a physical sense, the worm is figurative. On which interpretation it is truly observed by Fritz., that 'what holds good of one clause of the sentence, must of the other: for a confusion of the physical with the metaphorical in the same sentence is not to be tolerated.' And he would have both taken in the literal sense. But there seems no reason why both terms should not be regarded as figurative, yet designating, under these figures, real inflictions, as dreadful to the then frame as the gnawing of worms, or the burning of fire, to our present. See a recent Tract by Professor Stuart, entitled 'Exegetical Essays,' on some words of Scripture relative to future punishment, namely, αἰὼν and αἰώνιος, γένω, ἔδω, and γένω, and especially Sect. 3, which ably discusses the nature and manner of using figurative language in respect to the objects of a future world. And not only does the language under our consideration express torment, the acutest in kind, but eternal in duration. So, in the parallel passage of Matthew, we have the expressions εἰς τὴν γένναν τοῦ πυρὸς and εἰς τὸ πῦρ τὸ αἰώνιον, the latter qualifying and completing the idea in the former. And therefore the notions of those who, from the time of Origen, have dared to limit this duration, are both groundless and presumptuous. With reason, therefore, does Prof. Stuart, after considering at large the bearing which the use of the terms αἰὼν and αἰώνιος in Scripture has on the subject of future punishment, come to the conclusion (and, indeed, but not to be suppressed), that it does not indubitably follow, that 'if the Scriptures have not asserted the ENDLESS punishment of the wicked, neither have they asserted the ENDLESS happiness of the righteous, nor the ENDLESS glory and existence of the Godhead. The one is equally certain with the other. Both are laid in the same balance. They must be tried by the same test. And if we give up the one, we must, in order to be consistent, give up the other also. The necessary conclusion, then, must be, that the measure of future torment will ascend up for ever and ever.' That this was the universal sentiment of the Faπάν γὰρ ἀλισθήσεται.] There is per-passage in the New Test. which has so all efforts to assign to it any certain inter-as this. It is impossible here to detail, as review, even a tenth of the interpretawhich have been proposed. It must suffice as those expositions only which have any ace of truth. And first it is of importance ire whether the words are to be considered ference to what went before, or taken as a is dictum. The latter is the view taken e, especially Kuinoel; who maintains that id the next verse are out of place, and bea some other part of the Gospel. This, er, is a gratuitous supposition; which has,

er, the disadvantage of depriving us of all of a comfort, to shed some glimmer of light
: deep obscurity which involves the present s. Yet those who admit that the passage connexion with, and reference to what pre-are not agreed as to the precise nature of connexion. Many refer it to the words immediately preceding; so that either a reason may posed given why the wicked in Hell will mented unto eternity, or that ver. 49. may sidered as a further explication or illustra-of what was said in ver. 48; for γὰρ has the sense of scilicet. But the great objec-to this mode of interpretation is, that it coms to assign such a sense to πᾶς as cannot stified on any principle of correct exegesis, y, 'every wicked man,' or, 'every one of undamned to Hell.' Quite as objectionable sense of πᾶσα θυσία, assigned by some of Commentators, 'every one consecrated to by which the soul is taken to mean the salt
s. Many other interpretations are grounded this hypothesis, that the words have refer-to those which immediately precede; every which, however, is liable to very strong objections.

we now examine the other class of interpretations, namely, those which proceed on the basis—that the words have reference to what is said in ver. 47. Thus πᾶς will then denote one of you, 'every Christian.' But what is the meaning of πυρὶ ἀλισθήσεται? Here, as in the other class, we have a multitude of precarious, and absurd interpretations. Indeed, only two are thought deserving of any serious attention. 1. That of those who take πυρὶ ἀλισθ.
as, 'shall be purified by the Holy Ghost.'

(See Matt. iii. 11. Acts iii. 3.) They render:
'For every Christian will be seasoned with the fire [of the Holy Ghost], as [in the old Law] the precept was; every sacrifice shall be seasoned with salt.' q. d. 'As (καὶ for ὡς, as often) every sacrifice, under the Old Law, was to be seasoned with salt, so, in the New, every Christian shall have a portion of the Holy Spirit.' But to assign such a sense to πυρὶ is harsh, and we can scarcely suppose that our Lord would speak so enigmatically. The difficulty, however, is chiefly centered in the interpretation of πυρὶ, which seems best taken by the ancients generally, and some moderns (as Beza, Rosenmüller, Kuinoel, and Fritz.), to mean 'the fiery trials of life.' They are not, however, agreed on the sense of ἀλισθή-σεται. Beza and others take the meaning to be,
'Every Christian is purified by the fiery trials of life, as every sacrifice is salted with salt.' But since ἀλισθ. will not admit of such a sense, I prefer the interpretation of ἀλ. proposed by Bos, Muzel, and Fritz.; especially as it is confirmed by the ancient gloss δοκιμασθήσεται, namely, 'shall be put to the proof.' The reference, moreover, of this verse is not to ver. 47 only, but likewise to ver. 43—7. For, as Fritz. truly observes, 'since Jesus has there thrice expressed the sentiment, that a loss even of the members of the body, nay, of those most useful, is to be encountered, rather than to yield to the seductions of vice; that so being tried and approved, we may attain the prize of our high calling; nothing can be expected but that we should show that such sort of trials (like those of athletes) are either very useful, or absolutely necessary. By πᾶς must be understood all persons, i. e. all Christians, since to them ver. 43—48. alone belong. Πῦρ designates those fiery trials, in encountering which the self-denial and fortitude of the sufferer is compared to that of enduring the loss of a limb. Πυρὶ ἀλ. may be interpreted, 'will be tried and prepared by such trials [for the enjoyment of eternal felicity].'
A metaphor taken from victims which were prepared for sacrifice by the imposition of the moda salutis. In the words of the next clause καὶ πᾶσα θυσία ἀλὶ ἀλισθήσεται (founded on Levit. ii.
13. καὶ πᾶν δώρον θυσίας, i. e. every sacrifice, ὕμῳ ἀλὶ ἀλισθήσεται), the καὶ is to be rendered sicuti, ut, like the Heb. 1. The full sense, then, seems to be this: 'Every [believer] will be (or is) seasoned and prepared, by the fiery trials of this life, for eternal glory—even as every victim is seasoned with salt [for sacrifice];' intimating, that the seasoning or preparation is as necessary to the purpose (i. e. final acceptance) in the one case as in the other. Thus our Lord means to say that there is a δοκιμασία for every believer.

liever, which is as necessary to put him to the proof, and give him a chance of acceptance, as the seasoning is to the sacrifice. The seasoning was necessary to the victim, in order to purify it, and render it acceptable; and so is the moral seasoning necessary to those who are commanded to 'offer their bodies a living sacrifice,' Rom. xii. 1.

By a paronomasia on the double sense of salt, the word is first used, at ver. 49, in its proper sense; then, at ver. 50, in its figurative one; where it denotes, as some say, the salt of friendship; but rather, we may suppose, with others, the salt of wisdom. See Coloss. iv. 6. Comp. Matt. v. 13. Luke xiv. 34. After recommending the study of wisdom, our Lord enjoins the cultivation of peace one with another. See Rom. xii. 18. Heb. xii. 14.

X. 2. οἱ Φαρισαῖοι.] Many MSS. have not the Article, which is cancelled by Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz; but without any good reason. It is found in the parallel passage, and can scarcely be dispensed with, being intended to denote 'the persons who were of the sect of the Pharisees in the surrounding country.' Certainly it is far easier to account for the omission than for the addition of the οἱ. And though some MSS. are without the οἱ in the parallel passage, yet they are very few in number, and almost all of them such as omit it here.

6. ἀπὸ δὲ ἀρχῆς κτίσεως.] In this rare phrase κτίσις signifies 'the creation,' the world, or universe, as xiii. 19. 2 Pet. iii. 4. Sep. v. 17. xvi. 24. The argument in this and the verse following is, that 'God, at the beginning of the world, created man and woman, in order that they should live together in perfect union; and that hence married persons are to be regarded, not as two, but one; and therefore, by the Divine law, no divorce can be permitted.' [See Gen. i. 27. v. 2.]

10. ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ.] This seems to designate some private lodging, which they occupied on the road; and the expression is here used in contradistinction to the public place, where our Lord had been arguing with the Pharisees.

11, 12. In these two verses there is a marvellous diversity of readings; none of which, however, authorise any change in the text. There may be some want of neatness in the phraseology, nay, of precision in the use of one of the terms employed—namely, ἀπολύσῃ in ver. 12. But if the whole be taken as expressed populariter, there will be nothing to stumble at. It is true that, strictly speaking, a Jewish wife could not divorce her husband; for as to the examples of Salome and others, their actions were done in defiance of all law, and in imitation of Roman licentiousness. 'Απολύσῃ, therefore, at ver. 12, may, with many of the best Commentators, be considered as used with some license, on account of the antithesis, for ἐξέλαθῃ ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀνδρός; which, indeed, is found in some MSS. and Versions, and is cited by Fritz.; but is plainly a gloss. There is the same catchword at 1 Cor. vii. 12, 13, (where the Apostle may be supposed to have had this saying of our Lord in mind) in the use of μὴ ἀφίεναι αὐτήν, and μὴ ἀφίεναι αὐτόν. Perhaps, too, this term is used with reference to the custom υστερήσει.] Many Commentators a that ἄποστρεφειν is used in Scrip-ture extensive sense, so as to denote sistance of any kind, and to be nearly with ἀδικεῖν. But it has properly a signification, denoting to deprive any property, whether by actual and open robbery, or by secret fraud, as denying a debt, cheating in the quality of goods sold, or over-reaching in a bargain. There is, as Heuvel observes, a reference to the 7th commandment μὴ κλέψῃς, on which this is a sort of paraphrase, to show the extent of the injunction. Indeed, the Jews were accustomed, in ordinary discourse, and even in writing, to recite the precepts of the Decalogue not in the very words in which they are expressed, but in other equivalent terms.

21. ἡγάπησεν αὐτόν.] On the sense of ἡγάπ. there is much difference of opinion; which has been occasioned by the fact, that the young man did not follow our Lord's admonition. This has induced some here to take ἀγαπᾶν in the sense, which it sometimes bears, to be content with. But wherever so used, the word has reference to things, not persons, and is construed either with a Dative of object, or with a Participle, or an Infinitive. Of the other interpretations adopted, some are such as respect good will generally, 'he was kindly disposed towards him,' or (as that has been by many supposed not sufficient) such as imply good will by some outward gesture or action. H. Stephens and Lightfoot interpret 'he kissed him;' while Casaubon, Grotius, Wetstein, Heuman, Kuinoel, and Fritz., interpret 'he ac-costed him kindly;' both significations alike des-titute of authority. The interpretation, 'he felt kindly disposed towards him,' (which is supported by the ancient Commentators,) is the most nat-ural and probable.

—τοῖς πτωχοῖς.] The Article, not found in very many MSS. and the Edit. Princ., is cancelled by Bengel, Matthæi, Fritz., and Scholz. Chiefly, it should seem, because it is not found in the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke. But granting that 'such expressions admit of the Article, and also may dispense with it;' yet is not a writer to be allowed to choose which he will? And as the Article is used in precisely the same case at ch. xiv. 5, 7, why not here? where indeed we may far better account for its omission than for its insertion; namely, from a wish to make the phrase tally with Matthew and Luke. On this verse compare Matt. vi. 19. Luke xii. 33. xvi. 9.

22. στυγνάσας.] This may be referred either to the countenance, or to the mind. In the former case it will denote that contraction of the countenance, which is produced by hearing any thing which displeases one: in the latter, it will signify perturbation. Thus, however, the term would be nearly the same with λυπούμενος just after. The former interpretation, therefore, is preferable; especially as it is confirmed by a passage of Nicetas ap. Schleus. Lex. ol δὲ κατηφι-ώντες καὶ στυγνάζοντες ἐβίωσκον.

24. [Comp. Job xxxi. 24. Ps. lxii. 10. 1 Tim. vi. 17.]

25. τῆς τρυμαλιᾶς τῆς ραφίδος.] The Articles are omitted in several MSS., most of them ancient. Bp. Middleton thinks them spurious; and Fritz. cancels them. Certainly, propriety requires that ραφίς, as it denotes a needle in general, should not have the Article. And then propriety alike requires that if that be omitted, the other too shall be left out. Since, however, the latter propriety is of too refined a kind to be likely to have been known to the Evangelist; and as the idiom is found in our own language, it may be safer to retain the Article in question. Τρυμαλιάς is from τρύω, tero, and is of the same form with ἀρμαλιάς.

— διελθεῖν.] Very many MSS., and some Fathers, have ἀσελθεῖν, which is adopted by Wetstein and Matthæi. But it would require much stronger evidence to establish so glaring a violation of propriety; for which Schulz in vain alleges Matt. vii. 13, because (as Fritz. truly observes) at ἀσελθεῖν διὰ τῆς σταυρῆς τύλης should be supplied εἰς τὴν ζωὴν.

26. καὶ τίς δύναται σωθῆναι.] As Matt. xix. 23, has τίς ἄρα, this has by many been regarded as a Hebraism. But καὶ thus prefixed to τίς is frequent in the Classical writers. So Herodot. iii. 140, Θωμάσας λέγει· καὶ τίς ἐστὶν Ἑλλήνων εὐεργέτης;

27. [Comp. Job xlii. 2. Jer. xxxii. 17. Luke i. 37.]

28. καὶ ἤρξατο.] The καὶ, not found in very many MSS., is cancelled by Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz. But wholly without reason. For it is obvious that some particle is necessary; and Fritz. edits ἤρξατο δὲ. But for that reading there is no sufficient authority; and besides, there would thus appear no reason for the omission of the particle. Whereas the καὶ would be likely to be omitted, as being employed in a manner never found in the Classical writers. At ver. 23, the true reading, I suspect, is καὶ ἄρ. ὁ Ἰ., as found in many MSS. and early Editions, and adopted by Fritz. and Scholz. A reading, I would observe, of which those many MSS. that have neither one particle nor the other, are quite in favour. For the Critics, it seems, were content with expelling the καὶ, and introduced nothing in its stead.

— ἀφήκαμεν πάντα, καὶ ἠκολ. σοι.] As much as to say, τί ἄρα ἵσταται ἡμῖν; which words are expressed in the passages of Matthew and Luke.

29. ἔνακεν ἐμοῦ καὶ τ. εὐγγ.] Very many MSS. have ἔνεκα also before τοῦ εὐγγ., which is edited by Griesbach, Matthæi, and Scholz. I have not ventured to follow their example; not because I think (as does Fritz.) that the word is better away; but because it appears to me (especially considering the reading of the parallel τοῦ πατρίους καὶ ἀδελφούς καὶ ἀδελφὰς καὶ μητέρας καὶ τέκνα καὶ ἀγροῦς, μετὰ διωγμῶν καὶ ἐν τῷ αἰῶνι τῷ ἐρχομένῳ ζωὴν αἰώνιον. Πολλοὶ ἐξ ἑσόνται πρῶτοι ἔσχατοι, καὶ [οἱ] ἔσχατοι πρῶτοι.

sage) that it was more likely to have been omitted than omitted. Besides, the very same occasion occurs supra viii. 35, with only one κα.

29, 30. There are marvellous diversities of using in these verses (especially the latter), and no slight difficulties have been started as to interpretation of the words as they now stand. No scruples have been raised, one as to the unity itself; the other as to its limitation, μετὰ ὁρίων. With respect to the former, Campbell objects that 'in ver. 30, the words οικίας—πόλες seem to signify that the compensation all be in kind, in this life;' which, he says, would only mislead instead of enlightening. 'Besides, that some things are mentioned at ver. 29, which a man can have but one, as father and mother. And yet at ver. 30, we have the plural—mothers. Wife is mentioned at ver. 29, but not wives at ver. 30. According to rule (he adds) one was repeated, all should have been repeated. And the construction required the plural number in all.' In short, it is plain that he regarded the passage (with Pearce, Owen, and others) as an understanding. But the consent of all the MSS. and early Versions utterly discountenances such a notion. And as to the objections of Campbell, though they have been adopted and strenuously urged by Fritz., they have, in reality, little or no force. We may safely maintain (with several Commentators, ancient and modern) that the promise even as regarded this world was, considering that ἡ καταπαλασία must be taken for τοῦ καταπαλασίου (which indeed is read in the parallel passage of Luke, and in some MSS. of that of Matthew), fulfilled literally in the Apostolic age. For the disciples, as they travelled about, or were driven by persecutions, experienced everywhere the most unbounded hospitality from their brethren; inasmuch that the advantages they had lost might be said to be amply made up to them. There is even less force in the other objections. The strict regularity, which Campbell and Fritz. desiderate, is by no means a characteristic of the Scriptural writers (indeed of few ancient ones), and least of all of St. Mark. The irregularities they complain of are indeed, all of them, removed in one or other of the MSS., and these alterations are all received into the text by Fritz., though in defiance of every principle of true Criticism. As to the plural number being required throughout ver. 30, it surely makes no great difference whether the plural or the singular be adopted. We might, indeed, say that the singular in things of which men have but one should have been used. Hence I have sometimes thought that ἡ ἀρχὴ should be read, from several MSS. The plural, however, may be tolerated, as referring to Christians at large. For though the declaration is commenced with οὐδὲν, yet that is plainly intended of many. And notwithstanding ungrammatical propriety confined the Evangelist to the use of the singular as to the things just adverted to in the first verse, yet in the second and more minute enumeration, he abandons it. Then again, though three particulars are omitted in ver. 30, which have place in ver. 29 (i. e. πατέρας, μητέρας, and γυναίκας), yet μητέρας might, in some measure, include the other; or, as there is very good authority for it in MSS. and Versions, and strong support in a well-known critical principle, we might be justified in introducing καὶ πατέρας into the text after καὶ μητέρας. As to the omission of γυναίκας, it is not difficult to account for that; for not only delicacy forbade the introduction of this particular, but, in reality, it was a kind of loss which, in the nature of things, did not admit of being made up.

As to the spiritual recompense in this life, mentioned by Campbell, and anxiously sought for by many pious Expositors, 'the joy and peace in believing,' which would more than counterbalance their losses, that, it should seem, was not here adverted to by our Lord. And though it may seem but little that temporal remuneration should be mentioned to Apostles, yet that might be especially meant for the disciples at large. Thus Chrysostom, in his Homily on Matt. xix. 27, and seqq. p. 405, 40, acutely and truly observes: "ἵνα γὰρ μὴ τινες, ἀκούσαντες τὸ, ὅτι ἐξείρετον τῶν μαθητῶν εἶναι τοῦτο νομίσωσι. (λέγει δὲ τὸ τῶν μεγίστων καὶ πρῶτων ἐν τοῖς μέλλουσιν ἀπολαβεῖν) ἐξείρεται τὸν λόγον, καὶ ἠπλώσε τὴν ὑπόσχεσιν ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν ἅπσαν καὶ ἐκ τῶν παρόντων καὶ τὰ μέλλοντα πιστοῦται. In the words ἐξείρεται—τὴν γῆν ἅπσαν there is a reference to ver. 31, πολλοί—πρῶτοι, which Chrysostom has rightly said are here applied by Christ, with reference to worldly condition, as at ix. 35; the sense being, that 'many of those who are accounted first in this world, will be found last in the world to come.' The οἱ before ἔσχατοι is absent from many MSS., and is cancelled by Griesbach, Matthæi, and Fritz., perhaps rightly. See Bp. Middleton on Matt. xix. 30.

But to consider the other difficulty, viz. that found in the qualifying words, μετὰ διωγμῶν; these, taken in conjunction with a promise of things merely temporal, have been thought by many so unsatisfactory, that they have sought either to alter the reading διωγμῶν into διωγμὸν, or to take μετὰ in the sense after. But there is no authority for either change. The ancient Commentators, and several modern ones (as Beza, Zeger, Henpel, Wolf, Winer, and Fritz.), rightly explain the sense to be 'under persecutions,' i. e. 'even amidst persecutions.' So too they were taken by Bp. Sanderson, Berrn. p. 665, who observes that all temporal promises are to be understood cum exceptione crucis, i. e. not absolutely, according to the tenour of the words in the utmost extent, but just so far as God, in his infinite wisdom, shall see it expedient to deal with his servants either in mercy or justice. So that there is still a reservation of a power in Him to exercise them with the cross, as he shall think good. Upon the whole, this remarkable passage may be regarded as one of those sayings of our Lord which were at once declarations and prophecies.

31. [Comp. Matt. xx. 16. Luke xii. 30.]

32. ἔθαμβοῦντο, &c.] On the origins and nature of these feelings of the disciples, the Commentators are divided in opinion. Some, as Heum., Rosenmuller, and Kuinoel, attribute them to the prediction which Christ now delivers of his death and passion. So Euthym., Beza, and others, suppose that the cause of their fear was our Lord's going to Jerusalem, notwithstanding the Sanhedrim were seeking to apprehend him; and their dread of the evils which he had said at ver. 31, and ix. 31, impended over him. But as the disciples did not quite understand their Lord on that occasion, and were probably not then aware of the designs of the Sanhedrim, this view cannot be admitted. Fritz. thinks the feeling was a sort of involuntary presentiment of evil. This is, I conceive, the truth; but not the whole truth; because it accounts for ἀκολουθοῦντες ἐφοβοῦντο, but not for ἔθαμβοῦντο. That must be referred to a certain undefinable awe, with which the Apostles, since the Transfiguration, had begun more and more to contemplate their Lord; and which, besides his many miracles, the increasing air of majesty and authority, which he more and more assumed as his hour drew so near, was well calculated to inspire.

33. καὶ παραδ. αὐτὸν τοῖς ἔθνεσι· καὶ, &c.] So I would point; such being required by propriety, and by the parallel passage in Matthew: καὶ παραδ. αὐτόν τοῖς ἔθνεσι, εἰς τὸ ἐμπαΐξαι, &c.

38. [Comp. Luke xii. 50.]

40. ἐξ εὐνύμων μου.] Mon is omitted in many MSS. and Versions, and is cancelled by Matthwi, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz; but is retained by Tittman and Fritz.: rightly, I think; for not only external but internal evidence is quite in favour of the word, which, it is now probable, was cancelled by the fastidious Alexandrian critics, to remove tautology, than added by the librarii of later times. It may, indeed, be thought to have been introduced from Matthew. But let us remember why the σου was thrown out at Matt. xx. 22, and by whom restored; by those very Editors who here cancel the μου, merely on superstition.

42. οἱ δοκοῦντες ἄρχειν.] Most Commentators regard the participle as redundant; adding a cloud of examples, most of them not to the purpose. I have myself always objected to the unnecessary introduction of pleonasm, whether in the Scriptural or the Classical writers. That there is here no pleonasm, will appear from the numerous examples that I have adduced from the Classical writers in Recens. Syn.; which confirm the rendering of Grotius, 'qui imperare censetur; or that of Fritz., 'qui sibi imperare videtur.' [Comp. Luke xxii. 25.]

— οἱ μεγάλοι αὐτῶν] liter. 'the great ones of them.' Κατέξουσιν αὐτοῖς; Render, with Cameron, 'imperium in eorum nomine exercent.'

44. [Comp. supra ix. 35. 1 Pet. v. 3.]
 45. [Comp. John xiii. 14. Phil. ii. 7. Eph. i. 7. Col. i. 14. 1 Tim. ii. 6.]

46. Βαρτίμαιος.] Some take this for a patronymic, or an explication of υἱὸς Τιμαίου. Others, with more reason, consider it as a real name, and υἱὸς Τιμ. as the explanation. So Βαρβολομαῖος and Βαρισησοῦς, and Thucyd. i. 20, Ἰεραρχίδαν ὁ Ἰεσάρχου. In such cases the patronymic has been converted into a regular appellative; just as in the case of those Greek names which have the form only, without the application of patronymics; on which see my Note on Thucyd. i. 1. The construction is Βαρτ. ὁ τυφλός, υἱὸς Τιμ.

— προσαιτῶν.] The πρὸς is not (as some imagine) without force; but it cannot signify, as others suppose, locus, but rather denotes to or for. Render, 'asking for himself.' So in πρόσκοι and προσκαλεῖσθαι. The accus. is left unexpressed, and has been variously supplied.

48. πολλοί.] Not 'the multitude,' for that sense would require οἱ πολλοί; but many, namely, of those who accompanied Jesus.

49. φωνηθῆναι] 'to be called or summoned.'

50. ἀποβαλὼν τὸ ἱμάτιον.] Namely, through joy, and in order to reach Jesus the sooner. A gratificatio trauis, evidently proceeding from an eyewitness, like that in John vi. 10. 'Now there was much grass in the place.'

51. Ῥαββουνί] 'great master.' The reading ουνι for ουι is found in most of the best MSS., and is edited by Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, Tittman, Fritz., and Scholz; with reason. The ι is paragogic, and the whole termination is, the Talmudists tell us, augmentative. See John xx. 16. and Lampe in loco.

52. Ὑπάγε, &c.] In the passage of Luke we have ἀνάβλεψον; whence it appears that the former is equivalent to the latter. Indeed Ὑπάγε here may be compared with Ὑπάγε εἰς εἰρήνην in a similar passage at Mark v. 34, where see Note.

XI. 1. καὶ ὅτε ἐγγίζουσιν—Ἐλαιῶν.] There is here much diversity of reading, owing to the ancient Critics stumbling at the close brevity and roughness of the phraseology, and, as usual, taking the liberty to expand and polish. The sense, indeed, is what several MSS. represent; namely, 'and when they had approached to Jerusalem, and were come to the [vicinity of] Bethphage and Bethany, [even] to the Mount of Olives,' &c. But we are not warranted in receiving those readings (as Fritz. has done), since internal is quite in favour of the Vulg.

2. κεκάθικε 'has sat.' Doddridge well remarks here on our Lord's prescience, even as to the most minute and fortuitous particulars, viz. 1. Ye shall find a colt; 2. on which no man ever sat; 3. bound with his mother; 4. where two ways meet; 5. as ye enter into the village; 6. the owners of which will at first seem unwilling that you should unbind him; 7. but when they hear that I have need of him, they will let him go. [Comp. Matth. xxvi. 31—35. Mark xiv. 15. Luke xxii. 11—13.]

3. ἀποστελεῖ. Very many MSS., several Versions, and the Edit. Princ. have ἀποστέλλει, which is adopted by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, Tittman, and Scholz. But Fritz., with good reason, retains the common reading.

4. ἀμφοδου. The word properly denotes litium, but in the Sept. and New Test. a street.

7. [Comp. John xii. 14. 2 Kings ix. 13. Levit. xxiii. 40.]

8. στοιβάδας. The word, (in the Classical authors written στιβάς) denotes properly something strewn on the ground, whether straw, hay, stubble, rushes, reeds, leaves, or the twigs of trees; of all which examples may be seen in Wetstein. Here, however, from a comparison with Matth. xxi. 8, it appears to denote frondes, the leafy twigs of trees, such as were used for forming low couches. I would compare a similar use of θαλλίαν, for θάλλον, in Athenæus xi. κατακλίνας [αὐτὸν] ἐν τῇ πόσῃ, θαλλίαν τε κατακλίνας ἀντὶ τραπέζης, &c.

9. [Comp. Ps. cxviii. 26. cxlviii. 1. Matth. xxii. 39. John xii. 13.]

10. The words ἐν ὀν. Κυρ. are omitted in some MSS., and cancelled by Griesbach, Vater, Fritz., and Scholz, but without any sufficient reason.

11. [Comp. John ii. 14.]

13. οὐ γὰρ ἦν καιρὸς σύκων. There are in passages that have occasioned greater perplexity than the present. The difficulty of reconciling the words with our Lord's expectation of finding figs on the tree, or with his subsequent cursing of it, is obvious. Some have given up the solution in despair; others have suspected the passage to be corrupt, and propounded various conjectures; all of them inadmissible, since the MSS. disavow any alteration, still more any canceling of words. The present reading must be retained, and the difficulty be removed by interpretation. Almost all the methods, however, which have been propounded are either founded on unsanctified senses of καιρὸς, or are inapposite. On thing seems clear,—that we must take καιρὸς εἶναι as corresponding to the καιρὸς τῶν καρπῶν at Matt. xxi. 31, and the καιρὸς τοῦ θερισμοῦ at Matt. xiii. 30, as also the ὁ τῶν σῦκων καιρὸς at Atheniens, p. 65. And this sense is very rational; for what can the time of any fruit be, but the time of its maturity and gathering? But the declaration contained in οὐ γὰρ ἦν καιρὸς σῦκων cannot (as the order of the words would induce us to suppose) be meant to offer the reason why there was nothing but leaves on the tree; for the fig is of that class of trees wherein the fruit is developed before the leaves appear. Now some would place the words καὶ εἰδὼν—φύλλα in a parenthesis: for which, however, there seems no place. Others, with more reason, suppose a transposition, by a confusion of the natural order (as at xvi. 3, 4.), whereby the words οὐ γὰρ, &c. though coming immediately after καὶ εἰδὼν, &c. are to be referred to the more remote ἤλθεν εἰ ἀρα ἐρφόσκει τι ἐν αὐτῇ; thus: ‘seeing a fig-tree seen off having leaves, he came, to try if he could find any fruit thereon; for fig-gathering was not yet come: and therefore, if the tree had produced any figs, some, however unripe, might be expected to be growing on it. But when he came to it, he found nothing but leaves;’ and thus his disappointment could only have proceeded from the barrenness of the tree. Unripe figs, it has been observed, may be eaten for allaying hunger. And though this might seem early for figs,—yet, in Judea, the fig-tree bears twice in the year; the first crop being ready at the beginning of the summer. Not to say that a few forward and vigorous trees will ripen their fruit several weeks before the generality.

14. καὶ ἀποκριθεὶς, &c. ‘addressing it’
 — μηδεὶς for Vulg. οὐδεὶς, is found in very many MSS., some Fathers, and several of the early Editions, and is received by Wetstein, Griesbach, Matthæi, Fritz, Tittman, and Scholz.

Strict grammatical propriety requires it, but that Mark so wrote is by no means certain.

15. ἤρξατο ἐκβάλλειν. Not merely for ἐξέβαλε; but the sense is, ‘he proceeded to cast out.’ [Comp. John ii. 14.]

16. σκεῦος. This is usually understood to mean any vessel,—namely, devoted to profane uses, and by which any gain was made. But the word σκεῦος, which in the Sept. corresponds to the Heb. קֵרֶן, has, like that word, a considerable latitude of signification, and denotes, as does the Latin vas or instrumentum, a utensil, or piece of furniture, or article of dress; and, in a general sense, an article, whether for use or traffic.

In this prohibition our Lord upheld the Jewish Canons (founded on Levit. xix. 30.), which, as we find from the Rabbinical writers, define the reverence of the Temple (i. e. the outer Court) to mean, that none should go into it with his staff, shoes, or purse, or with dust upon his feet; and that none should make it a thoroughfare. It may be said, indeed, that the very passing through it without a burden would make it a thoroughfare. But the doing it with a burden was much worse; because the carrying a burden had something slavish in it. So Josephus, Bell. ii. 8, 9, tells us that the Essenes so rigidly observed the Sabbath, as οὐδὲ σκεῦός τι μετακινήσαι. The irregularities which our Lord rebukes had, it is supposed, originated in, or been increased by the proximity of the Castle of Antonia; to which there would be a constant resort of various persons (see Joseph. B. J. i. 3. 5.), and we may imagine that the Priests, having an interest therein, connived at them.

17. [Comp. 1 Kings viii. 29. Is. lvi. Jer. vii. 7. 11. John ii. 16.]

mean, 'have a strong faith,' by a common Hebraism, whereby the Genitive of Θεός subjoined to substantives denotes greatness or excellence. But there is no reason to abandon the common interpretation, by which Θεοῦ is a Genitive of object or end, as in Rom. iii. 22. Gal. ii. 20. iii. 22, where it is also found with πιστίς. Of course it is implied, that the faith which is reposed in God shall be firm and undoubting, as the words following suggest and illustrate.

25. Στήκω is a late form, found only in the Present, and derived from ἵστημι, the Perf. of ἵστημι. [Comp. Matt. vi. 14. Eph. iv. 32. Col. iii. 13. Eccl. xxviii. 2.]

28. [Comp. Exod. ii. 14. Acts iv. 7. vii. 27.]

32. ἐξ ἀνθρώπων, —ἐφοβοῦντο τὸν λαόν.]

Critics, ancient and modern, alike stumble at this construction, and endeavour to remove the irregularity by various methods, all of them fruitless, and indeed unnecessary; since we have here merely an anacoluthon (frequent in the best writers), by which the Evangelist passes from the very words of the persons spoken of to a sententia of what was said; a sort of idiom similar to that by which there is a transition from the enunciative to the oblique. Thus ἐφοβοῦντο τὸν λαόν is for φοβούμεθα τὸν λαόν, which is found in Matt. xxi. 26. [Comp. supra vi. 20. and Matt. xiv. 5.]

XII. 1. ἐν παραβολαῖς.] Beza rightly regards this as denoting the genus orationis, and is equivalent to παραβόλην; for our Lord probably spoke several, though the Evangelist has recorded only one.

 not seeming properly placed after the former. It seems, however, to have been so introduced, in because they would not yield him subjection: as it is said, 'We will not have this man to reign

— [Comp. Ps. cxviii. 22. Isaiah xxviii. 16.
 Acts iv. 11. Rom. ix. 33. 1 Pet. ii. 7.]

12. Here, as the best Commentators have observed, the members of the verse, if disposed in the logical order, would have stood thus: καὶ ἐξήκοντον αὐτὸν κρατῆσαι· ἐγνώσαν γὰρ ὅτι πρὸς αὐτοὺς τὴν παραβολὴν εἶπε· καὶ (but) ἰφροβ. τὸν ὄχλον· καὶ (adeoque) ἀφέντες αὐτὸν ἀπῆλθον. And Fritz. has exercised no little ingenuity in accounting for the order as thus adopted by St. Mark. The real reason, however, seems to have been that he placed the words in the order in which he found them in St. Luke, and simply added καὶ ἀφέντες ('letting him alone,') αὐτὸν ἀπῆλθον. There will be less harshness in the present order, if the clause ἐγ-γνώσαν—εἶπε be regarded as parenthetical.

 32 λέγων· Ἐγὼ ὁ Θεὸς Ἀβραάμ, καὶ ὁ Θεὸς Ἰσαάκ,

13. ἀγρεύσωσι.] Ἀγρεύειν, like the Heb. קָנָה, properly signifies to make spoil of, catch, take, as said of beasts, birds, and fishes; but as that implies circumvention, so it metaphorically denotes to lay snares for any one, either by words or deeds, and may then be rendered to ensnare.

17. [Comp. Matt. xvii. 25. Rom. xiii. 7.]

18. [Comp. Acts xxiii. 8.]

19. [Comp. Dent. xxv. 5, 6.]

—ἔγραψεν ἡμῖν.] Γράφειν is, both in the Classical and Scriptural writers, used as applied to legislation, and thus denotes to prescribe, enact.

24. οὐ διὰ—Θεοῦ.] The interrogation here implies a strong affirmation.

26. ἐπὶ τῆς Βάτου.] This is usually taken as if there were a transposition, for ὡς εἶπεν αὐτῷ ὁ Θεὸς ἐπὶ τῆς Βάτου. But Wolf, Michaelis, Rosenmüller, and Kuinoel, more properly adopt the view taken by Beza and Jablonski; who regard this as a form of citing Scripture usual in that age, with the Jewish Doctors; namely, of referring to any particular part of the Old Test. by naming some remarkable circumstance therein narrated. Thus the sense will be, 'in the section which treats of the burning bush,' i. e. Exod. ii. 6. So in Rom. xi. 2. ἢ οὐκ οἶδατε ὅτι ἡ Ἐλπίς ἐστὶν ὡς ἡ καταλύσις, or ἐν τῷ καταλύσει. Nay, Theophylact, i. 9. himself refers to Homer ἐν τοῦ Ὀμήρου τῇ Παραδόσει.

With respect to the Article, it is not certain whether τῆς be the true reading, or τοῦ. But although τοῦ is found in many of the best MSS., and is received by Matthæi, Griesbach, and Scholz; yet, as the masculine is employed only by the earlier Classical writers, I have, with Fritz, retained the common reading.

27. Θεὸς ζώντων.] Many MSS., some Versions, with Euthym. and Theophyl., omit Θεός; which is cancelled by Griesb., Fritz., and Scholz.

28. [Comp. Luke x. 25.]

— πασῶν.] Very many MSS. have here, and just after, πάντων; which is preferred by Mill and Bengel, and edited by Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Fritz., and Scholz. But with the idiom, rare even in the Classics, by which, in certain formulas, πάντων, in the neuter, is put in the sense all things (as Thucyd. iv. 52.), it is unlikely that the Evangelist should have been acquainted; and I have seen no example where πάντων is thus brought into immediate concurrence with the Genitive feminine. That, indeed, is generally omitted. Perhaps, as the authority for the former πάντων is greatly superior to that for the latter, St. Mark may have written in this verse πρώτη πάντων ἐντολή; and in the next, πρώτη σου τῶν ἐντολῶν, which the scribes would be likely to alter into πάντων, in order to adapt it to the former passage.

29. Κύριος—ἔστι.] See Deut. vi. 4. x. 12. Luke x. 27. Vitr. and Compb. take the words as forming two sentences. 'The Lord (i. e. Jehovah) is our God: the Lord is one.' But, though the ellipse of the verb substantive be admitted in the Hebrew, yet the idiom of that language will not permit the separation of the words ὦν and ἔστι; and the construction in Greek will as little allow it.

31. ὁμοία αὐτῇ.] See Levit. xix. 18. Luke x. 27. Rom. xiii. 9. Gal. v. 14. James ii. 8. There is here a variation in reading: some MSS. and Versions, with Euthymius and Victor, having ὁμοία αὐτῇ; others, ὁμοία αὐτῆς; others, again, ὁμοία ταύτῃ. The first seems preferable, was approved by Mill and Heupel, and is edited by Fritz. But as the evidence for it is very slight, and as all the varr. lectt. seem to be so many ways of removing the difficulty of the common reading, it ought not to have been received into the text; it was probably derived from St. Matthew. The sense is, 'The second is like (unto it; i. e. in importance); namely, this.' Fritz., indeed, scruples at this absolute use of ὅμοιον; but it is found in the Classical writers; and though it may not occur elsewhere in the Scriptural ones, that might be by accident, especially as it does not often occur any where.

32. καλῶς—εἶπας.] Render: 'Of a truth, Master, thou hast spoken well.' Θεός before εἶς ἐστὶ is not found in a considerable portion of the best MSS., several Versions, and the Edit. Princ. It seems to be from the margin, and is rightly cancelled by Weiststein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, Fritz., and Scholz. Πλὴν αὐτοῦ is omitted in some MSS., but is defended by many Classical passages cited by the Commentators; to which I would add one more opposite than any of them: Aristoph. Plut. 106. οὐ γὰρ ἐστὶν ἄλλος πλὴν ἐγώ. See my Note on Thucyd. ii. 9. No. 5.

33. συνέσεως.] This is not, as Schleusner and Wahl imagine, for ψυχῆς, but for διανοίας.

34. ἰδὼν—ἀπεκρίθη.] Put by attraction for ἰδὼν ὅτι, &c., 'perceiving that he had answered wisely.' Νουνεχῶς is later Greek for νουνεχῶς.

— οὐ μακρὰν—Θεοῦ.] Meaning, that his answer showed him to be well disposed to embrace the Christian faith.

35. πῶς.] This implies strong negation, by a use found also in the Classical writers.

36. τῷ πνεύματι τῷ ἁγίῳ.] See Ps. cx. 1. Acts ii. 34. 1 Cor. xv. 25. Heb. i. 13. The Articles, not found in many of the best MSS. and several early Editions, are cancelled by Griesbach, Matthæi, Tittman, Vater, Fritz., and Scholz; rightly, I think, because the omission is not only confirmed by the Var. lect. in Matt. xxii. 43, but by the context, which, says Bp. Middleton, requires the influence of the Holy Spirit.

I have, just before, with Fritz., edited λέγει, for εἶπεν; for though the direct evidence for it be but slight, yet the indirect is very strong; since (as Fritz. observes) it is found in the parallel passages of Mark and Luke, and is confirmed by the λέγει at ver. 37. I would add, that the λέγει of very numerous MSS. and Editions for εἶπεν, in the next clause (which, therefore, Matthæi, Griesbach, and Scholz receive into the text, though at variance with the Sept. and the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke) is, I doubt not, meant for this; a sort of mistake frequent in all authors. Indeed, propriety would seem to require that λέγειν should be used of a man (as David), and εἶπεν of God, the latter being a more significant and authoritative term. I have here left the references to St. Matthew from Vater; though it should seem that they have no place; and I am of Mr. Greswell's opinion that what is found in Matt. xxiii. 39, was said on another occasion, a little after the words recorded here by Mark, who follows Luke xx. 45—47. Between these, I agree with Mr. Greswell, took place what is related of the offering of the poor widow, Mark xii. 41, 44 and Luke xxi. 1, 4.

38. αὐτοῖς] scil. τοῖς μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ, as it is said in the passage of Luke.

— στολαῖς.] The στολή was an Oriental garment, descending to the ankles, and worn by persons of distinction, as Kings (1 Chron. xv. 27), Priests (3 Eadr. i. 1. v. 81), and honourable persons (see Xen. Cyr. i. 4, 26. ii. 4, 1. Luke xv. 22): and were affected by the Pharisees, especially the Jurists.

40. οἱ κατεσθιόντες, &c.] This is by most Commentators esteemed a solecism; but similar constructions are found in the Classical writers. It is better regarded by some recent Commentators as an example of anacoluthon. Fritz., however, objects to that principle, as unsuitable to the simplicity of construction in the passage; and he would take the whole sentence as exclamatory, 'these devourers! &c., these shall receive, &c.' [Comp. 2 Tim. iii. 6. Tit. i. 11.]

41. It is remarkable that the narration here is much fuller than that at Luke xxi. 1, 4. [See 2 Kings xii. 9.] Χαλκόν, sc. pecuniā.

42. λεπτά.] Supply κέρματα, expressed in Aleiph. Ep. i. 9, or νομίσματα expr. in Pollux Onom. ix. 92. The λεπτόν was a very minute coin, the half of a quadrans, or the eighth of an assarium.

43. πλείον.] i. e. more in proportion to her means. [Comp. 2 Cor. viii. 12.]

44. ἐκ τοῦ περισσεύοντος αὐτοῦ] for ἐκ τοῦ περισσεύματος, which is found in some MSS. here and at Luke, but is doubtless a correction. Τὸν βίον αὐτῆς, 'her means of subsistence;'

of βίος common both in the Classical and Sept.

ποταποὶ λίθοι.] These were indeed in proof of which the Commentators phus, Ant. xv. 11, 3. Bell. v. 5, 6, years that the stones of the temple of them 45 cubits in length, 5 in in breadth. It is strange, however, see that the latter account, as far as dimensions of the stones, makes the seem almost incredible. For it represents only about 25 cubits in length, 8 in about 12 in breadth. It is not so massive length spoken of (for in Bell. phus speaks of the stones of Strato so of them 50 feet long, 9 high, and 10 in disproportion in breadth, which for suspicion. And as this account differs from the other in Josephus, I suspect that for μ' we should read κ', makes the number twenty-five. Thus I.

the two accounts will exactly tally. The exclamation of the Apostles here is illustrated by what Josephus says at Bell. v. 5, 6, namely, that the whole of the exterior of the Temple, both as regarded stones and workmanship, was calculated to excite astonishment (ἐκπληξιῶν). [Comp. 1 Kings ix. 7.]

5. ἤρξατο λέγειν] 'proceeded to say.'

9. βλέπετε ἑαυτούς.] Render, 'Caveat autem vobis, Look to, mind yourselves.' So 2 John ii. 8, βλέπετε ἑαυτούς, compared with Matt. x. 17, προσέχετε ἀπὸ τῶν ἀνθρώπων· παραδώσουσι γὰρ, &c.

11. μελετᾶτε.] Μελετᾶν, in the Classical writers, is used of the fore-thought, study, and elaboration of prepared speeches, in opposition to extemporary oratory. Thus the declamations of the Rhetoricians were called μελεταί. [Comp. Matt. x. 19. Luke xii. 11. Exod. iv. 12. Acts iv. 8.]

22. ἀποπλανᾶν.] A stronger term than πλανᾶν used in Matthew, and signifying literally, 'to make any one wander out of (ἀπο) the way.' It is found in the Sept. and 1 Tim. vi. 10. [Comp. Deut. xiii. 1. 2 Thess. ii. 11.]

All the differences here between the Evangelists is, that Mark is more graphically minute than Matthew and Luke.

St. 4.] This (for the common reading καὶ) is not in most of the ancient MSS., Versions, and others, and is received by almost every Editor as Westein to Scholz. [Comp. Acts i. 7.] St. [Comp. Luke xii. 40. 1 Thess. v. 6.] St. [Comp. ὑπὸ τῷ θυρωρῷ.] It was indeed the duty of a servant to watch, but more particularly of one to whom that office was especially confided; and by the Greeks θυρωρός, and by the Romans liber. See Ovid Fast. i. 137. And what was his duty while his master was present, was doubly during his absence. Hence the case is well fitted to illustrate the duty of Christian watchmen.

habere potest, a signification plainly unsuitable to nard. And to derive the term from πιστός, would lead to a like result. 3. Pisc., H. Steph., Schmid, Schwartz, Heupel, Fischer, Schneider, Schleusner, and Fritz., derive it from πίνειν or πιεῖν; and they take it to mean liquid: but Fritz., potable; and he shows, from some passages of Athenæus, that unguents were sometimes drunk by the ancients. Upon the whole, however, he has better succeeded in proving that the interpretation liquid or potable is probably true, than that the sense, genuine, is certainly false. The catu chresis he complains of will not be fatal to that interpretation; for it may very well be, that Mark here (as occasionally elsewhere) uses a term of the common (Greek dialect); and, as the interpretation is strongly supported by the ancient Versions and Fathers, it may deserve the preference. So Eusebius Apod. i. 9 (cited by Fritz.), calls the Gospel τὸ πιστικὸν τῆς καινῆς διαθήκης κῆρυγμα.

XIV. 1. [Comp. John xi. 53. xiii. 1.] [Comp. Luke vii. 37. John xi. 2.] - πιστικῆς.] With this word the Commentators have been not a little perplexed; and hence their opinions are very various. Besides conjectural alterations, and derivations from some name of π, which are alike inadmissible, there are but no interpretations worthy of notice. 1. That Cameron, Beza, Grotius, Wetstein, and Rommell, who think that πιστικῆς is put, per analogiam, for στικαίου, as supra vii. 4, ἕξουσις magisterio. And this is somewhat confirmed by Valgata Spicula. But there is little other utility for it; and probability is by no means a favour; for why (as Fritz. remarks) should St. Mark have at once used στικαίου, as he often does? 2. Others, as Erasmus, Luth., Vatabl., Saic., Capell., Casaubon, Salmas., G., Le Clerc, Bengel, Kypke, Houm., Kuin., and Wahl, derive the word from πίστις manente, μαντικῆς; from πράξις, πραξις; from κρίσις, κριτικῆς, and take it to be pure, genuine, undiluted. For that was often adulterated, appears from Pliny Diosc., the former of whom mentions a βανδύρα. Fritz., however, objects, that πιστικῆς would be qui fidem vel faciem vel

— καὶ συντρίψασα τὸ ἀλάβ.] Here, again, the Commentators are at issue on the sense of συντρίψασα. Some take it to mean 'having broken it in pieces'; others, 'having shaken it up.' But the former would be unnecessary, and unsuitable to the purpose in view; and the latter interpretation proceeds too much upon hypothesis, and is utterly repugnant to the sense of the word; as is that of others, 'rubbing it in.' The true interpretation is, no doubt, that of Drus., De Dieu, Kreba, Rosenmuller, Kuinoel, Schleusner, Wahl, Bretsch., and Fritz., who take it to mean, 'diffuso officio, alabastrum aperuit.' Συντρίψω was, it seems, used of the opening of flasks of oil or liquid ointment; which was, by knocking off the tip end of the narrow neck, the orifice being so carefully stopped and sealed up, (to preserve the contents), that it scarcely admitted of being opened in any other way. Now this, plainly, might be done without wasting the contents. The above view of the sense is confirmed, by the ancient Versions, which express the general signification 'aperuerunt.'

6. ἐν ἐμοί.] This (for εἰς ἐμὲ) is found in almost all the best MSS. and early Editions; is adopted by Wetstein, and edited by Bengel, Matthæi, Vater, Tittman, Fritz., and Scholz; rightly; for its Hebrew character and greater difficulty attest its genuineness.

7. [Comp. Deut. xv. 11.]

8. ἔσχεν] i. e. ἰδύνατο; a sense of ἔχειν, like that of habere in Latin, common in the Classical writers. There is also to be supplied from the context ποιῆσαι; as in Acts iii. 6, ὃ δὲ ἔχω, (διδόναι) τοῦτο δίδωμι σοι.

— προέλαβε] i. e. προέφθασε, 'anticipated, pre-occupied.' Meaning, 'she hath as it were by anticipation anointed my body for burial.' Of this ἐνταφιαστικὴ sense examples have been adduced from Aristotle and Xenophon.

9. εἰς ὅλον τὸν κόσμον.] Hellenistic Greek for ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ κόσμῳ, which occurs in Rom. i. 8.

12. See Exod. xii. 17. Deut. xvi. 5.

13. ἄνθρωπος.] From the word being opposed to οἰκοδεσπότης in the following verse, and from the servile nature of the occupation it may be inferred that this was a domestic.

— κεράμιον.] The Commentators concur in recognizing here an ellipse of σκεῦος, or ἄγγειον; and they produce examples both of the elliptical and the complete phrase. But the examples of the latter have κεραμεῖον, which is, beyond doubt, an adjective, whereas κεράμιον, as Fritz. above, was always considered as a substantive.

14. κατάλυμα.] See Note on Luke ii. 7.

15. ἀνάγιον.] An upper room, used by the Jews for the same purposes as those to which our dining-rooms and parlours are applied. Griesbach, Fritz., and Scholz edit, from all the best MSS., instead of the vulg. ἀνάγιον. The MSS. here, as in the other passages of the New Test., where the word occurs, fluctuate between ἀνάγιον, ἀνάγιον, and ἀνάγιον. The first and third are both good, but as the third was the Attic form, so the other was the common or ordinary one; and therefore, especially as MS. authority is so strongly in its favour, is to be preferred in the New Test. The second from ἀνάγιον is too unsupported by MSS. to deserve attention. Whatever be the orthography, the term was synonymous with ὕπναιον, and denoted that upper apartment, not in common use, but kept as a withdrawing room for prayer and meditation, and also as a guest apartment for entertaining company. Ἐστρωμένον has a reference to the preparation of beds, cushions, carpets, pillows, stools, &c., such as, among the Oriental nations, supply the place of chairs, tables, and indeed almost all the other furniture of a room.

36. [Comp. Gal. iv. 6. John vi. 38.]

— Ἀββᾶ ὁ Πατήρ.] There has been no little difference of opinion as to the reason for this seeming pleonasm, and the exact force of the idiom. The ancient Greek Interpreters, several early modern ones (as Beza and Lightfoot), and most of the later Commentators (as Newcome, Campbell, Wakefield, Fisch, Schlousner, Rosenmuller, and Kuinoel), think that ὁ Πατήρ is added, agreeably to a custom by which the Jews used to call a person or thing by two names, one Hebrew and the other Greek. But I rather agree with others (as Fritz.), that the latter is an interpretation or explication of the former, as in Rom. viii. 15. Gal. iv. 6. As to Ἀββᾶ, it is (as Fritz. observes) used agreeably to the custom (found even in the Lord's prayer) of commencing precatory addresses to the Deity with the word Father.

38. [Comp. Gal. v. 17.]

41. ἀπέχει.] Of the various interpretations of this disputed term, there are only two which have any claim to attention. 1. That of most of the recent Commentators, absent, i. e. transiit animi mei aeger. But this is liable to insuperable objections, both Grammatical and others. 2. That of Luther, Beza, H. Steph., Hammond, Gail, Raphael, Heupel, and Fritz., 'sufficit,' it is enough, q. d. 'I no longer need your vigils.' This is strongly confirmed by the ancient Versions, and the Glosses of the Scholiasts, and yet more by the ἰκανὸν ἐστὶ of Luke. And although the sense be rare, yet there have been two other examples adduced; one from Anacreon, xxviii. 3. ἀπέχει· βλέπω γὰρ αὐτήν, and another from Cyril. Thus ἀπέχει is an impersonal, and to be taken, as the simple ἴσχει and many of its compounds frequently are, in a neuter sense.

43. [Comp. John xviii. 3.]

44. σύσσημον.] An Alexandrian term for the Attic σημίον. Meaning, lit., a token or signal, agreed upon with (συν) others. Αὐτὸς is for οὗτος, by an Hellenistic use, often found in the New Test.

— ἀσφαλῶς.] This is not (as some Commentators imagine) to be taken with κρατῆσαν, and rendered sine periculo; but with ἀπαγάγετε, and rendered 'secure ac diligenter.' So in Acts xvi. 26, the jailor is ordered ἀσφαλῶς τηρεῖν.

45. [Comp. 2 Sam. xx. 9.]

47. εἰς δέ τις.] The expression εἰς τὴν is generally used of one whose name we know not, ἐπαίσει τὸν δούλον τοῦ ἀρχιερέως, καὶ ἀφείλεν αὐτοῦ τὸ

 8 ὠτίον. Καὶ ἀποκριθεὶς ὁ Ἰησοῦς εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Ὡς ἐπὶ 55 52

 9 Καθ' ἡμέραν ἤμην πρὸς ὑμᾶς ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ διδάσκων, καὶ οὐκ 53
 10 ἐκρατήσατέ με· ἀλλ' ἵνα πληρωθῶσιν αἱ γραφαί. Καὶ

 58 δομαρτύρουν κατ' αὐτοῦ, λέγοντες· Ὅτι ἡμεῖς ἠκούσαμεν 61

we do not care to mention. The reason for suppressing the name here is obvious. That for using the same indefinite expression further on, at verso 61, seems to have been from the Evangelist not knowing the person's name. For, though many conjectures thereupon have been hazarded, yet not one of them has even probability to recommend it, except this,—that he was a young man of the Roman soldiery; especially as again, in this very verse, the Article points to a particular part of the company; which could only have been the soldiery.

49. [Comp. Ps. xxii. 6. lxix. 10. Is. liii. 12.]

50. [Comp. Job xix. 13. Ps. lxxxviii. 8.]

51. σινδόνα.] See Note on Matt. xxvii. 59.
 The sense, however, is here somewhat different.
 For as the word primarily denoted a web of cloth, so it came to mean a wrapper, denoting properly a kind of cloak, like the Scotch plaid, and still in use in the East, but also an upper garment, such as was used for a night-gown; of which Wetstein adduces examples from Herodotus and Galen. And this is doubtless the sense here.

— ἐπὶ γυμνοῦ.] Almost all Commentators suppose an ellipse of σώματος. But Fritz. would take it as a Genitive of the nelder noun, τὸ γυμνόν, the naked body. That, however, would require the Article, and the existence of the word must not be admitted without some authority more valid than the use of τὰ γυμνά, 'the unprotected parts of the body;' for in that expression there is an ellipse of μέρη as well as of τοῦ σώματος.
 The phrase is plainly for ἐπὶ τοῦ γυμνοῦ τοῦ σώματος, and the very elliptical form it assumes, shows that it was much in use; probably in the phraseology of common life.

— οἱ νεανίσκοι.] This, by the force of the Article, must denote the Roman soldiers just mentioned. Examples are adduced by Rosenmuller and Kuinoel of this sense in Greek, and also of juveniles and adolescentes in Latin. Nay, it even extends to the Hebrew.

52. γυμνός.] So Galen: μὴ γυμνὸς κομιζίσθω, ἀλλὰ περιβεβλημένος σινδόνα.

53. [Comp. John xviii. 13, 24.]

54. πρὸς τὸ φῶς] for πρὸς τὸ πῦρ. This has been proved to be a Hebraism, such as often occurs in the Sept., and corresponds to לפני. For though the purity of the Greek has been maintained by many Commentators, yet they only adduce passages where the word signifies fulgor, rather than ignis; or, in one or two instances, a blaze, such as arises from ignited wood. Thus, by a metonymy of effect for cause, φῶς, is transferred to all objects which emit light, though it may be accompanied with heat likewise.

55. [Comp. Acts vi. 13.]

56. ἴσαι.] The sense of this expression has been somewhat disputed. By the ancient Versions and most early modern Commentators, it is taken to mean convenientes, 'such as tally.' So E. V.,
 'agreed not together;' while Erasmus, Grotius, Hammond, Whitby, Heupel, and Campbell, render it 'non idonea erant,' 'were insufficient to establish the charges against him.' But, as Beza and Fritz. observe, the usus loquendi will not permit this sense; and the difficulty, which drove the above Commentators to adopt so forced an interpretation, is really by no means formidable:
 see Rorens. Synop. Lightfoot observes, that the Jewish Canon divided testimonies into three kinds; 1. a vain or discordant testimony; 2. a standing or presumptive testimony; 3. an even consistent testimony; the one here meant.

58. χειροποιήτων] i. e. 'the work of man.' This was added (says Grotius) lest Christ should seem to have spoken parabolically. Of the word χειροποιήτων examples are adduced by Wetstein, to which may be added a passage of Thucyd. ii. 77, where φλογε χειροποιήτη is opposed to ἀπὸ ταυτομάτου πυρ. Our Lord alluded to Is. xvi. 12. See Note on Acts vii. 48, and compare infra xv. 29. John ii. 19.

65. προφῆτευσον.] Namely, as is expressed in the passage of Matthew, τίς ἴστω σοι. [Comp. Job xvi. 10, 11. Is. i. 63. xviii. 16, 17.]

68. οὐκ—λέγεις.] In οὐκ οἶδα σὺ μαρτυροῦσιν, if there be a stress laid upon ἐπί with Matthew, Gr. Gr. § 233, regard is to be had to the Mid. voice of ἐπίστημι, with the σαι of τῶν νοῦν, in which the Ionic form q. d. 'Nor do I comprehend it.' B rather seem that the two verbs are strengthened the sense; which is, 'I know whatever;' as 'non novi neque scio.'

70. ὁμοιάζει] i. e. 'is like the ὁμοῖα of the Galileans,' which was broad and gr. this word I know no other example; compounds παρομοίωσις and προσομοίωσις. See later writers. It indeed was not exactly being supplied by ὁμοίωσις.

[2. πρὶν ἀλέκτορα φωνῆσαι, &c.] This syntax of πρὶν with the Indicative is found also in Luke xii. 61. John iv. 49. viii. 58. xiv. 30; but is rare in the Classical writers. It occurs in Josephus, Ant. xix. 1, 2.

— ἐπιβαλὼν.] With this word the Commentators have been exceedingly perplexed. Many, ancient and modern, take ἐπιβαλ. in the sense beating; and regard ἐπιβαλὼν ἑκλαιε as standing for ελαίειν ἐπιβαλε, either in the sense 'began to weep,' or 'proceeded to weep,' as in Acts xi. 4, ἀρξάμενος—ἐξετίθειτο for ᾗρξατο—ἐκτίθεναι. That passage, however, has quite another sense. Besides, though the above signification of ἐπιβάλλειν does exist in the later writers, yet of the hyperbole in these words no example has been adduced. Moreover, the sense is so jejune, that, although it is supported by most of the ancient Versions, it cannot well be admitted. In fact, there should seem rather to be an ellipsis,—though to determine with certainty what was originally the plena locutio, is perhaps impossible; some would take ἐπιβαλὼν to mean, 'having rushed out of doors'; a sense not unsuitable, and supported by the parallel passages. Yet such a sig-nification of ἐπιβάλλειν has never been established, the passages cited being not to the purpose.
 There seems little doubt but that the truth lies with one or other of the two following interpretations. 1. That of Casaubon, Bois, Heupel, Kypke, Wetschin, Koecher, Campbell, and others, 'having reflected thereon;' which is a very suitable sense. And abundant examples are adduced, both of the complete phrase ἐπιβάλλειν τὸν νοῦν, and also of the elliptical ones. Yet, Fritz remarks, the latter is only found where the context suggests the notion of attention; which is not the case here. He, therefore, after a minute discussion of the merits of all the interpretations, decides in favour of that of Chrysostom, Theo-phylact, and other Greek Fathers, and to which several eminent modern Commentators have inclined (as Salmas., Suic., Elsnor, Heum., Krebs, and Fischer), by which ἐπιβαλὼν is taken as equivalent to ἐπικαλυψάμενος, 'having covered his head (with his vest).' But here, again, decisive authority is wanting; for, though the complete phrase ἐπιβάλλειν ἑαυτοῦ is very frequent, yet not one example has been adduced of the elliptical one, ἡ. α. τιμῇ, not even of ἐπιβάλλειν ἑαυτοῦ τῇ κεφαλῇ. To this, indeed, Fritz answers, that, from the great frequency of the phrase, no additional word was necessary to decide the sense; which is, he remarks, the case with other terms, as ὑποδιδάσκμενος and περιβόημένος. That the action is suitable to extreme grief none can doubt; and that it was in use among the ancients is proved by a cloud of examples. Yet to understand it here, would be not a little harsh; and therefore I would decide in favour of the former interpretation, as being recommended by its greater simplicity.

11. ἀνέσπεισαν] 'instigated.' Some MSS. have ἀνέπεισαν, and others ἐσπεισαν. The one is a gloss, and the other derived from the parallel passage of Matthew. The common reading, which is a stronger term, is confirmed by Luke xxiii. 5, and this use of the word, by the examples produced from Diod. Sic. by Elsner and Munthe, to which may be added Eurip. Orest. 612, and Dionys. Hal. Antiq. viii. 81.

— ἵνα μᾶλλον τὸν Β. for ἵνα μὴ τὸν Ἰησοῦν, ἀλλὰ μᾶλλον τ. Β. [Comp. Acts iii. 14.]

14. τί γὰρ κακόν.] The γὰρ refers to a clause suppressed, 'Why should I crucify him, for,' &c.

15. τῷ ὄχλῳ τὸ ἱκανὸν ποιῆσαι] 'to satisfy the wishes of the people,' or, as Grotius explains it, agreeably to the usage of salis facere in Latin writers, 'to remove all causes of complaint on their part.' [Comp. John xix. 1, 16.]

16. [Comp. John xix. 1.]

19. τιθέντες τὰ γόνατα] scil. eis τὴν γῆν; for γονυκτιθέσθαι, which is used by Matthew. The phrase signifies 'to place the knees (i.e. on the ground).' The sense is, 'on bended knees.'

21. Ἀλεξ. καὶ Ρ.] Persons probably well known, and then living at Rome; since Paul, Rom. xvi. 13, salutes Rufus there.

22. [Comp. John xix. 17.]

23. ἔσμυρνισμένον οἶνον.] See Note on Matt. xvii. 34.

24. διαμερίζονται.] This (for διαιρίζον) is found in nearly all the best MSS., and is adopted by every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz. It is, indeed, not only required by the lingua propria, but is confirmed by the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke. [Comp. Ps. xxii. 18. John xix. 23.]

25. ἦν δὲ ὥρα τρίτη καὶ ἐσταύρωσαν αὐτόν. Καὶ, when. A signification which takes place after words signifying time. So Hom. Od. 8. 262. τέτρατον ἡμᾶρ ἔην, καὶ τῷ τετιόσμεν ἅπαντα. Thucyd. i. 50. ἥδη δὲ ἦν ὥρα, καὶ ἡ Κορ., &c. A difficulty is here started by some Commentators, namely, that the crucifixion is twice described by Mark as taking place. To avoid which, some would take the καὶ for ἐξ ὧ. But that signification is quite unauthorised. Others endeavour to remove the difficulty by a change of punctuation. Which, however, involves most harsh construction. It is better, with others, to take ἐσταύρωσαν as an Aorist with a Pluperfect sense (on which use see Winer's Gr. Gr.), thus: 'It was the third hour when they had crucified him.' Even this, however, is unnecessary, if σταυρώσαντες in the preceding verse be taken in a present sense (and indeed the Cod. Vaticanus has the present tense), thus: 'And on proceeding to crucify him, they divided his garments.' Now this indicates the commencement of action, namely, the stripping of our Lord. The next verse denotes the completion of action, and therefore fixes the time when it took place.

tween Mark and John xix. 14. as to the hour of the crucifixion, although such discrepancies 'are (as Fritz observes) rather to be patiently borne than removed by rash methods,' yet here we are, it should seem, not reduced to any great straits. For though the mode of reconciling the two accounts by a sort of management is not to be commended; yet surely, when we have the testimony of several of the ancient Fathers, that an early corruption of number in one of these two passages had taken place, by a confusion of the ς with τ, we cannot hesitate to adopt so simple and natural a mode of removing the discrepancy. Thus the true reading is ς (i. e. τρίτη), which, indeed, is found in seven of the best MSS., several Fathers and Scholastic, and also Nonnus.

32. [Comp. John xix. 19.]
 33. [Comp. Ia. liii. 12. Luke xxii. 37.] This use is marked for omission by Griesbach, and recalled by Fritz.; but injudiciously: for there is no reason why so remarkable a fulfilment of prophecy, mentioned by the other Evangelists, could not also be recorded by Mark. Besides, a number of MSS. in which it is omitted is so comparatively small, that it is very probable it is inadvertently passed over by the scribes.
 38. εὐά. An interjection of derision and insult, as the Latin ueh, and our ho! oh! ah-ah!

which, however, are used, like all interjections, with much latitude of signification, and are adapted to express most of the violent emotions. [Comp. Ps. xxii. 7. lxix. 20. supra xiv. 58. John ii. 19.]

31. δᾶ. This is absent from many good MSS., and is cancelled by almost all recent Editors.

36. καθελεῖν. A vox solennis de hac re,—like the Latin refigere. See my Note on Thucyd. ii. 14. [Comp. Ps. lxix. 22. John xix. 29.]

37. ἀφίει φωνὴν μεγ. Φωνὴν ἀφίειν signifies to send forth a voice, whether articulate or inarticulate. See Note on Matt. xxvii. 50. [Comp. John xix. 30.]

39. ὅτι οὕτω κράζας. This does not mean (as many explain) 'that he had cried with such a loud voice;' nor 'that the Centurion felt wonder at his being so soon released from his torments;' but that, on hearing such words as those at ver. 34, pronounced, as it were, from the bottom of the heart, by the crucified person,—and that he should, so immediately afterwards, be released from his torments,—the Centurion thence felt assured that he was not only a righteous person, but had the character which he claimed; namely, that of being ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ: on the force of which expression, see Note on Matt. xxvii. 54.

40. [Comp. Ps. xxxviii. 11.]

41. [Comp. Luke viii. 2, 3.]

42. προσάββατον.] A very rare word, only occurring elsewhere in Judith viii. 6; by which, as he was writing for Gentiles, Mark explains the Jewish sense of παρασκευή; meaning thereby the time that preceded the commencement of the Sabbath, which began at the sunset of Friday. [Comp. John xix. 38.]

43. εὐσχήμων] 'respectable, honourable.' The word properly signifies of good presence, then decorous, dignified, respectable, &c. It is never used in this sense by the Classical writers; but is so employed by Joseph. de Vita 9. ἀνδρῶν εὐσχημόνων. By βουλευτῆς is meant, if not one of the Sanhedrim, at least one of the council of the High Priest. See Note on Matthew.

—ἐλθὼν.] This, for the common reading ἦλθεν, is found in many of the best MSS. and some Versions and Fathers, and was edited by Matth., Fritz., and Lachman; rightly, I think: since the common reading, as Fritz. observes, involves an intolerable Asyndeton; and for the addition of καὶ before τολμήσας, which would make all right, there is very little authority: indeed it was doubtless an emendation of the Critics. Fritz. thinks that ἦλθεν partly arose from Matt. xxvii. 57, and partly from the Greek Interpreters (as we find from Euthymius) terminating the sentence at Θεοῦ; and, having changed ἐλθὼν into ἦλθεν, then added καὶ before τολμ. Thus τολμήσας will be taken for the adverb τολμῶς; just as τολμῶντες is taken for τολμηροί in Thucyd. ii. 43. and Eurip. Phœn. 277. However, I would not venture to deny that it is possible ἐλθὼν may be the emendation, and ἦλθεν the original reading. But then the καὶ before τολμ. would be indispensable. And as we must, in either case, take what may have proceeded from emendation, it seems proper to give the preference to number and excellence of MSS.

—ὅς καὶ αὐτὸς ἦν προσδ. τὴν βασ., &c.] Here προσδ. has the same sense as at Luke i. 25; and the expectation is to be understood of an expectation of the Messiah, in the person of Jesus; the sense here intended to be expressed being nearly equivalent to the μαθητῆσαι τῷ Ἰησοῦ of Matthew, and the μαθητὴς ὢν τοῦ Ἰησοῦ of John. In εἰσῆλθε there is a sensus prægnans; the meaning being, as Fritz. renders, 'introiit in prætorium, et ad Pilatum accessit.' So Dig. Lactr. vi. 6. μαθὼν δὲ ὁ Κράτης εἰσῆλθε πρὸς αὐτόν.

44. ἐθαύμασεν εἰ.] Beza and others wrongly render the εἰ by an, as if there were a doubt; whereas εἰ is used with θαυμάζειν, as the Latin si with mirari (indeed with all verbs of wonder), to express what is not doubted, but wondered at. Thus the εἰ is for ἔτι, and we may render, 'wondered that he was already dead [so soon]'. So Xenoph. Mem. i. 1, 13. cited by Schleusner, ἐθαύμαζε δὲ, εἰ μὴ φανερόν αὐτοῖς ἐστίν. To which add Joseph. Bell. i. 25. 1. θαυμάζω δὲ—εἰ ἔτι μέχρι νῦν 'A. where the same mistake is made by the Translators, notwithstanding that the words following demand εἰ to be taken for ἔτι. Thus we may here render, 'that he were already dead!' The πάλαι is wrongly rendered in E.V. 'long.' There is, indeed, merely a repetition of the foregoing question, with the adoption of a more precise term, the sense being already.

45. μνημείον ὃ ἦν, &c.] Comp. Matt. xii. 40. xxvi. 12. John xix. 41. Wolf, Salmas, Kruis, Schleusner, and others are mistaken in taking these words to mean a monument constructed of hewn and polished stone, since, as appears from Matt. xxvii. 60, ὃ ἐλατόμησεν ἐν τῇ πέτρᾳ, it was merely a cave hewn out in the rock; that being the custom of the country, and of most of the Eastern nations.

—Θύραν.] Not 'door,' but 'entrance.'

[ἡ γὰρ ἀφ' ὧν.] The Commentators of a little perplexed with this clause, cannot be referred to what immediately follows to remove this difficulty, some would take the sense of ὅτι. But it is better, to suppose that the words have reference to the clause which immediately precedes the one before that, τίς—μυμνήσκου; these words being regarded as parenthetical the construction at καὶ ἀναβλέψας not admit of the parenthesis; and καὶ really remains in its full force; and is impossible to remove it, except by the words, as is done by Newcome and. But for that there is little cause to think that the γὰρ has some clause omitted; not, indeed, Whitty, Grotius, and Rosenmuller, suppose, 'and this happened luckily for them;' but to something which may be supplied from both the preceding sentences, thus: '[And well might they say, Who will roll, &c., and behold, doubtless with surprise, its removal;] for it was very great.'

5. [Comp. John xx. 12.]

7. τοῖς μαθηταῖς α.] Many recent Commentators understand, by this expression, Christ's followers in general. But the older ones (and lately Fritz.) seem right in taking it to denote the Apostles, by a frequent figure of speech, whereby a part is put for the whole.

The kai just after may be rendered 'and' (especially), for kai μάλιστα; a signification often occurring in the Classical writers, from Homer downwards. On the reason why Peter is here named, the Commentators differ in opinion; though they are in general agreed that it was not from any pre-eminence which he had over the rest of the Apostles. The several reasons they assign may perhaps be conjoined. Peter was, it seems, especially named, both for his consolation and assurance, and also from the permanent regard which his singular affection towards his Master had created. See supra xiv. 28. Matt. xxvi. 32. Acts i. 3. xiii. 31. 1 Cor. xv. 5.

8. ταχύ.] This is omitted in most of the best MSS., and is cancelled by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz. It was, no doubt, introduced from Matt. xxviii. 8. The words οὐδὲν οὐδὲν εἶπον must (as appears from the ἐφοβούντο just after) be understood of the time during their return, or shortly after, and of the persons whom they might then meet with. (Comp. John xx 18)

8. εἶχε δὲ αὐτὰς 'possessed them.' So Hom. II. σ. 247. πάντας γὰρ εἶχε τρόμος. The δὲ is used as at Matt. xii. 6.

add that Scholz., after all his extensive researches, has never been able to find this portion omitted in more than one MS. (and that, one in which great liberties have been taken) and a single Version.

— ἀφ' ἧς ἐκβ. ἐπτα δαιμόνια] with reference to supra viii. 2. Many of the recent foreign Commentators stumble at the ἐπτα. But it has no difficulty, except to those who adopt Mede's hypothesis with respect to the Demoniaci. Why should not this poor wretch have been possessed with seven devils, as well as another was with a legion? i. e. very many. In continuation of the narrative, bring in John xx. 11—18.

12. ἐν ἑτέρᾳ μορφῇ.] Some interpret μορφῇ of dress; but the authority for that signification is very slender. Others, more properly, understand by it visage and general appearance. Whatever the alteration in appearance might be, it was such as also to prevent our Lord's being immediately recognised by the two disciples who were going into the country. See Luke xxiv. 13.

13. οὐδὲ ἐκείνοις ἐπίστευσαν.] This seems to be at variance with Luke xxiv. 34, where it is said, that before they approached, Jesus had appeared to Simon, and that he had related it to the assembly. For even this they had not fully credited; nay, even when Jesus had come up, they, as Luke testifies, yet disbelieved. All this, however, tends to make us repose a firmer confidence in the testimony of those who themselves so slowly and cautiously admitted belief. (Grotius.) In the passage of Luke, the Apostles and Disciples are indeed spoken of, but λαλοῦντες does not denote all the Apostles and Disciples gathered together, but only some of them. Passages of this sort, in which what seems spoken of all is to be understood only of some, are not unfrequent in the New Test. There is therefore no discrepancy between Mark and Luke. Some of the assembly (as Luke tells us) believed that Jesus had returned to life: the rest denied implicit credit to the narrations concerning that event. Hence even when Jesus appeared to them, they fancied they saw a phantasm; from all which we may conclude that they were by no means credulous. (Kuinoel.)

14—18. This passage is apparently so connected with the preceding matter as to render it highly probable, at least, that the occurrence took place in a private house in or near Jerusalem, on the very evening of our Lord's resurrection, and was that of which we have other relations in John xx. 19, 23, and Luke xxiv. 36, 49. See Smith's Scrip. Test. II. 207. Gresswell places in juxtaposition John xx. 26, 29. Ver. 15 is, in Gresswell, introduced by Luke xxiv. 50, ἐξῆγγαγε δὲ αὐτοὺς εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν.

15. πάσῃ τῇ κτίσει] i. e. to all human creatures, both Jews and Gentiles, to all nations, as Matthew expresses it.

16. ὁ πιστεύσας—κατακριθήσεται.] By comparing this with the commission given the Apostles, Matt. xxviii. 20, and Luke xxiv. 47, it is plain that not only faith, but repentance, and obedience were to be preached in the name of Christ, —the sense being, that he who by true and lively faith embraces Christianity, and engages, in baptism, to obey its injunctions, and faithfully fulfil his engagements, shall obtain everlasting salvation. With respect to κατακριθήσεται, whether it be rendered 'damned' or 'condemned' (a point which has been disputed; and assuredly the word is very susceptible of the latter version), matters but little as to the ultimate sense; since, upon the lowest meaning that has been affixed to υθῆσεται (namely, the being put into a state of reprobation), the contrary cannot but imply a state of present reprobation; which, if continued in, must assuredly terminate in perdition: and the condemnation, to take place at the day of Judgment, cannot but imply the being consigned to the curse, and the eternal woe consequent upon it. By 'not believing,' is meant either obstinately refusing assent to the evidence of the truth of the Gospel, however satisfactory; or not so believing the Gospel as to obey it, and thus holding the truth in unrighteousness. In the former case, he who believeth not must be condemned to eternal misery, because he rejects the only means whereby he can be saved. Reason, however, requires us to limit the denunciation here to unfalsified disbelief, and not extend it to involuntary; as is shown by Dr. Campbell and Bp. Maltby, cited by me in Recesses. &c. And that the deductions of reason are confirmed by the word of God, is plain from John iii. 18, compared with verse 36.

17. σημεῖα δὲ, &c.] [Comp. Luke x. 17. Acts v. 16. viii. 7. xvi. 18. ii. 4. x. 46. 1 Cor. xii. 10, 28.] On the several particulars of our Lord's promise, so as to show their full force and exact fulfilment, much valuable matter may be found in Recens. Synop. The exercise of the first gift, namely, the casting out of devils, is proved by the early Fathers, Justin Martyr, Clemens Alex., Origen, Irenæus, Tertullian, &c. Of the second, namely, speaking with new tongues, which must be understood, in its full sense, of the miraculous communication of the faculty of speaking with tongues never previously learned (on which I have copiously treated in the Note at Acts ii. 4.), we have abundant proof, both from Scripture and the testimonies of the earliest Fathers. The same may be said of the next two particulars, the 'taking up of serpents,' and the 'drinking of poison without injury.' The former was in that age regarded as a decisive test of supernatural protection; (though we find that this power, like all others, was sometimes pretended to by impostors;) and the latter faculty would (as Doddridge truly observes) be especially necessary in an age when the art of poisoning was brought to such cursed refinement. As to the fifth particular, healing the sick supernaturally, the Scriptures and early Ecclesiastical writers are full of examples. Upon the whole, there is abundant evidence for the fulfilment of all the promises which the above expressions, in their plain and full sense, imply; and for their chief purposes, namely of miraculous attestation to the Divine mission of those to whom they were made, and of supernatural protection to them under all the evils, which they should have to encounter in the exercise of their ministry.

ΤΟ ΚΑΤΑ ΛΟΥΚΑΝ ΕΥΑΓΓΕΛΙΟΝ.

Ι. ἘΠΕΙΔΗΠΕΡ πολλοὶ ἐπεχείρησαν ἀνατάξασθαι ἰ γῆσιν περὶ τῶν πεπληροφορημένων ἐν ἡμῖν πραγμάτων

Of this Evangelist (as of the preceding) little is known with certainty, except from the New Testament. For as to the traditions of the early Fathers, they are few and unimportant; and those of the later ones merit little attention. It is the opinion of some (including the early Fathers and the older Commentators in general) that Luke was a Jew; but this rests on no sufficient evidence. Others (including many recent Expositors) suppose him to have been descended from Gentile parents; but in his youth to have embraced Judaism, from which he had been converted to Christianity. Yet as there is great reason to think that Luke was but a very young man when converted to Christianity, it is little likely that he should, before that time, have passed from Gentilism to Judaism. The truth here probably lies mid-way; and we may suppose him to have been (like Timothy) partly of Gentile and partly of Jewish extraction; his father being a Gentile, his mother a Jewess. And this will account for the two principal characteristics of his writings.—accurate knowledge of the Jewish religion, and no inconsiderable power of Greek composition. That he should be so far a Jew, is not at all inconsistent with his bearing a Greek name, which he would derive from his father. There is, I apprehend, nothing in the New Test. which militates against this hypothesis (by which all seeming discrepancies are reconciled), but much to confirm it; for surely he was more likely to be reckoned among Jews (see Acts xxi. 27, compared with xxi. 15, 17.), if he were Jew-born by the mother's side, and brought up a Jew, than if he had been merely a proselyte from Gentilism. As to the argument founded on Col. iv. 11, 14, it is by no means cogent; since the opposition there supposed between Aristarchus, Marcus, and Justus, and Luke and Demas, cannot be shown to exist.

The first mention of Luke in the New Test. is at Acts xvi. 10, 11, where he is said to have been with Paul at Troas; from whence he attended him to Jerusalem, and having continued with him in his troubles, accompanied him on his voyage from Caesarea to Rome, and staid with him during his two years' confinement there. The time of St. Luke's death is not ascertainable from any precise information. We only know that it was after that of St. Peter and St. Paul. It is closely connected another question; date of his Gospel; which has been considered large in the introduction to St. Mark's.

Of its genuineness and authenticity there never been any doubt; since it is quoted by various writers, in an unbroken chain from the Apostolical Fathers down to Chrysostom. To its Canonical authority (as well as that of St. Mark's Gospel), have been made by Michaelis. These have been satisfactorily answered, e.g. Prof. Alexander (of America) on the New Test., p. 202, 210. And as to the authenticity of the first two chapters, which has recently called in question by those who of the miraculous conception of Christ, say, that those chapters are found in all of the Gospel of which we have any knowledge and in all the Versions. And to this external evidence may be added internal of the strongest kind; for while there is no reason imaginable against the chapters, the strongest reason to suppose them spurious since the first is connected with the second the second with the third, in exactly manner as the first and second chapters thew are connected with the third. So that even Paulus now admits that the hypothesis of their not being genuine, is utterly groundless though he rashly endeavours to account whole of what happened to Zechariah on logical principles; but in vain.

That this Gospel was written for the Gentile converts, is plain from the content confirmed by the unanimous voice of the Fathers. And as St. Mark's Gospel was intended fit of the Gentile Christians and Hellenists West, so it should seem this was meant instruction of those of the East,—namely, Asia Minor, and the islands.

The distinguishing feature of this Gospel compared with the two preceding, is, that those relate the facts they record chronologically; this narrates them according to a class of the events of our Saviour's life and actions pursued by Classical writers of the genre, as Livy, Sueton., Florus, and, to

1 καθὼς παρέδωσαν ἡμῖν οἱ ἀπ' ἀρχῆς αὐτόπται καὶ ὑπηρέται
 1 γινόμενοι τοῦ λόγου. 2 ἔδοξε κάμοι, παρηκολουθηκότι ἄνωθεν

gree, Plutarch in his Lives. According to this, the I. contains the narration of the birth of Christ, introduced by the circumstances that preceded, accompanied, or followed it, ch. i. ii. 1, 4. The II. comprehends the particulars respecting infancy and youth, ch. ii. 41, 52. Class III. comprises the preaching of John and the baptism of Christ, with his genealogy, ch. iii. Class IV. comprehends the discourses, miracles, and actions of Christ during the whole of his ministry, ch. iv. ix. 50. Class V. contains an account of our Lord's last journey to Jerusalem, together with every thing relative to his passion, death, resurrection, and ascension, ch. ix. 51, 60. x. xiv.

The style of this Gospel is purer and more fluent than that of the others: there is more of the simplicity of composition, and a greater approach to the regularity of the Classical historians or biographers, as especially shown in the writer's commendation of his own judgment with the events which he relates, see vi. 11, 16. xi. 53. iii. 20. In recording the moral instructions given by our Lord, especially in the Parables, he is surpassed by no other writer for simplicity and pathos. One peculiarity in his writings has been remarked, which is deserving of especial attention—namely, that as Dr. Campbell says) 'while each of the Evangelists has a number of words used by none but himself, in St. Luke's Gospel the number of such words is greater than that of all the others put together; and in the Acts far more.' For further information on the same subject the reader is referred to Schleiermacher's Critical Essay on the Gospel of St. Luke, and Bp. Cleaver's Discourse on the style of St. Luke's Gospel.

1. 1. ἐπιδήμιον πολλοί—διήγησιν.] In a similar manner Justin commences his history: 'Cum multi ex Romanis—res Græco peregrinoque sermone contulissent,' &c. 'It is,' as Weistein observes, 'not surprising that the minds of men (strongly excited as they were by the mighty moral revolution which had taken place) should have been deeply interested about the origin and nature of a religion so new in its character, and promulgated in a manner so widely different from all that had preceded it.'

The persons meant by these many has been much discussed; but it is agreed that the writers of the Gospels of Matthew and Mark could not be intended to be included in those writings; Matthew using one τῶν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς αὐτόπται; and Mark having probably not yet written his Gospel. Equally certain is it that we are not to understand the Apocryphal Gospels, since very few, if any, of these can be proved to have been so early in being. The narrations in question were probably the compositions of pious and well-meaning persons: but, as we may infer, without the necessary information or qualifications for writing a Gospel history. Hence their accounts were not intentionally false, but necessarily erroneous and defective. And some of these probably formed the foundation of the Apocryphal Gospels. That they were in the degree defective, or erroneous, seems implied in the very circumstance, of the Evangelist's shrinking to supply Theophilus with more certain information. For, as to the use of the term ἐπιχειρεῖν (on which the ancient and some modern Commentators have laid so much stress), it will not of itself supply any such inference; the word merely signifying, 'to undertake any thing,' whether the attempt be accomplished, or fail: and therefore, as the Evangelist certainly means not to speak invidiously of the compositions in question, we may, with the most eminent modern Commentators, suppose that there is no reference to either success or failure.

Ἀνατάσσεσθαι is not to be understood of rearranging what is already written. For the sense of repetition in the word, though frequent, is not perpetual. Nor need we, with some, suppose that the preposition here loses its proper force. It is better to take it to denote, not indeed repetition, but succession, as of one thing after another, which implies setting in order. Thus ἀνατάσσεσθαι will be equivalent to συντάσσεσθαι; and that, in a figurative sense, may very well denote consequence, consequence.

—πεπληροφορημένον.] Πληροφορία signifies 1. to carry a full measure, to be full, or to make full; 2. to make fully certain, give full assurance; either as spoken 1st, of persons or 2dly, (as here and in 2 Tim. iv. 17.), of things; which are thus said to be fully confirmed and established, and are therefore received as certain truths, with full assurance of faith. Accordingly, the expression is nearly equivalent to πεπιστευμένον, as at Josephus, Ant. xvii. 6, 3.

2. καθὼς παρέδωσαν ἡμῖν.] Some difficulty attaches to these words; for if they be referred, as is done by most Interpreters, to the narratives before mentioned, there would seem to be no reason why the writer should have undertaken a work which would appear to be superfluous; the information in those being supplied by persons so well qualified to communicate it. But though the reference be such, according to the construction, it is certainly not according to the meaning intended, which would have required not ἡμῖν, but αὐτοῖς. What, then, is the real reference? Shall we, with Capell and others, suppose it to be the present Gospel? thus recognizing a transposition, and making the clause καθὼς, &c., come in after ἀκριβῶς? I think not; such being a method arbitrary and harsh. The difficulty would be effectually removed, by referring καθὼς, &c. (as Koecher, Rosenmüller and Kuinzel direct) to τῶν πεπληροφορημένων ἐν ἡμῖν (understanding these words to assign the ground of that firm conviction), and by assigning to καθὼς the sense, which it not unfrequently bears in the New Test., 'quatenus, inasmuch as.' But as this reference involves some harshness (the natural one being to ἀνατάσσεσθαι), and as such a sense of καθὼς here is unsupported by the ancient Interpreters, it is better to refer καθὼς to ἀνατάσσεσθαι; rendering it quemadmodum, according as. Παρέδωσαν should be rendered, 'have delivered'; the term being used not only of the declaring of a thing in writing, but, as here, orally. By ἡμῖν we may understand, as just before, 'us Christians,' meaning all Christians.

—ἀπ' ἀρχῆς.] This is by some supposed to refer to the period at which the Evangelist commences his narration; by others, to the commencement πάσιν ἀκριβῶς, καθέξης σοὶ γράψαι, κράτιστε Θεόφιλε, ἵνα ἂν ἐπιγνῶς περὶ ὧν κατηχήθης λόγων τὴν ἀσφάλειαν.

Ἐγένετο ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις Ἡρώδου τοῦ βασιλέως τῆς Ἰουδαίας ἱερεὺς τις ὀνόματι Ζαχαρίας ἐξ ἐφημερίας Ἀβιά· καὶ ἡ γυνὴ αὐτοῦ ἐκ τῶν θυγατέρων Ἀαρῶν, καὶ τὸ ὄνομα of Christ's ministry. The former view is manifestly erroneous; and the latter far from being well-founded. The expression must (like that at Matt. xix. 8.) refer to the primordia of the thing in question; namely, the Christian dispensation, which had its origin in the birth of Christ. So 1 John i. 1, ὃ ἦν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, ὃ ἀκηκόαμεν, ὃ ἰδρόκαμεν—ἀπαγγέλλομεν ὑμῖν, and often in the Gospel and Epistles of the same writer. Comp. also Heb. ii. 3. It is probable, however, that by ἀρχή is here meant the remote origin of the Christian dispensation in the birth of the Forerunner of its Author, namely, John the Baptist; which the Evangelist commences with narrating. Thus Mark i. 1, says, that 'the Gospel had its origin in the preaching of John the Baptist, as prophesied of by Isaiah.'

— τοῦ λόγου.] Many of the best Commentators here, taking λόγους for πράγματα, understand this to mean 'the thing in question,' i. e. the Gospel. And ὑπηρεταί they interpret 'associates in the matter,' tantum pars aliqua, namely, Christ's relatives, the seventy disciples, and his friends. Of which sense of λόγους examples occur at Acts xiii. 5, 15, 26, and sometimes in the Classical writers. There is, however, no sufficient reason to abandon the common interpretation, by which τοῦ λόγου is taken to mean τοῦ λόγου τοῦ Θεοῦ, the Gospel; a signification frequent in this book and the Acts of the Apostles, and derived from that idiom by which the Jews applied the expression 'the word of God' (or, elliptically, 'the word') to whatever is revealed by God to men for their instruction. Thus will arise a sense more significant and agreeable to facts: the writer having received his information both from those who had been eye-witnesses of the facts, and who had attended on the ministry of Christ while on earth; and from those who, after his ascension, were pre-eminently ministers for the propagation of his Gospel throughout the world, especially St. Paul. Ὑπηρετῆς and διάκονος often occur in Scripture to denote a minister of the word.

3. παρακολουθηκότι—ἀκριβῶς.] The full sense is, 'having accurately investigated every thing from the very first.' Παρακολουθεῖν signifies properly, 'to follow up, exactly trace, and search out.' Many examples have been adduced from the Classical writers both of the natural and the figurative sense. Ἀναθεῖν cannot mean (as some imagine) 'by inspiration;' since the context requires the usual sense 'from the very first.' Thus it is equivalent to ἀπ' ἀρχῆς just before; and has reference to the period at which the Gospel commences (namely, from the conception of John the Baptist); a period earlier than that of Matthew and Mark. Καθέξης denotes, not so much order of time, as of events, with reference to the regular disposition and orderly classification which especially distinguish this Gospel.

— Θεόφιλε.] The notion of some of the older Commentators, that this is only a feigned name, expressive of any Christian, and not that of a real person, is now generally exploded. Κράτιστε may be (as it is regarded by the best Commentators) a title of respect and civility addressed to persons of rank and consequence. So Acts xxii. 26, τῷ κρατίστῳ Φήλικι, and xxiv. 3, κράτιστε Φήλιξε. But reference to title would be out of place here, and not agreeable to the manner of Scripture. The sense therefore seems to be that of our word excellent, defined by Johnson, as 'said of a person of great virtue and worth.' So Pa. xviii. 3. 2 Macc. iv. 12. Thucyd. ii. 40, κράτιστοι δ' ἐν τῇ ψυχῇ δικαίως κριθεῖσιν. To suppose it (with some) used like the Roman 'vir prestantissime,' i. e. as a civil compliment, is forbidden by the character of an Evangelist to his convert. In fact it turns upon the supposition, purely gratuitous, that Theophilus was a person of high rank and elevated station; a circumstance, to say the least, very doubtful.

4. ἵνα ἐπιγνῶς.] The ἐπι is here intensive; and the sense of the verb is to fully ascertain and be thoroughly informed of any thing. Κατηχήθη does not import what is now meant by Catechetical instruction, but merely denotes that instruction, elementary, and chiefly oral, which preceded and followed up admission by baptism into the Christian Church. By λόγους, we meant both the statements made of the facts, which had taken place respecting the origin of the new religion, and the doctrines which it revealed. Τὴν ἀσφάλειαν and the preceding terms ἀκριβῶς, ἀκριβῶς, and καθέξης, glance at the official qualities in the narrations just adverted to. St. Eusebius, Eccl. Hist. iii. 24, says of Luke's language in this passage: ὁρῶν δὲ ὅρα πάλιν καὶ ἄλλων προκρίστου ἱστορημάτων διήγησιν ποιησάσθαι, ὡς αὐτοῖς (I conjecture αὐτοῖς) πεκληροφόρητο λόγους, δογματικὰ, ἀκαλλάτῃς (I conjecture ἀκαλλάτῃς) τῇ περὶ τούτων ἁμφοτέρων ὑπολήψει, τὸν ἀσφαλῆ λόγον, ὡς αὐτοῖς ἰκανῶς τὴν ἀλήθειαν καταλήφαι ἐκ τῆς ἁμα Παύλου συνομιλίας τε καὶ διατριβῆς, καὶ τῆς τῶν λοιπῶν ἀποστόλων, ἐφελκυστοῦ, διὰ τοῦ ἰδίου περιήκους εὐαγγελίου. Both the foregoing conjectures are necessary to the sense; and the first is indispensable, and quite confirmed by the words of the Evangelist. Indeed, the terminations de and ois are continually confounded by the writers.

5. ἐφημερίαν.] This word (from ἐπι and ἡμέριος, a poetic form for ἡμεριώδης) signifies properly a daily service, as was that of the Jewish priests in the Temple. And since that was performed by the priests in turn, for a week alternately, the term came to denote (as here) by metonymy, the class (and there were 24 classes) which took that weekly service in rotation. This is mentioned, to show that John was of honorable birth. Zacharias was not, however (as has been supposed), the High Priest; since we are added, and the High Priest was of no other rank. The offering of incense was, no doubt, only daily offering, which would fall to his lot as ordinary priest in his course.

6 αὐτῆς Ἑλισάβετ. ^d Ἦσαν δὲ δίκαιοι ἀμφοτέροι ἐνώπιον τοῦ ¹ Θεοῦ, πορευόμενοι ἐν πάσαις ταῖς ἐντολαῖς καὶ δικαιομασί ² 7 τοῦ Κυρίου ἀμειπτοι. 6. δίκαιοι.] Meaning persons of uprightness and integrity. Ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ is an Hebraic adjunct, importing reality; because whatever is what it is, in the sight of an omniscient God, must be really so, see Gen. vii. 1. The words following are exegetical and illustrative; and πορευόμενοι is, as often in Scripture, used of habitual action. Δικαιομασί and ἐντολαῖς, denoting the ordinances and commandments, are nearly synonymous; but the former may (as some suppose) denote the moral, the latter the ceremonial law. Ἀμειπτοι (irreproachable) expresses their good repute with men, as δικ. their piety towards God. See Artemidor. ii. 12, ἐκαίη διετίλεισαν ἀμειπτοι. And Ovid, Met. i. 528, says of Deucalion and Pyrrha, 'iamnocuus ambos, cultores numinis umbra.'

7. προβεβηκότες ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις.] This is said to be a Hebraism; but it is only such by the use of ἡμέραις and ἡλικία, and that of ἐν; the Classical writers using the phrase προβαίνειν τῇ ἡλικίᾳ, or κατὰ τὴν ἡλικίαν. The expression corresponds to our elderly. So Suid. explains παλαιότιμος. Zacharias's age could not have exceeded fifty, since after that time a priest was superannuated.

8. ἐν τῷ ἱερατεύειν.] while he was engaged in his priestly functions. The word is found in the later writers only; the earlier ones using ἱεραστῶν.

9. ἔλαχε τοῦ θυμιάσαι.] Supply κληρὸν or μέρος, which is expressed in Acts i. 17; though perhaps the noun may be the λόγος included in the verb. Among the various offices thus distributed by lot, the most honourable was this,—of burning incense. So much so, indeed, that no priest was allowed to perform it more than once. By τὸν ναόν is meant the Sanctuary, in which was the altar of incense, as distinguished from the Temple at large, in which the people were praying.

10. πᾶν τὸ πλῆθος τοῦ λαοῦ] i. e. the body of the people. For τοῦ λαοῦ ἦν, several MSS. have ἦν τοῦ λαοῦ, which is adopted by almost every Editor from Matthæi to Scholz. But the authority on which it rests is too weak to establish the existence of so great a barabness, as the supposition of a Genitive so closely connected with the Nominative, as τοῦ λαοῦ is with πλῆθος; which, taken in conjunction with the small number of MSS. that contain the reading, may lead us to suspect that it arose from a mere error of the scribes. For a description of the sacred rite then performing, see Lightfoot, in Recens. Synop., and compare Eccles. i. 15, et seqq.

12. ἱταράχθη.] And not without reason; for though angelic appearances in the Temple had been once not unusual, even as late as the time of Hyrcanus, who (as we learn from Joseph. Ant. xiii. 18.) witnessed such, while he was offering incense,—yet they were now very uncommon; and therefore the appearance, of itself sufficiently terrific, would be the more so.

13. εἰσηκούσθη.] A Hellenistic use of the word, in which the εἰς signifies leaning towards, inclining the ear; which implies favour, &c. Ἡ δέησίς σου. Some think that the prayer adverted to was a prayer for offspring, addressed either then or formerly. Many arguments have been urged for, but more against this supposition. Besides that the apparent impossibility of the thing may be supposed to have produced acquiescence in the will of God, the pious priest would be little likely to mingle private concerns with public devotions; and hence it is more probable that he was praying, together with the welfare of the nation, for the advent of Him whose coming many signs announced to be near at hand, even the Consolation of Israel. (ii. 25.)

—γεννήσει υἱόν σοι.] On the circumstances connected with the births of John the Baptist and of Christ, see Lightfoot, Whitby, and Macknight, and especially Dr. Bell, on the mission of John the Baptist; who ably evinces the genuineness of this part of the sacred history, and shows that 'the whole train of events here said to have taken place are of a nature so entirely beyond the power of man to produce, that if they really happened as they are said to have happened, the authority of any fact founded on them becomes unquestionable.' He further shows, that 'Whatever circumstance one may select with the endeavour to fix imposture, it can be evinced that any such supposition involves absurdities of the grossest sort; in fact, that in general the supposed imposture is not only morally, but almost physically impossible. And, in short, that whether the character, circumstances, and condition of the persons concerned, or the nature of the supposed plot and its chances of success be considered, the whole affair is completely immersed in absurdity, and runs counter to the ordinary principles of human action.

14. ἔσται χαρὰ σοι. Literally, 'he shall be joy to thee occasion of joy.' 'Αγαλλίασις just after is a still stronger term; here denoting exultation. Instead of γεννήσει, Griesbach, and many others down to Scholz., edit, from a large number of MSS., γασίσει, which is, indeed, more agreeable to propriety of language; but of such minutiae the sacred writers are little observant; and the former was more likely to be changed into the latter than the contrary. See Matthæi.

15—17. On this portion compare Matt. iii. 3. and John xix. 30—34, and see Dr. Smith's Scrip. Test. L. iii. ch. 2. on the evidence relative to the person of Christ, as derived from the office and testimony of John the Baptist; where he shows that a forerunner was peculiar to the dignity of the Messiah, and weighs the terms in which John's office is described,—his testimony, and resemblance to Elijah.

15. μέγας ἐνώπιον τοῦ Κυρίου] i. e. μέγας παρὰ Θεῶν, 'in the sight of the Lord,' i. e., as most understand, Jehovah; though others interpret it, the Lord Jesus. Bp. Middleton thinks the former required by the use of the Article with Κυρ. The Article, however, is in many MSS. not found, and is cancelled by Matth. and Griesb.

—οἶνον καὶ σίκερα οὐ μὴ πῖν.] A Nazaritic injunction. So in Numb. vi. 3. it is said of him who has vowed a Nazaritic vow, ἀπὸ οἴνου καὶ σίκερα ἀγνισθήσεται. Σίκερα is derived from the Heb. שכר, to inebriate, and denotes generally any intoxicating drink; but was chiefly applied to what we call made wines, from dates, figs, or palms, or fermented drink generally. The words ἐκ κοιλίας μητρὸς αὐτοῦ contain a Hebrew hyperbole, to denote 'from the earliest period.' See Is. xlviii. 8. xlix. 1, 5. Ps. lxxi. 6. The Classical writers use the phrases ἐκ παιδός, or βρέφους, or νηπίου. The ἔτι is for ἕδη.

Ἰν καὶ Πνεύματος ἁγίου πλησθήσεται] there is a tacit opposition between drinking wine, or strong drink, and being filled with the Spirit, Eph. v. 18. Finally, the words καὶ οἶνον καὶ σίκερα οὐ μὴ αὐτοῦ are meant to be confirmatory of what had been before said; q. d. 'As a token of his entire devotedness to God, he will not only be a perpetual Nazarite, but will be filled with the Holy Ghost from his earliest years.'

16. ἐπιστρέψει [ἐπὶ Κ.] See Note on v. 17.

17. αὐτοῦ.] A difference of opinion exists as to the person to whom this is to be referred. Some, as Henmann and Kuinoel, regard it as put emphatically for Christ; comparing v. 17. and

1 John ii. 6, 12. But in those passages there is no emphasis; the pronoun having reference to an antecedent noun, though somewhat remote. And though examples may be found of αὐτός in an emphatic sense, yet that is under different circumstances to the present—chiefly when several words intervene between the subject and the verb. Again, to suppose αὐτός so employed here, where a manifest antecedent immediately precedes, would be harsh in the extreme. And to regard αὐτός as used in so different a way in two places separated only by a couple of words, were to suppose a perfect enigma. According to the rules of just interpretation, αὐτοῦ must be referred to the person who was just before spoken of, Κύριον τὸν Θεόν, as the Persian Translator must have taken it. I cannot, however, agree with the generality of Commentators in understanding by Κύριον τὸν Θεόν the Lord Jehovah; since that would involve a no small harshness; though, if it were admitted, we might say, with Calvin, that 'since there is no express mention of Christ, the Angel makes John the forerunner of the Eternal God; or we may hence infer the eternal Divinity of Christ.' This, however, would be incurring a harshness almost as great as that which we have been opposing. It will be better, therefore, with several ancient Expositors, and, of the moderns, Maldonati, Castalio, Bengel, and others, to understand by Κύριον τὸν Θεόν, the Lord Jesus Christ. And so the Persian Translator must have taken it; since he renders 'their Lord and God,' by which the expression will answer to that addressed to Christ by Thomas (John xx. 28.), 'my Lord and my God.' And agreeably to what is here said, that the Baptist 'will turn many of the Israelites to their Lord God,' (ἐπιστρέψει) we find in 2 Cor. iii. 6. (with reference to Christ), 'when any one shall turn to the Lord,' ἐπιστρέψῃ πρὸς Κύριον, where some very ancient authorities have Θεόν for Κύριον. (Comp. also Acts xi. 21.)

The allusion in προελεύσεται ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ is clear from Matt. iii. 3, where see Note.

—πνεύματι means disposition, as δυνάμει and energy, or mighty endowments. On Εἰς, as a type of the Baptist, see Note on Matt. xi. 10. Compare also Ecclus. xlviii. 1. ἀνίστη Ἠλίας προφῆτης ὡς πῦρ, καὶ ὁ λόγος αὐτοῦ ὡς λαμπρὸς ἰκαίετο. In ἐπιστρέφει καρδίας τῶν ῥων, &c. there is an evident allusion to Mal. ii. 6, where it is said that Elias will go before the Messiah ἐπιστρέφει καρδίας πατέρων πρὸς υἱόν, καὶ καταστήσει φύλας Ἰακώβ. On the sense, import, indeed, of the words Commentators are not agreed. The most natural mode of interpretation, and that most suitable to the words 'Prophet,' is to regard them as denoting that: ciliation of discordant sects and political:

 24 θεν εἰς τὸν οἶκον αὐτοῦ. Μετὰ δὲ ταύτας τὰς ἡμέρας

by a common repentance and reformation, and thus general cultivation of philanthropy, which it was the purpose of the Gospel to promulgate and enjoin on men.

17. καὶ ἀπειθεῖς ἐν φρονήσει δικαίων.] Many Commentators construe this clause with the words following, and render: 'And by the wisdom of the righteous (or of righteousness) to render the disobedient a people well-disposed for the Lord,' i.e. furnished for the Lord, or formed for him. This, however, does violence to the construction of the sentence; and therefore it is better, with other Expositors, to take the words as a separate and independent clause. Thus ἐν φρονήσει will be for his prudence, and the sense will be, 'to reform the disobedient and unrighteous to the comprehension and embracing of righteousness.' The true construction seems to be this: καὶ ἐπιστρέψας ἀπειθεῖς (ὥστε εἶναι) ἐν φ. δ.

The sense of ἑτοιμάζειν Κυρίῳ λαὸν κατεσκευασμένον is, 'to make ready a people prepared or fitted for (the service of) the Lord.' Thus the two first clauses state the particular purposes of the Baptist's mission; namely, to introduce concord, philanthropy, and reformation of mind and practice. The third states the general purpose, or perhaps the result of the two former.

18. κατὰ τί.] Supply σημαῖον, which is expressed in a similar passage of Gen. xv. 8. Grot. has remarks on the difference in the cases of Abraham and of Zechariah, as to the same action. The former did not ask for a sign, from certainty in the promise of God, but for confirmation of his faith; whereas the latter had no true faith at all, and did not, as the former, turn from natural causes to the great First Cause. Hence, though a sign was given to him, it was a judicial action likewise, for not believing; though they were ordained to be such as should fix the attention of the Jews on the promised child.

19. Γαβριήλ.] Heb. גַּבְרִיֵּאל meaning, 'the power of God.' So ἰξουσία in Eph. iii. 16. vi. 12. and the Latin potestas. Comp. Acts viii. 10. οὗτος ἄνθρωπος ἐστὶν δούλος τοῦ Θεοῦ. By παρεστηκὼς meant 'one standing by in attendance, or ministering to;' as often in the Sept. So also in Luc. Dial. Deor. 24. 1. we have δεῖ παριστάναι τῷ Δεῖ. The image seems derived from the custom of Oriental courts.

20. ἔσθ' σιωπῶν καὶ μὴ δυν. λαλῆσαι.] This is not a mere tautology (to avoid which several Commentators, ancient and modern, explain σιωπῶν, deaf, quite against the propriety of language), but the latter phrase is meant to explain and strengthen the force of the former, as in Acts: ἔσθ' τυφλὸς, μὴ βλέπων τὸν ἥλιον. Thus the sense is: 'Thou shalt be silent; nay, thou shalt not be able to speak.'

—οἵτινες.] We have here a compound relative, standing, as a general connective.

21. ἐθαύμαζον ἐν τῷ χρόνῳ, &c.] The people might well wonder; for it appears to have been customary for the priest not to tarry, on account of the people waiting in the outer court; who would fear lest some harm had befallen him,—from a negligence in the duty or otherwise,—which might be ominous of evil to the people at large. When Zechariah at length appeared, and was evidently deprived of the faculty of utterance, the people would be likely to conjecture that something extraordinary had happened to him, and naturally asked whether he had seen a vision.

22. λαλῆσαι αὐτοῖς.] Neither to give them the accustomed benediction, nor to inform them of the cause of the delay. Ἦν διακρίνειν α., scil. τοῦτο, he nodded assent to the inquiry, whether he had seen a vision. Διακρίνειν signifies, 'to express one's meaning by nods or becks.' So Thucyd. i. 34. 1. νύκται χρησαμένον. Κωφὸς here, as appears from v. 62, signifies both dumb and deaf.

23. λειτουργίας.] Λειτουργία is derived from the old word λῆϊτρος, publicus; and signifies in the Classical writers any public service, whether civil or military. But in the Scriptural ones it is confined to the public offices of religion; 1. that of the Priests and Levites, under the Mosaic Law; 2. that of Christian ministers of every kind under the Gospel dispensation.

24. περιέκρυβεν ἑαυτὴν.] Some Commentators, ancient and modern, take this to mean, 'she concealed her situation.' To which, however, it has been justly objected, that there could be no reason for such concealment. Neither, indeed, can the expression signify any such thing; and it is not necessarily implied in the context. It should rather seem to mean, 'she kept herself retired.' This she would be induced to do during her whole pregnancy, not only through motives of delicacy (considering her advanced years), but from an anxiety to preserve herself from such accidents, as might either endanger the safety, or impart any defilement to the embryo (see Judg. xiii. 14.); and lastly, she would feel herself bound, considering the signal favour she had received from above (by which was removed from her the reproach that barrenness involved), to employ the period of her pregnancy for the purposes of more than ordinary devotion. It is frivolous to debate which five months she secluded herself; for the last five are not permitted by the context, which manifestly points to the first five. Yet the words ἐν τῷ μηνὶ τῷ ἔκτῳ ἀπεστάλη will not (as it has been thought) oblige us to suppose that she kept retired only the first five. There was more reason, on every account, for the next four; and therefore we are warranted in extending that privacy (with Lightfoot) to the whole period of gestation. The period five months is merely mentioned, as being that which intervened between the time of her conception, and that of the angel's appearance to Mary and the visit to Elizabeth.

25. ἐπείδεν] 'hath looked upon me,' i.e. by implication, with favour. A signification found in the Heb. נָצַר, the Greek Classical ἐπείδειν, and the Latin respicere. Ὀνειδος is one of those words which, though in the later Grecism they bore a bad sense, yet in the earlier ones were terms of middle signification; as Eurip. Bacch. 640. κάλλιστον δνειδος. This, however, is only the case with words which, from their origin, admit of a middle signification; not so with those which, from their derivation, must have a bad sense.

There is here an allusion to Gen. xxx. 23. ἀφείλαν ὁ Θεὸς μου τὸ δνειδος.

26—29. On this portion, containing a revelation of the miraculous conception, see the Dissertation of Mr. Townsend, Chron. Ant. p. 32, seq.

27. μεμνηστευμένη] 'betrothed, contracted; without which no woman was ever married among the Jews, and probably the Gentiles also, from the earliest ages. See Hom. II. ζ. 245.

28. κεχαριτωμένη] 'gratified, highly favoured of God.' Χαριτός is very rare in the Classical writers, and not frequent in the Sept. It occurs in Eccles. ix. 8. xviii. 17. and Ps. xvi. 26. Symm. Ὁ Κύριος μετὰ σοῦ. Supply ἵνα. A frequent form of salutation in the Old Test.

—εὐλογημένη ἐν γυναιξίν.] This is said to be a Hebrew form of expressing the superlative; the sense being, 'happiest of women?' But it is found also in both the Greek and the Latin Classical writers. Suffice it to refer to the Homeric Μικτ' inter omnes Julium sidus.

29. ποταπὸς εἴη ὁ ἀσπ. οὗτος.] A popular form of expression, equivalent to 'what these remarkable things might mean.'

30. εὗρες χάριν] 'thou hast obtained favour.' So Thucyd. i. 58. εὗροντο οὐδὲν ἐντίμιον. The Middle form, however, is always used by the Classical writers.

31. κληθήσεται.] Meaning, 'shall be.' The Unitarian translation of Υἱὸς ὑψίστου, 'son of the most high God,' is completely refuted by Bp. Middleton. And the force of the expression is ably pointed out by Bp. Ball, Jued. Eccl. Cate.

p. 37. and Defens. Fid. Nic. p. 242, as also by Dr. Smith in his Scrip. Test., vol. ii. p. 48.

34. πῶς ἔσται τοῦτο.] Very many MSS., several Versions, and some Fathers have μοι between ἔσται and τοῦτο, which was edited by Matthæi; but wrongly: since external evidence is quite against it. The μοι was probably suggested by the πόθεν μοι τοῦτο of v. 43; a mode of expression, however, different from the present.

35. πν. ἅγιον.] Meaning, the influence of the Holy Spirit, as in Acts i. 8.

—δύναμις ὑψίστου ἐπισκιάσει σοι.] These words are exegetical of the clause preceding. Ἐπισκιάζειν signifies, 1. to overshadow; 2. to surround; 3. to defend, or assist; 4. as here, to assert a power or influence in or on, like ἐκτενέω, 2 Cor. xii. 9. For, as Dr. Smith (Scrip. Test. ii. 51.) shews, the nature of the expression is such as to intimate that 'the Virgin would bear a son by the intervention of Divine power.' And it was necessary that he who came to redeem men should, in his human nature, be himself pure from the corruption of that original sin which arose from the Fall.

—τὸ γεννώμενον ἅγιον.] Rendered by Kuin. 'the holy offspring.' But though τὸ γεννώμενον may properly be taken as a noun, according to a common idiom of the Greek; yet I agree with Rosenmüller that Kuinoel and Schott. have, in their version, done wrong by drawing the adjective ἅγιον, ad substantivum, as if there had been written τὸ γεννώμενον τὸ ἅγιον. Whereas we may rather suppose ὃν to be omitted, and the sense to be; 'Wherefore also thy offspring, since it is Divine, will be named (i. e. have the appellation) Son of God.'

36. ἡ συγγενὴς σου, &c.] Elizabeth might be Mary's relative, though they were of different tribes. Mary's mother might be of the tribe of Levi, and the family of Aaron. Or the mother or grandmother of Elizabeth might be of the tribe of Judah, and thus have been related to Mary by the father's side. Her case, then, as was quite in point, is adduced to inspire Mary with faith in the assurance of the heavenly Messenger.

—γάρει.] This (for γάρει) is found in almost all the best MSS. and the early Editions; and is, with reason, adopted by Weststein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz.

37. οὐκ ἀδυνατήσῃ—ῥῆμα.] A proverbial form of expression, similar to one in Gen. xviii. 14. μὴ ἀδυνατήσῃ παρὰ τῷ Θεῷ ῥῆμα. Here ῥῆμα, like the Heb. דבר, signifies, as often, thing; and the Future has the force of the Present. Moreover, this use of οὐ πᾶς is Hebraic.

38. Ἰδοὺ, ἡ δούλη K.] A phrase expressive of prompt acquiescence, as at Acts ix. 10.

39. τὴν ὀρεινὴν] scil. χώραν, called at v. 65, τῇ ὀρεινῇ τῆς Ἰουδαίας. So Joseph. Ant. xii. 1, 1. ἀπὸ τῆς ὀρεινῆς τῆς Ἰουδαίας, and Bell. Jud. iv. 9, 9. καίτοι δὲ (scil. χίβρων) κατὰ τὴν ὀρεινὴν.

—πόλιν Ἰούδα.] What city is here meant has been not a little disputed. Some think Jerusalem; others, Hebron. It is now, however, agreed that it cannot have been the former, since that was not in the Highland district; whereas Hebron, it is urged, was not only a Sacerdotal city, but was situated in the Highlands. But why, then, did not the Evangelist at once say Hebron? Is it probable that he would mention the metropolis of the tribe in so very indefinite a manner? Not to say (as has been observed by Roland), that from the air of the context, we should expect the name of some certain city. Hence we may suspect that there is here an error in the reading. And Reland, Palest. p. 870, conjectures, with great probability, that the true reading is Ἰούτα, itself also a sacerdotal city, and in the Highlands, a few miles east of Hebron, mentioned in Josh. xv. 55. xxi. 16. Heb. יִזְחָר. This conjecture is embraced by Vales., Michaelis, Rosenmüller, and Kuinoel. The scribes, as observes Kuinoel, might easily confound the comparatively little known Ἰούτα with the well-known Ἰούδα; or Ἰούτα may have been changed in pronunciation into Ἰούδα at the time of St. Luke. As confirmatory of the above, I would add, that one Edition of the Sept., in the passage of Joshua above adverted to has Ἰαδδὰ, plainly by an error of the scribes for Ἰουδδὰ.

ἐποίησέ μοι μεγαλεῖα ὁ Δυνατὸς, καὶ ἅγιον τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ· properly signifies 'to bound for joy,' as young animals do; but it is sometimes, like the Latin salire, applied to the leaping of the fœtus in utero. So Gen. xxv. 22. ἐσκίρτων τὰ παιδιά ἐν αὐτῇ and Nonn. Dionys. viii. 224. A circumstance not uncommon in the advanced stages of pregnancy, and which is usually occasioned by sudden agitation.

42—43. The knowledge that Mary was to be the mother of the Messiah, is, with reason, supposed to have been conveyed to Elizabeth by immediate revelation. And her declaration of this knowledge, introduced as it was by the very words of the Angel's annunciation (v. 28.), together with her delicate allusion to the unbelief of Zach. who, in a similar case, had doubted the words of the Angel (see v. 20), would be a mutual confirmation of the faith of them both.

43. πόθεν μοι τοῦτο.] Supply τὸ πρᾶγμα γίγνεται. A form expressive of wonder at any unexpected honour done, and is not unfrequent in ancient writers.

44. ἐσκίρτησεν ἐν ἀγαλλ.] Meaning, 'as it were leaped for joy'; for the fœtus is properly not capable of any such sensation.

The words ἐν ἀγαλλ. are in many MSS. placed after τὸ βρέφος; and this reading is edited by Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittmann, and Scholz. I have, however, seen no good reason to abandon the common reading, which is retained by Knapp, Vater, and Lachman.

45. ἡ πιστεύουσα ὅτι, &c.] There is here some difference of opinion as to the right punctuation. Most suppose it to be ἡ πιστεύουσα ὅτι, &c.; while not a few make it ἡ πιστεύουσα ὅτι. The former carries with it a more weighty sense than the other; but is not so agreeable to the usus loquendi, by which the thing believed is introduced by an ὅτι. Not that examples are wanting in Scripture of the absolute use of πιστεύω, but that ὅτι coming after πιστεύω must naturally be referred to it in construction. And this is agreeable to the usage of St. Luke elsewhere. So Acts xxvii. 25. πιστεύω γὰρ τῷ Θεῷ ὅτι οὕτως ἐσται. Also Mark xi. 23. πιστεύω ὅτι & λέγει γίνεται. And as this is supported by most of the ancient Versions and Commentators, the Ed. Princ., and the most eminent modern Expositors, it seems entitled to the preference. Τελείωσις, accomplishment, fulfilment. So Philo, p. 78, cited by Weta πίστις τῶν μελλόντων ἢ τῶν προγεγονότων τελείωσις.

46. In this noble Canticle the blessed Virgin devoutly praises God, 1. for his mercy to her, v. 46—49; 2. for his mercies to all men (v. 50—53); 3. for his especial goodness to be shown to his faithful people in all future ages. (vv. 54, 55.) It is observable that most of the expressions in this sublime effusion (on which see Bp. Jebb, Sac. Lit. 392—402.) are derived from the Old Testament, especially from the Song of Hannah, in which there was so much that was remarkably suited to Mary's own case.

—μεγαλύνει ἡ ψυχὴ μου.] This use of ψυχή is not a mere Hebraism, but is very emphatic, and implies the greatest earnestness and intensity of feeling. Μεγαλύνει, in this precatory sense, signifies to extol. Ἐγαλλ. is a stronger term than μεγαλ., and denotes exultation and extatic joy.

48. ὅτι ἐπέβλεψεν ἐπὶ τ. τ. δ. α.] So also Levit. xxvi. 9. This use was probably founded on that of the Heb. רָחַם; though something like it is found in the Classical use of ἐπι-πτεσθαι and ἐφορᾶν, and the Latin compassari. Ταπείνωσις signifies lowly condition, as in Gen. xxxix. 32. and Diod. Sic. ii. 45. τοῖς δὲ ἀδελφοῖς ταπείνωσιν καὶ δουλείαν περιέπτει.

48. μακαριοῦσι] 'shall esteem me happy,' namely, in giving birth to the Saviour of the world. In this absolute use the word occurs in James v. 11. In the Classical writers the phrase μακαρίζειν τινα is usually accompanied with a Genit. of cause or origin.

49. μεγαλεῖα.] The Commentators supply ἔργα. But it is better to say that, in such a case as this, the adjective is used substantively. Nor is μεγ. to be rendered (as it is done by some) miracles; but ἐποίησέ μοι μεγ. may be translated 'hath conferred upon me favours unnumberable'; for μεγαλείος signifies more than μεγ.. The expression is founded on Ps. lxx. 18. (Sept.) ἡ ἐποίησάς μοι μεγαλεῖα. See Deut. x. 21. 1 Sam. xii. 16. Tobit xi. 15. And there seems to be an antithesis between μεγαλεῖα here, and μεγαλύνει at v. 46. The expression ὁ Δυνατὸς, found in the Heb. חַזַּק, designates κατ' ἐξουσίαν (as in Ps. xxiv. 8. Sept.), the Almighty. Αἱ ἔργα—ὅτι supply ἐστὶ, and render: 'holy and to be revered is his name.' This is formed on Ps. cxi. 3.

50. τοῖς φοβ.] for πρὸς τοὺς φοβουμένους; a syntax frequent in the LXX.

51. Here we have, first, an accumulation of phrases expressive of God's power; and the general declaration ἐποίησε κράτος ἐν βραχίονι αὐτοῦ is then illustrated by examples. Βραχ. denotes, by a usual Hebrew figure, the mighty power of God, as shown in the most signal manner. By βραχίονι the Almighty is here represented as potentially exerting his sovereign power. By ἔλεος is meant, as often in the Sept., the lovingkindness of the Lord. Instead of εἰς γενεάς γενεῶν several MSS. have ε. γενεῶν καὶ γενεῶν, which is edited by Matthæi. But this, and three other various readings also found, may be considered as no more than so many various modes of explaining or simplifying an expression somewhat unusual, yet one founded on the Hebrew idiom. However, εἰς γενεῶν καὶ γενεῶν is not infrequent in the Sept.

—δισκόρπισεν] 'he utterly discomfits.' A metaphor derived from putting to flight a defeated enemy. The word not unfrequently occurs in the Sept., but very rarely in the Classical writers; though one example is adduced by Kuinoel from Ellen, Var. Hist. xiii. 46. τοὺς μὲν δισκόρπισεν, οἳ (read τοὺς) δὲ ἀπὸκτείνε.

—διανοίᾳ καρδίας αὐτῶν.] Διανοία is governed of ἐν understood, and the expression signifies 'their inmost thoughts and devices.' The general sense is, that 'He scatters their imaginations, frustrates their schemes, and brings their counsels to nought.' A sentiment similar to many which occur in the ancient Greek writers.

52. καθεῖλε δυνάστας.] Καθεῖλε signifies properly to pull down, as applied to things; but it is not unfrequently used of persons. The words are founded on a passage of Eccles. x. 14. See my Note on Thucyd. vi. 83. Δυνάστας means not kings only, but all who are invested with political power. Here Wetstein aptly compares Raised, Erg. i. 5. 'Ῥαῖα μὲν γὰρ βριάει, ῥαῖα δὲ ἀνάστα χαλάνται.' Ῥαῖα δὲ ἀρίστων μινύθει, καὶ ἀέθλων ἀεξεί.

53. This sentiment is closely connected with that of the preceding verse. By the expression ἀγαθῶν is meant food, agreeably to the figure in πεινῶντας and κενούς. And so Ps. ciii. 5. (which probably suggested the idea), 'who satisfieth thy mouth with good things,' Sept. τὸν ἐμπιπλῶντα ἐν ἀγαθοῖς. But, by the use of the term πλουτοῦντας, it should seem that the above terms are to be taken of abundance, or want, of the subsidiaries; in short, of wealth or poverty. So I Cor. iv. 8. ἡδὴ κικροισμένοι ἐστί, ἡδὴ ἐπλουτήσατε. The expression κενούς is accommodated to the figure in πεινῶντας (so Job xxii. 9), a passage here probably had in view: χήρας δὲ ἐξαπείστεilas κενάς. Yet it may not the less mean 'destitute [of riches].' So also Herodotus, vii. 131. ἀπικίατο, οἱ μὲν κεινοί, οἱ δὲ φέροντες γῆν καὶ ὕδωρ. Finally, as St. Luke here opposes πεινῶν and πλουτεῖν, so does Aristophanes in his Plut. 535.

54. ἀντελάβετο 'I.] Ἀντιλαμβάνεσθαι denotes properly to lay hold of any thing, or person, by the hand, in order to support it when it is likely to fall; but the term is here, as at Acts xx. 35, and often in the Classical writers, used metaphorically in the sense to protect, support.

—μνησθῆναι ἐλέους.] Supply εἰς τὸ, as at v. 72, and frequently elsewhere. The construction will be plain from the punctuation which I have adopted, and which is confirmed by Psalm xcvi. 3. Sept. With respect to the full sense of μνησθῆναι, it may be observed that the Almighty is said to be mindful of his people, when he exerts his power for their support, and confers on them the benefits he promised. The expression has here peculiar emphasis, meaning, 'to give a fresh proof of mercy and favour to Israel, in addition to the ancient mercies shown to that people.'

55. εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα.] Several MSS. have ἕως αἰῶνος, which is edited by Griesbach, Tittman, and Scholz. But I have, with Vater and Lachm., seen no reason to alter the common reading.

56. ὥσπερ μῆνας τρεῖς] i. e., as Theophylact, Euthymius, and Grotius show, till very near the time of Elizabeth's delivery.

58. ἐμεγάλυνε τὸ ἔλεος αὐτοῦ μετ' αὐτῆς.] A Hebraism to signify showing signal kindness to any one, and which is found in Gen. xix. 19. corresponding to the Heb. קָרַן רַחֲמָיו.

59. ἐκάλουν] 'they were calling,' were going to call it. A sense which the Imperfect frequently bears.

60. καὶ ἀποκριθεῖσα] 'addressing them.'
— οὐχί.] This paragogic form of οὐ is intensive, signifying by no means; as Luke xii. 51. xiii. 3, 5.

61. οὐδεὶς ἐστὶν—τούτῳ.] The Jews were accustomed to give only such names as occurred among their ancestors,—partly to keep the families and tribes distinct, but chiefly out of respect to their forefathers.

62. ἐκένευον.] Meaning, 'they intimated by nods and signs.' See Note supra v. 22. At τὸ τί supply κατὰ, as to. It is not well to take the τὸ for τούτο. It belongs to the whole of the clause following; nor is there (what some imagine) a pleonasm; the sense being, 'as to what he might wish to call him.' This use of τὸ before τί is rare in the Classical writers. It occurs sometimes in Josephus, as Bell. Jud. vii. 5, 2. ἐπ' ἀδήλω δὲ, τὸ τί φρονεῖ.

63. πινακίδιον.] Probably the small square writing board, whitened over, which is even yet in use in the East. So we read in Joseph. Bell. i. 32, 6. τὴν τε διαθήκην αἰτήσας, μετέγραψα.
— λέγων] i. e. 'expressing.' Lat. his verbis. A sense of the word occurring not only in the Sept., but also in the Classical writers, and derived from the unexact phraseology of common life.

64. ἀνεψύχθη—γλῶσσα α.] This expression is by the Commentators rightly referred to one of those idioms, by which a verb is joined with two nouns of cognate sense; to one only of which it is properly applicable. So Homer has, σίτον καὶ οἶνον ἔδοντες. Also Æschyl. Prom. 21, οὔτε φωνῇ, οὔτε μορφῇ βροτῶν δύει. 1 Cor. iii. 2. However, the term ἀνοίγασθαι may not unsapiently be applied to setting free the tongue. Thus (as De Rhoer observes) Sophocles and Themistius speak of the tongue being shut, and of the door of the tongue. Now surely there is no greater impropriety in speaking of the tongue being opened. Moreover, the Heb. פתח to which ἀνοίγειν answers, signifies not only to open, but to loose, as in Gen. xxiv. 32. 1a. v. 27. See the Note on Mark vi. 34. Thus there will be no occasion to supply ἐλύθη, but simply repeat ἀνεψύχθη.

As to the hypothesis of some who would attribute the loss and the recovery of Zacharias' speech to natural causes, it is totally inadmissible. The whole can be regarded in no other light than that under which the Evangelist evidently represents it, as supernatural, and as a judicial infliction.

65. φόβος.] The term here imports a mixed feeling of wonder and awe.

66. ἔθεντο ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ] scil. ταῦτα, namely (says Euthym.), ἐν ἀξιολογῇ. This phrase is rare in the Classical writers. We may compare the Homeric μῦθον ἐντίθισθαι θυμῷ, and the Latin reponere, or condere mentis. The τί, which may be rendered neut. for masculine, qualis (as we have quid for qualis in Hor. Sat. i. 6, 55), expresses admiration; and the ἄρα is ratiocinative; q. d. 'What sort of a man, now, will this child become?'

— καὶ χεὶρ Κυρ. ἦν μετ' αὐτοῦ.] These words are by some supposed to be a part of the speech. But thus the καὶ will have to be taken, very harshly, for γάρ. Hence it is better considered as an observation of the Evangelist; and part of the narrative. The καὶ may be rendered et.

67. προεφήτευσεν.] Many think that the term here, and occasionally elsewhere, merely denotes praising God in fervent and exalted strains, like those of a prophet. And indeed such a sense is προφήτης is found in the Classical writers; but not in the Scriptural ones; much less in προφητεύειν. It may, indeed, with truth be affirmed, that in the New Test. there are but two significations of προφητεύειν; 1. to prophesy, predict future events; 2. to speaking under the impulse of divine inspiration. Now the hymn of Zacharias was both prophetic and inspired.

68. ἐπεσκέψατο] scil. τὸν λαόν, 'hath visited with his mercy and favour.' The metaphor (which occurs also at ver. 78, and vii. 16. Acts xv. 14. Heb. ii. 6), is derived either, as is commonly supposed, from the custom of princes to visit the provinces of their kingdoms, in order to redress grievances and confer benefits; or rather, from the visiting of the distressed by the benevolent, to afford them relief. Zacharias's language was permitted by the Holy Spirit to be accommodated to the opinion of the speaker, and, indeed, to that of the Jews universally, who supposed the Messiah was to be manifested for the benefit of the Jews only, not for that of the whole human race.

69. κέρας σωτηρίας.] On the exact nature of the metaphor Commentators are not agreed. Nesciut supposes an allusion to the iron horns which, among the ancients, were fastened to their helmets. Fischer and others, to the four horns of the altar, which were among the Hebrews (as the urs and foci among the Greeks and Romans) places of refuge for suppliants. This view, however, may be considered rather ingenious than solid. Upon the whole there is no reason to abandon the common opinion which derives the metaphor from horned animals, whose strength is in their horns. Hence horn was a term perpetually used to denote strength, and thus became a symbol of power and principality. So Achmet Onzir. 83. τὰ κέρατα τοῖς ἀξιώμασι ἀναλογίζονται. Thus κέρας σωτηρίας is for σωτήρα ἰσχυρόν, a powerful deliverer and helper.

70. τῶν ἁγίων—προφ.] The second τῶν is not found in some ancient MSS., and is suspected not to be genuine by Geradorf and Vater, 'because,' say they, 'the Article is no where else so used, preceded by an adjective.' Yet on that very account they ought to have been less ready to cancel the Article, than to inquire whether the preceding word is really an adjective. Now Bp. Jebb and Rosenmuller think it is not an adjective, but a substantive, as very often elsewhere. So Deut. xxxiii. 2, 3. 1 Sam. ii. 9. Chron. vi. 41. Job xv. 15. Ps. xxx. 4. xxxiii. 9. That the Patriarchs, from Adam downwards were God's saints, though not all of them his prophets, is certain: and why they might be so called, appears from Levit. xx. 7. So xix. 2. xxi. 8. This view I should have adopted, but for the very similar passage of Luke himself, Acts iii. 21, ἀπὸ χρόνου ἀποκαταστάσεως πάντων, ὃν ἐλάλησεν ὁ Θεὸς διὰ στόματος (πάντων) ἁγίων αὐτοῦ προφητῶν ἀπ' αἰῶνος, where Griesbach and others insert τῶν before ἁγίων; which, however, Bp. Middleton thinks unnecessary. Yet here it is found in all the MSS.; and if the Article be used with the adjective, it cannot be dispensed with in the substantive. And that the writer meant it so to be taken in the passage of Acts is clear; because ἁγίων αὐτοῦ προφ. can only mean, 'of his holy prophets': and τῶν ἁγ. πρ. could mean no more. This indeed is confirmed by 2 Pet. iii. 2, μνησθῆναι τῶν πρ. ρημάτων ὑπὸ τῶν ἁγίων προφητῶν, and Rev. xxii. 6, ὁ Θεὸς τῶν πνευμάτων τῶν ἁγίων προφητῶν.

—ἀπ' αἰῶνος.] This phrase, which often occurs in the Hellenistic writers, and sometimes in the Classical (who, however, prefer ἀπ' ἀρχῆς), means, 'from the most ancient times.'

71. σωτηρίαν] i. e. a means of salvation, for σωτήρα; a frequent idiom in the Scriptures.

—ἐξ] for ἀπὸ, as in a similar passage of Josephus, Ant. ix. 8, 5, ὁ Θεὸς διδόνων αὐτῷ τὴν ἐκ τοῦ πολέμου καὶ τῶν κινδύνων ἀδίαν.

72. ποιῆσαι ἔλεος μετὰ.] A Hebraism also occurring in Acts xiv. 27. xv. 4. Gen. xxiv. 12. 14. Ps. cxix. 65. Job xii. 6. Judith viii. 26.

73. ὅρκον ὃν ὤμοσα.] The difficulty which here exists in the construction cannot, I think, well be got rid of by supposing an ellipsis of κατὰ before ὅρκον. It should rather seem, as Elsner and Valckn. maintain, that ὅρκον is put for ὅρκον on account of the subsequent relative ὃν, as in Luke xx. 17. Compare Mark xii. 10. Acts x. 36. Matt. xxi. 42. On this so called attraction, see Matthiae, Gr. Gr. § 474. Buttman, Gr. Gr. § 151, and Herm. on Soph. Elect. 643 and 681.

This and the next verse contain the substances of the oath unto Abraham. The Prophets of the Old Test., in describing the times of the Messiah, and the spiritual worship which was to succeed to the ceremonial observances of the law, use the very same language as that of this Divine Hymn; though neither the Jews generally, nor even the prophets themselves, understood those prophecies as we, informed by history, and enlightened by the Gospel, are enabled to do. 'Αφόβως is to be taken, not with ῥυσθέντας, but with λατρεύειν; which is required by the construction, and yields a sense most in unison with the nature of the Gospel,—as alluding to the absence of the 'spirit of bondage,' mentioned Rom. viii. 15; the sense being, 'without fear of our spiritual enemies, Sin, the Law, and Death, over which we obtain the victory by Christ,' see 1 Cor. xv. 57, and Note. 'Ὁσιότης' denotes the observance of all duties to God; δικαιοσύνη, the performance of all duties to men. Comp. Eph. iv. 24. So 1 Thess. ii. 10, ὁσιος καὶ δικαίου, and Tit. i. 8. Τῆς ζωῆς is not found in many of the best MSS. and Versions, and some Fathers; and is, with reason, cancelled by Griesbach, Vater, Tittman, and Scholz.

76. In this and the following verses we have a remarkable prophecy respecting the dignity, office, and success of John, also describing the nature, privileges, and effects of the Gospel, and foretelling its salvation both among Jews and Gentiles.

 δόγμα παρὰ Καίσαρος Αὐγούστου, ἀπογράφεσθαι πᾶσαν τὴν

77, 78. In these verses it is intimated that salvation, which was, under the law, by legal righteousness alone, is, under the Gospel, obtainable alone by remission of sins, to be obtained through the free grace and mercy of God, and the satisfaction of Christ, our righteousess.

78. διὰ σπλαγχνα ἐλέους.] With this expression compare σπλ. οἰκτιρμῶν at Col. iii. 12. Each is a stronger expression than either of the two nouns would be, taken singly. 'Ελέους is a stronger term than οἰκτ.; the latter signifying only the pain we feel at the misery of others; the former, the desire of relieving that misery, with an adjunct notion of benevolence.

— ἀνατολὴ ἐξ ὕψους.] On the exact sense of this expression some diversity of opinion exists. Many eminent Commentators take ἀνατολὴ to signify a budding branch, and figuratively a son, like the Heb. פֶּטֶח. But the metaphor is so harsh, and leads to such a confusion (taken in conjunction with the words following), that I see no reason to abandon the common interpretation 'the dawn from on high,' with allusion to those passages of the Old Test. which describe the Messiah under the metaphor of the light, and the sun, see Mal. iv. 2. Against this interpretation, indeed, it is urged by Wetstein and others, that thus ἐξ ὕψους will not be a proper expression, because the sun when he ascends is always in the horizon, and not over head. The objection, however (most hypercritical in itself), might be sufficiently overruled by understanding the expression to denote, what it very well may, that moderate elevation which the sun soon attains after its rise. But ἐξ ὕψους may rather, I think, be taken (as it is done by Kuin., Tittm., and Wahl) for ἀνωθεν, i. e. from heaven, to denote the rising of the Sun of Righteousness. Mal. iv. 2. And so ἐξ ὕψους is used infra xxiv. 49. The whole passage represents the Messiah as coming, like the rising sun, to dispel the darkness which covered the world, 'bringing life and immortality to light' through the Gospel. I would here compare a noble passage of Philo Jud. 714, E. in which we have the same beautiful allusion: καθάπερ γὰρ ἀνατείλαντος ἡλίου, τὸ μὲν σκότος ἀφανίζεται, φωτὸς δὲ πληροῦται τὰ πάντα· τὸν αὐτὸν τρόπον ὅταν θεοποίητος ἡλιος ἀνάσχη, καὶ ἐκλάμψῃ ψυχῇ, ὁ μὲν τῶν κακιῶν καὶ παθῶν ὁσφὸς ἀνασείδεται, τῆς δὲ αὐγοειδοστάτης ἀρετῆς τὸ καθαρῶτατον καὶ ἀξίεραστον εἶδος ἐπιφαίνεται. Where, in the words ὅταν θεοποίητος—ψυχῇ, Philo had in mind Mal. iv. 2. ἀνατελεῖ μὲν ἡλιος δικαιοσύνης· and θεοποίητος is said emphaticcē (like οἰκίαν ἀχειροποίητον at 2 Cor. v. 1, where St. Paul might have written θεοποίητον), and is in sense equivalent to θεοπνευστος. The metaphor is similar to that at 2 Cor. iv. 6. ὁ Θεὸς ὁ εἰπὼν ἐκ σκότους φῶς λάμψαι, δι' ἐλαμψεν ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ἡμῶν. Thus, too, the citizens of the New Jerusalem are at Rev. xxii. 5. said to have no need of the light of the sun, for the Lord God φωτίζει ἐν αὐτοῖς.

— ὁδὸν εἰρήνης] is taken from Is. xlix. 8, but spiritualized, i. e. that peace with God which bringeth with it salvation.

80. πνεύματι] in mind, and wisdom, as opposed to bodily growth.

— ἐν ταῖς ἐρήμοις.] Whether by this is meant the Hill country, where he was born, or the Desert properly so called, Commentators are not agreed. The latter, however, may be considered pretty certain. The period of his retirement is, with most probability, supposed to have been at the age of puberty, when he would have strength of body and mind to bear that solitude, which for him was so necessary. By that seclusion he would not be warped by the pernicious prejudices of the Jewish teachers, and would moreover approach near unto God, and seek that guidance of the Holy Spirit, which was indispensable to enable him to be the herald of the Gospel.

— ἀναδείξαι.] The word here denotes appointment to, and, by implication, entrance on any ministry; as x. 1, and Acts i. 24. It may be rendered 'manifestation unto Israel as a prophet,' when he came forward publicly in that capacity.

II. 1. ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ἐκ.] With allusion, not to the last verse, but to ver. 36, seqq. of the preceding Chapter. Ἐξῆλθε δόγμα, 'an edict, or decree, was issued, or promulgated,' neuter for passive. This sense of ἐξέρχασθαι occurs in the Sept. at Dan. ii. 13. ix. 25. Esth. i. 19, where it answers to the Heb. מִצַּח.

— ἀπογράφεσθαι πᾶσαν τὴν οἰκ.] It is plain that by τὴν οἰκ. scil. γῆν cannot be meant the whole world. Most Commentators take it to mean the Roman world, i. e. empire; an expression (like orbis terrarum in Latin) then in general use, see Acts xxiv. 5. Apoc. iii. 10. xvi. 14. Since, however, no historian has noticed such a general census of the whole empire; and since it is little probable that, had there been one, it would have been mentioned in connexion with the Proprietor of Syria, we may suppose (with Euseb., Bynæus, Wolf, Lardner, Pearce, Fischer, Rosenmüller, Kuinoel, and others) that Judea only is meant, as in Acts xi. 28, and Luke iv. 4.

and perhaps xxi. 20. Indeed the Jews called Judæa the earth of all the earth. See Ruth i. 1. 2 Sam. xxiv. 8.

2. αὕτη ἡ ἀπογραφὴ—Κυρηνίου.] Here a considerable difficulty presents itself; namely, how to reconcile these words of the Evangelist with those of Josephus, who states the ἀπογραφὴ, or census here spoken of, to have taken place ten or twelve years later than the birth of Jesus Christ. To remove this discrepancy various solutions have been proposed; only two of which seem entitled to attention; 1. That of Dr. Hales (Anal. vol. ii. p. 48—53), which assigns the following as the true rendering: 'It came to pass in those days (i. e. a short time before our Saviour's birth) that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the land [of Judæa, Galilee, Idumæa, &c.] should be enrolled [preparatory to a taxing]. (The taxing itself was first made when Cyrenius was governor of Syria); and all went to be enrolled, every one to his own city.'

This mode of interpretation, however, proceeds too much on hypothesis, and, besides requiring us to read αὕτη, obliges us to take ἀπογράφεσθαι and ἀπογραφὴ in two different senses; and the latter, tax, scarcely established on any authority. Far preferable is the solution of Wetstein, Campbell, and Bp. Middleton, who understand the meaning to be, that 'though the census was actually set on foot about the period of our Saviour's birth, it was presently laid aside, or at least no consequence followed, till the Imperial decree, ten or eleven years afterwards, in the Presidency of Cyrenius.' It is true (says Bp. Middleton) that Josephus has not related that any order for enrolment was issued at that time; yet he adverts to circumstances which make it not improbable that some measure of this kind was thus early adopted. In the latter part of Herod's reign (which terminated only two years after the birth of Christ) we learn from Josephus, Hist. xvi. 9, 3, that Augustus became offended with Herod; and, in an angry letter, threatened henceforth to treat him as a slave, [not slave; the original term being ἐπικράω, subject, Edit.] By which threat it might fairly be understood, that he meant to reduce Judæa to the state of a Roman province. And it is not improbable to suppose, that though the threat was not executed in the lifetime of Herod, yet that steps might have been taken to make him believe that the emperor was in earnest. In the reign of Archelaus the enrolment actually took effect, and Judæa was made subject to Augustus. Thus the meaning of αὕτη ἡ ἀπογραφὴ—Κυρηνίου will be, that the enrolment (here alluded to) first took effect (or did not take effect till) the presidency of Cyrenius. Of this and similar senses of γίνεσθαι many examples are adduced in Schleusner's Lex. On the force of the Article here, and the support it gives to this mode of taking the words, see Bp. Middleton, who compares Apoc. xx. 5, αὕτη ἡ ἀνάστασις ἡ πρώτη, and iv. 1, 7. xxi. 19.

If this latter mode be thought not sufficiently satisfactory, we may, with Beza (in his four first Editions), and also Venema and Valekn, suppose the words of this verse to be a marginal note unwarily introduced into the text; or at least, I would suggest, partly such; the Evangelist himself writing αὕτη ἡ ἀπογραφὴ ἡ πρώτη; and then the scribes adding first ἐγένετο, to fill up the ellipsis; and then some scoliast writing in the margin ἡγεμονεύοντος τῆς Συρίας Κυρηνίου.

4. ἐξ οἴκου καὶ πατριᾶς Δ.] Grotius, Kypke, and others, have rightly observed that the πατριὰ was a part of the οἶκος; the latter comprehending the collateral branches, and even servants (οἰκογενεῖς), the former being confined to the direct line of descent; very similar to the distinction, among the Romans, of gentes and familias. After the many separations which had taken place of the Jews, any such census as the above would have been impossible, unless each went to the place which had formerly been the lot of his clan or family. The only reason which the Commentators can imagine for Mary's attendance is, that she was an heir; for otherwise women were not registered. But it does not follow, from the words of the Evangelist, that Mary went to be registered; for σὺν may very well mean, 'accompanied by.'

5. μεμνηστευμένη] 'who had been betrothed (and was then married).' That such must be the sense, appears from Matt. i. 25.

6. ἐπλήσθησαν αἱ ἡμέραι.] Simil. Gen. xxv. 24 (Sept.), καὶ ἐπληρώθησαν αἱ ἡμέραι τοῦ τεκεῖν αὐτήν. 'Hm. is here put for time; which use is frequent in Scripture, and is called a Hebraism; but it occurs in Thucyd. vi. 65, αἱ ἡμέραι ἐν αἷσι ἐνέειντο ἔξιν ἰγγύς ἦσαν.

7. ἐσπαργάνωσεν.] Σπαργάνωσεν scarcely ever occurs in the Classical writers, though σπάργανον often does. We find it, however, in Ezek. xvi. 4. These σπάργανα were not only in use then (to prevent distortion of the limbs), but were retained in use until very late in modern times.

—ἀνέκλινεν α. ἐν τῇ φάτνῃ.] Ἀνακλίνω is often used absolutely; the place of laying being left to be supplied from the context, or the subject. Here it is a vox signata de hac re, and

Καὶ ποιμένες ἦσαν ἐν τῇ χώρᾳ τῇ αὐτῇ ἀγραυλοῦντες, 8 καὶ φυλάσσοντες φυλακὰς τῆς νυκτὸς ἐπὶ τὴν ποίμνην αὐτῶν. Καὶ ἰδοὺ, ἄγγελος Κυρίου ἐπέστη αὐτοῖς, καὶ δόξα 9 Κυρίου περιέλαμψεν αὐτούς· καὶ ἐφοβήθησαν φόβον μέγαν.

ἀνέκλινεν may be rendered 'cradled.' It is not so easy to fix the sense of φάτνη. This is commonly taken to denote 'a manger.' But, although such would seem no unfit receptacle for a new born child, yet, as mangers are not now in use in the East, but hair cloth bags instead, this interpretation has been considered unfounded. Yet it has never been established that mangers were not used by the ancients; nay, there has been tolerable proof adduced, from Homer and Herodotus, that they were; namely, of the form of our cribs, see Is. i. 3, and Job xxxix. 9. The common interpretation, however, has been thought to be untenable on another and more serious ground. For 'if the φάτνη (observes Wets.) was a part of the stable, and the stable a part of the inn, it follows that he who had a place in the stable, had one in the inn.' Yet the Evangelist says, 'there was no room for them in the inn.' It is (says Bp. Middleton) plain from the whole context, that φάτνη was not merely the place in which the babe was laid, but the place also in which he was born and swaddled.' The words ἐν τῇ φάτνῃ surely belong as much to ἔτακας as to ἀνέκλινεν, for else where should the delivery take place? Not in the κατάλυμα, for there there was no room, not merely for the child, but for 'them.' Hence Wetsstein, Rosenmüller, Middleton, Kuin., and many others, by φάτνη understand some place of lodging, though less convenient than the κατάλυμα. Many think it was an enclosed space, either in front of, or behind the house, and paved in like our farm-yards. As, however, such would seem but indifferent shelter for one in Mary's situation, others adopt the signification stable; which is thought to be confirmed by the authority of many of the early Fathers, who call the place of Christ's nativity a cave. Of these latter interpretations neither seems well-founded. If the term φάτνη denotes a building, it would seem to be neither a mere enclosed farm yard, nor a regular building like our stable; but rather like the hovels or sheds around our farmers' home-stalls. After all, however, I apprehend that the φάτνη does not designate the building, whatever that was, whether stable, or hovel (or even cave), in which Joseph and Mary were housed, but the place in which the new-born babe was laid. A view confirmed by antiquity; for the Fathers who call the place of Christ's nativity a cave, yet plainly distinguish the cave from the φάτνη. Thus it should seem that the true sense of the term is that assigned by the ancient Interpreters generally and the earlier modern ones, manger or crib. A signification which occurs in Scripture, at least in the Sept., and that three times. Such, indeed, was, it should seem, the primary signification; and that of stable, a derived one, namely, by synecdoche, and because a manger implied a stable. That it was the primary one is confirmed by the etymology of the word, which is not to be derived, as Donnegan (Gr. Lex.) says from πάσασθαι, but, as the Etym. Mag. points out, from φάγω; it being a corruption, arising from careless pronunciation, for φάγην—first φαγίην,—from φάγιμος, and exactly answering to our manger, i. e. an eating place. As to Wetsstein's reasoning (above stated) it is sophistical and false; for it does not follow that because there was no room for them in the κατάλυμα or inn itself, there should be none in the out-houses always attached to caravanserais. Nor do the words ἐν τῇ φάτνῃ properly belong (as Bp. Middleton maintains) to ἔτακας: the very error into which Dr. Priestley fell, who made ἐν τῇ φάτνῃ relate, in common, to all the three preceding verbs, ἔτακας, ἰσπαργάνωσεν, and ἀνέκλινεν, but which was completely refuted by Dr. Campbell. In short, the notes here of Wetsstein and Bp. Middl. supply a remarkable proof, the learning and genius may be employed as effectually to darken, as to enlighten human knowledge; thus, in the words of the Prophet, 'darkening the world in the clear day.' The three verbs are evidently all meant as separate. At any rate such is the case with ἔτακας. As, however, a manger implies a stable, we may infer (what the all of the context plainly suggests) that Mary's delivery took place in some out house, of whatever kind that might be. And after her delivery, what was so natural as that the manger of the stable or home-stall (whichever it was) would be employed as a cradle for the new-born babe, the fittest place, from its elevated position, for preserving it from danger. And it makes no difference if the place were, as the ancients universally make it, a cave; a tradition which cannot be rejected without setting too lightly by the testimony of early antiquity, in a matter where antiquity scarcely could be misinformed. That caves were sometimes (especially, we may suppose, in rocky situations, like that of Bethlehem) used as stables, is certain. Thus Eurip. Bacch. 482, Ματθ.: καθεῖρξαι αὐτὸν ἰππικοῖς πύλας Φάτνας, ὡς ἐν σκότειον εἰσορᾷ κνίφας. Nay, that they were used not for stables only, but also for houses, might be proved by a multitude of examples. It may suffice to refer to the case of Petra, recently as it were disinterred by the interesting researches of modern travellers.

8. ἀγραυλοῦντες. Ἀγραυλεῖν properly signifies to make one's abode in the fields and διο, whether by night or day, but usually the former. It is not certain, however, that these shepherds abode in the open air. They might be in huts or tents; for Kypke cites from Diod. Sic. ἀγρωλία, to denote a military encampment. And Basilegius, Epist. i. 58, speaks of 'wandering flocks' tended day and night by the shepherds, who carry their wives and children with them in waggons, and for themselves, he adds, 'εργαία ταβερνακία κινεῖται.' Yet these shepherds were probably not Nomades, but Bethlehemites, whose 'watch over their flocks by night' may be best expressed by the modern term βίσινας. Τῆς νυκτὸς is for νυκτερεύει; and φυλάσσω. φυλ. τ. ν. may be rendered, 'keeping the night watches'; the plural having reference to the various turns, or reliefs.

9. ἐπίστη αὐτοῖς. [Ἐφίσταται denotes to come upon the sight suddenly, and, as appears from the examples in Wetsstein, is especially used of supernatural appearances. Δόξα Κυρίου is best explained, with Euthym., Whithy, Schoetg., and Wahl, here (and at Acts vii. 55. Exod. xxiv. 16. xl. 34. 1 Kings viii. 11. 2 Chron. vii. 1. Heb. πᾶσι τῶν) of that Θεῶν φῶς, or extreme splendour in which the Deity is represented as appearing to men; and sometimes called the Shechinah, an appearance frequently attended, as in this case, by a company of angels.

10. χαρὰν.] By metonymy, for 'cause of joy,' as James i. 2, and Aristoph. Plut. 637, λέγειτε μοι χαρὰν.

11. σωτὴρ.] Wetstein has here and on i. 79, incontestably proved (after Bp. Pearson), by a vast assemblage of citations from Classical writers of every age that the terms σωτὴρ, Κύριος, Θεός, and ἱερωσύνη, so often applied in Scripture to Jesus Christ, prove him to have been of an origin far more august than the human; the terms being only applicable to a Deus paterne, The Son of God, and God.

12. τῇ φάτνῃ.] The τῇ is not found in very many of the best MSS. and early Editions; and has been, with reason, cancelled by most Editors from Wetstein to Scholz.

14. ἐν ὑψίστοις.] Sub. either τόποις, meaning superior (the plural being used with reference to the Heb. עֲלֵיוֹת, which only occurs in the plural), agreeably to that dogma of Jewish Theology, which reckoned three heavens, the aerial, the starry, and the highest, or the seat of God and the angels. The phrase occurs also in Matt. xxi. 9. Mark xi. 10. Luke xix. 38. Job xvi. 19.

15. εὐδοκία—εὐδοκία.] There are few sentences so short, with which Commentators have been more perplexed than this. Hence some read εὐδοκία, and others εὐδοκία. But the former seems to be merely an ancient conjecture, and is as little to be attended to as the latter, which is professedly such. No greater attention is due to those who change the doxology into a kind of proverb, by taking εὐδοκία ἐν ἀνθρώποις as the predicate, and the rest of the words as the subject of the sentence. Various, indeed, have been the methods of interpretation propounded by Commentators of the last half century; all liable, more or less, to objection. First, I must maintain that the sentence is grammatically trimembria. For though some eminent Commentators recognise only two members and a corollary, that is surely conceding the very point in dispute; the corollary clause constituting a third. That third, indeed, is in some measure exegetical of the preceding; ἐν ἀνθρώποις corresponding to ἐπὶ γῆς (which corresponds to ἐν ὑψίστοις scil. τόποις of the first number), and εὐδοκία ἐν εἰρήνῃ. At the second member Θεῷ must be supplied from the first, and be taken for πρὸς τὸν Θεόν. Εὐδοκία is in apposition with and explanatory of ἐπὶ γῆς εἰρήνη; and Θεοῦ or αὐτοῦ must be supplied from the preceding; the meaning being, 'acceptance with God.' So εὐδοκία, 1 Cor. x. 5. Thus the sentence is grammatically trimembria, but in sense bimembria. In such cases of apposition 3 ἔστι is understood; and thus no copula is necessary. It is plain that we must supply, in the last clause, not ἔστι (as in the two preceding), but ἔστι. Εἰρήνη here is used as supra i. 79, and especially infra xix. 38, where we have a similar doxological form: εὐλογημένοι ὁ ἐρχόμενος βασιλεὺς ἐν ὀνόματι Κυρίου· εἰρήνη ἐν οὐρανῷ, καὶ δόξα ἐν ὑψίστοις! And in this sense the word occurs perpetually in the Epistles of St. Paul. Indeed our Lord had been predicted of by Isaiah ix. 6, under the name of the Prince of peace.

16. καὶ οἱ ἄνθρωποι, οἱ ποιμένες, &c.] On the use of καὶ here see Note on v. 21. The next words of ἀνθρ. are not pleonastic; for the use of the Art. before each forbids us to suppose here the common idiom ἀνθρώποις μόντοις; but the latter term is in apposition with, and exegetical of, the former; q. d. 'the men, i. e. the shepherds (spoken of at v. 8.) said to each other.' So Thucyd. viii. 77, οἱ δὲ πεμφθέντες ἐς Σάμον, οἱ δὲ καὶ πρὸς βίαντα, &c.

—τὸ ρῆμα.] Commentators here take ρῆμα for πρᾶγμα, as in several other passages. So in the Heb. דָּבָר, and the Greek Classical ῥῆμα and λόγος. There is, however, generally a sort of significatio praeponens, the word denoting a thing spoken of. Here τὸ γεγονός is added by way of explanation.

16. ἐν τῇ φάτνῃ.] Render, 'in the manger.'

19. συνετήρει τὰ ῥήματα τ.γ. 'kept them in mind,' kept her mind upon the event of them.

— συμβάλλουσα. Some explain this, 'endeavouring to comprehend.' A sense which rests on no sufficient authority. Others, better, 'forming conjectures respecting,' namely, by comparing past with present events. But far more natural and agreeable to the context is the common interpretation, 'pondering, revolving,' as in many passages of the Classical writers. It is well observed by Mr. Barker, Class. J. No. 3, that συμβάλλειν means to enter into the meaning of a thing by comparing [putting together, as we say] circumstances; and is used particularly of oracles, dreams, or any such things, whose meaning is not obvious, but is attained by reflection and a comparison of circumstances. 'Ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ belongs both to συνετήρει and συμβάλλουσα. So Dan. vii. 28, καὶ τὸ ῥῆμα ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ μου συνετήρησαν.

20. ὑπέστρεψαν. This (for the common reading ἐπέστ.) is found in almost all the MSS. and early Editions, is confirmed by numerous passages from this Gospel and the Acts, and is, with reason, adopted by every Critical Editor from Wetstein to Scholz.

21. αὐτόν. This (for the common reading τὸ παιδίον) is found in almost all the best MSS., Versions, and early Editions; and is rightly edited by Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz. The common one is evidently a correction.

— καὶ ἐκλήθη. The καὶ here is somewhat perplexing; and hence was thrown out by the ancient Critics. Modern Expositors have, more properly, endeavoured to account for it. Winer thinks it arose from a confounding of two constructions; while Kuinoel and Bornem. regard it as a brevity of expression, for τότε περιετμήθη καὶ ἐκλήθη; or for οὐ μόνον περιετ. ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐκλ. A most artificial and far-fetched view. It should rather seem that this expression is to be referred to that idiom (commonly esteemed Hebraistic, but in reality Classical, Greek) by which καὶ is used in the apodosis to a preceding clause, containing a notation of time, either expressed or implied, as Thucyd. i. 50, ἥδη δὲ ἦν ὄψις, καὶ οἱ Κερ. &c. Also Xenoph. An. vi. 4, 26, Σχεδὸν δ' ὅτι ταῦτα ἦν καὶ ἥλιος ἰδύετο. Consequently, in those cases it may be rendered, 'and then,' or 'then also,' and sometimes simply then. Though the idiom has so little correspondence to modern modes of expression, that to us it may be regarded as elegantly pleonastic.

22. αἱ ἡμέραι τοῦ καθ. Which were thirty-three, in addition to the seven days of the mother's uncleanness, Levit. xiv. 2, 6.

22. παραστήσαι. The term is used, like the Latin admoovere and sistere, κατ' ἐξοχήν, both of victims brought to the altar, and of offerings consecrated to God. There is here much variety of reading. Some copies have αὐτοῦ; others αὐτῆς; but most αὐτῶν. For the first two readings there is little or no authority. Αὐτῆς is justly suspected to be a παραδιόρθωσις, or improper correction; and to have proceeded from the supposition of those who were scandalized at the idea of impurity being ascribed to Jesus. Whereas they ought to have considered that the impurity was only external and ceremonial, not moral; it being merely an obligation and restraint laid on women newly brought to bed, until after the performance of certain rites.

23. ἅγιον τ. κ. κληθήσεται. 'must be accounted as holy;' Fut. for Imp. by Hebrewism. Διανοίγον μήτραν. Figurative for 'first-born.'

24. ζεύγος. Rarely used of birds, but occurring in Herodot. iii. 76, and elsewhere.

25. Συμεὼν. Supposed by Wetstein to be the father of Gamaliel.

25. δίκαιος καὶ εὐλαβής. Of these terms the former is explained by most Commentators to denote one who observes the outward ceremonies

παράκλησιν τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ, καὶ Πνεῦμα † ἅγιον ἦν ἐπ' αὐτόν· 26 καὶ ἦν αὐτῷ κεχρηματισμένον ὑπὸ τοῦ Πνεύματος τοῦ ἁγίου, 29 εἶπε· Ὁ Νῦν ἀπολύεις τὸν δούλόν σου, Δέσποτα, κατὰ τὸ c. Gen. 46.

 30 ῥῆμά σου, ἐν εἰρήνῃ, ὅτι εἶδον οἱ ὀφθαλμοί μου τὸ σωτή-
 31 ρίόν σου, ὃ ἠτοίμασας κατὰ πρόσωπον πάντων τῶν λαῶν·

of the Law; the latter, one who cultivates the inward devotion of the heart. But this view appears too much accommodated to Jewish notions. There is no reason why δικ. should not mean (in the usual sense) a person of integrity and uprightness, discharging faithfully his duties towards men; and ἀλλ. one pious and devout, scrupulously performing his duties towards God; thus denoting rather more than εὐσεβής, which is found in some MSS. See Acts x. 22. Nor is this sense without examples in the Classical writers from Plato downwards.

— παράκλησιν τ. [I.] i. e. by metonymy of abstract for concrete, Παράκλητον, the Consoler, a name, by the Jews of that age, and long afterwards, used to designate the expected Messiah, with reference to the language of the Prophets, which would then be brought peculiarly to mind by the oppression under which they were groaning from the Gentiles. As to the reason why the Article is not here used, that probably is, because Παράκλησις τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ was so commonly used of the Messiah, that it became in the end a kind of proper name; inasmuch that (as we learn from Lightfoot) men used to swear by the Messiah under that title. Πνεῦμα ἅγ., i. e. 'the influence of the Holy Spirit.' See Middleton. For ἅγιον ἦν very many MSS. have ἦν ὅν, which is edited by Matthæi, Griesbach, Voss, and Scholz.

25. ἐν αὐτῷ κεχρ.] The more usual construction would be κεχρηματισμένοι ὑπὸ τοῦ Πν., as in Matth. ii. 12. Acts x. 22. and elsewhere. Χεχρηματισμένος signifies to give a χρῆμα (anciently synonymous with χρησμός), or oracular and Divine admonition. In what manner this was in the present case conveyed; whether by oral communication, dream, or otherwise, cannot with certainty be determined. Ἰδεῖν θάνατον is a Hebraism answering to יָרָא מָוֶת. It never occurs in the Classical writers, though εἶδεν ἰδεῖν and εἰδεῖν are cited from the Poets.

27. ἐν τῷ Πν.] 'under the influence of the Spirit.' Ἐπ., like the Heb. 2, by, is often synonymous with διὰ, denoting the moving cause. τὸ εἰθισμένον, for τὸν εἰθισμόν, or τὸ ἔθος, which, like δικαίωμα, denoted the rites of the Law.

28. ἀπολύεις.] Ἀπολύειν signifies properly to let go from any place (or figuratively from any state, which implies coercion) to any other place, as home, &c.; and it is used either with ἐκ, ἀπὸ, or ἀπὸ, and sometimes, as here, it is employed figuratively, and by euphem-

ism, of death, with the addition of τοῦ σώματος, or of τοῦ ζῆν, as is usual in the Classical writers, though in the Scriptural ones without it, as here and in Num. xx. 29. and Gen. xv. 2. The term was by the Classical writers used partly of deliverance from confinement, and restoration to liberty; partly of deliverance from labours and anxieties of various kinds, not only by the being eased of laborious duties, but by removal from them by death; thus attesting 'a hope full of immortality'; inasmuch as, amidst various metaphors, the body is supposed to enchain the soul, and detain it from its native home. Accordingly the sense of the passage is, 'Now, Lord, thou dost [by this sight] dismiss me to the grave, as thou promisedst, in peace and tranquillity, because mine eyes have seen thy salvation,' i. e. the author of it. Hence there is no occasion to suppose, with many, that ἀπολύεις is for ἀπολύσεις. The aged saint, by a beautiful figure, takes this sight of his Redeemer as a dismissal from the burden of life, a sort of Go in peace! So Beresith R. 63. 16. 'Melius, ait, fuisse illi ut dimitteretur in pace.' And Statius, Theb. vii. 366, cited by Wetstein, 'Et fessum vitā dimitte, Parca?' I add Æschyl. Agam. 522. Blomf., where the herald, out of joy, on again seeing his native country, exclaims, ταῦτά μιν δ' οὐκ ἔτ' ἀντερῶ θάοιτε. 'Ὅτι, after ἐν εἰρήνῃ, is to be closely connected therewith, and rendered, not 'for,' but 'because.' Now this construction is common when a verb or adjective precedes; why, then, should it not be allowed after an adjectival phrase? The other signification requires much unauthorized subaudition to make out any construction, as will appear from consulting the Paraphrasts. Δεσπότης is in Scripture often used as here of the supreme Lord, i. e. God; though in the Classical writers the highest sense it bears is as used of Sovereigns.

30. εἶδον οἱ ὀφθ.] In οἱ ὀφθ. μου there is an emphasis and energy, as in Gen. xiv. 12. Job xix. 27. xlii. 5. 1 John i. 1. Τὸ σωτήριον, Neut. adjective for substantiv, as in Luke ii. 30. Eph. iii. 6. Paal. xcviii. 2. See Matth. Gr. Gr. § 627. It is here put for σωτήριον. Κατὰ πρόσωπον is nearly equivalent to ἐνώπιον. This is not a mere Hebraism, since several examples have been adduced from the Classical writers. There is, however, this difference between the Classical and the Scriptural usage,—that in the former the phrase is usually significant, in the latter, generally pleonastic. Here, however, it has much force; the full sense being, 'On whom all nations may fix their eyes,' as the object of their faith and hope.

Καὶ ἦν Ἄννα προφῆτις, θυγάτηρ Φανουὴλ, ἐκ φυλῆς 36

32. φῶς—ἐθνῶν.] This is in apposition with τὸ σωτήριον σὺν at ver. 30. Grotius observes, that the passage has reference to Is. xlii. 6. and Psal. xcvi. 2, from which it should seem that there is here a transposition, for φῶς ἐθνῶν, εἰς ἀποκάλυψιν. But εἰς ἀποκ. does not, I conceive, mean (as Grotius and others suppose) 'for a revelation of the righteousness of God;' but is better explained by Euthymius εἰς ἀνάβλεψιν τῶν ἐθνῶν, scil. τετυφλωμένων τῇ πλάνῃ.

33. ἦν] 'per synopsen, for ἦσαν, Doric, or Boeotic,' say the Commentators. It was not, however, peculiar to the Doric. It was rather an ancient usage, but could not well arise from Syncope; though it was caught up (together with many other syncopated words) by the Poets, to suit their convenience.

34. οὗτος κεῖται, &c.] The imagery is supposed to be taken from Is. viii. 14. xxviii. 16, which passages are applied to the Messiah in Rom. ix. 33. See Grotius, Wolf, Le Clerc, and Wets., who remark, that under the figure of a stone lying in a path, on which heedless persons may trip, Christ is designated as a rock of stumbling to those who reject him, but a rock of support to those who avail themselves of his aid. Κεῖσθαι εἰς is not to be regarded as implying fatality; but must be taken in a popular acceptance for to be ordained or appointed for any thing, as in Phil. i. 17. and 1 Thess. iii. 3. Πτώσιν and ἀνάστασιν are to be taken, respectively, of sin and misery,—and of reformation and happiness; i. e. as to the event, namely, that he should be the occasion of sin to many, who would reject him, and be the occasion of many being raised from the bondage of sin to repentance, faith, and salvation through him.

—εἰς σημεῖον, scil. αἰῶνι.] There are few passages on the sense of which Interpreters are less agreed than the present, and that from the extensiveness of signification in the word σημεῖον. The chief point, however, to be considered is, not what it might mean any where, but what it may by the context be determined to mean here, especially as forming part of a phrase. This principle will reduce the multitude of interpretations to only two that have any appearance of truth. 1. Σημεῖον may, with the Pesch. Syr., Beza, Brug., Maldon., Macknight, and Doddridge, be supposed to stand for σκοπὸν, and mean, like the Latin signum, 'a mark or butt to be shot at;' and thus, by a figure derived from archery, denote the deliberate malice of Christ's persecutors. So Lament. Jer. li. 12. 'He hath bent his bow, and set me as a mark for the arrow,' ἰσθῆλυσέ με ὡς σκοπὸν εἰς βέλος. Indeed such metaphors are not unfrequent in the Old Test. See Gen. xlix. 23. Ps. xi. 2 and also Philo Jud. in Roc. Syn. The metaphor, too, is highly applicable to Christ's passion, which seems alluded to at v. 35.

To this interpretation, however, it has been objected, that the metaphor fails at ἀντιλεγόμενον, and that no example of such a sense of σημεῖον has been adduced. These arguments are, however, not of sufficient weight to overturn an interpretation which has so much to recommend it. Yet, as there seems little doubt that the pious scribes had in his mind the words of Is. viii. 14—18, ο σημεῖον may justly be supposed to bear the same sense here which it does there; and thus we may, with Grotius and most other eminent Expositors, take the meaning to be, that 'Christ should be a signal example of virtue calumniated.' Ἀντλ. is to be understood of actions as well as words, like ἀντιλογία at Heb. xii. 3, which passage is highly illustrative of the present.

35. καὶ—δὲ] 'quis—imo.' Σοῦ αὐτῆς. Not merely for σπανίτης, but put separate for emphasis' sake. See Matth. Gr. Gr. § 148. In τῇ ψυχῇ, δ. ῥομφαία we have figurative language, similar to what is found in the Poetic parts of the Old Testament, and indeed in the ancient Greek Poets, by which the mind is said to be wounded as the body is transfixed with arrows, swords, &c. See Prov. xii. 18, and several citations in Recens. Synop. We can be at no loss to imagine the many ways in which this prophecy was fulfilled in the mother of Jesus, without supposing, as some have done, that the words were meant to signify that she should suffer martyrdom.

—ὅπως ἂν ἀποκαλυφθῶσιν ἐκ π. κ. &c.] i. e. 'in order that thereby the real character of every one [as to truth and virtue] may be displayed.' Or ὅπως may here, as in some other passages, have the eventual sense, so as that, εὐλογεῖν Διὰ λ. denotes properly cogitations, but also purposes, as vi. 8, and as here, dispositions of mind. The expression is best illustrated by the very similar ones, Judg. v. 15. 'for the divisions of Reuben there were great thoughts of heart,' and 16. 'great searchings of heart.' [Comp. also 1 Cor. xi. 19.]

36. προφῆτις.] Of the various senses which have been assigned to this term, the best founded may probably be that of the ancient Expositors, and, of the modern ones, Grotius and Schleiermacher, 'one endued with the χάρισμα or spiritual gift of uttering Divine revelations; or, in a general way, one to whom God reveals himself by his spirit. 7. χήρα.] Supply γυνή, which is sometimes omitted, especially in the earlier writers. The very long widowhood of Anna is particularly admired in, since virtuous widowhood was held in great honour among the Jews, and even Gentiles. And monogamy was held in high esteem among the nations of antiquity. See Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6. 4. Val. Max. ii. 1. 3. and Quintil. Declam. 306.

— ἐκ ἀφίστατο—νύκτα καὶ ἡμ.] An hyperbolic expression, importing that she assiduously attended at all the stated periods of public worship, both day and night (for there were occasionally night-services of sacred music); and also that she spent most of her time in the Temple, occupied in prayer and holy meditation.

— νηστείας καὶ δεήσεις λατρ.] Commentators have failed to notice the unusualness of this phrase. Λατρεύειν is here employed, like inservire in Latin for coarsare, in the very unusual sense, to be devoted to anything. The nearest approach to which is that use by which λατρεύειν sometimes signifies honour with a dative of person, as at Acta xxvii. 23.

33. ἐπιστάσα] 'coming up,' as at x. 40. Ἀνθῳμολογεῖτο, i. e. at the time that Symeon uttered the above words. Ἀνθωμολογεῖτο τῷ Κ. This is by some rendered, 'returned thanks.' That time, however, is confined to the Classical writers; and even in them has χάρις added, and is accompanied by no Dative. It is better to adopt the sense which the word bears in some kindred passages of the LXX. (as Ps. lxxix. 13.), and render, 'returned praises to the Lord.' The two significations, however, merge into each other. Ἱερουσαλὴμ here seems to include the notions of sanctity and redemption. Most of the Jews sought only of the temporal, while the wisest took it in the spiritual sense.

34. χάρις Θεοῦ, &c.] Raphaelus, Wetstein, Campbell, and Wakefield take these words, (by an irony connected with the oblique cases of Θεός, denote greatness, or excellence, and, by a con-mon signification of χάρις, grace,) to denote that he was of extraordinary comeliness. But there is no example of such a sense of χάρις in the New Test., nor any nearer approach to it than gracefulness of speech; which cannot here apply. Besides, χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ is of such frequent occurrence in the New Test. (especially in St. Luke's writings), that the Evangelist would never have ventured on introducing such an idiom of Θεός as that just adverted to in this case, since misapprehension would be sure to arise. In fact, χάρις Θεοῦ, except in a few passages where it has reference to the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, always denotes in the New Test. the favour of God to men. And that it is so taken here, is placed beyond doubt by a kindred passage, infra v. 52.

41. ἐπορεύοντο.] All the males were required to attend at the three festivals at Jerusalem; and females, though not commanded, yet used often to appear there, especially at the Passover.

42. ἀναβάντων αὐτῶν.] The αὐτῶν includes Jesus; which, indeed, is implied in the preceding words ὅτε ἐγένετο i. e.; for the age of 12 years (which was considered the age of puberty, and was that when the children were put to learn some trade) was, as appears from the Rabbinical writers, that at which the above obligation was thought binding; when, too, they were solemnly introduced into the Church, and initiated in its doctrines and ceremonies.

44. ἐν τῇ συνοδίᾳ.] The word properly denotes 'a journeying together,' and then, by metonymy, a company of fellow travellers.

— ἀνέζητουν 'sought him out,' i. e. diligently. So Thucyd. ii. 8. πάντα ἀνέζητεῖτο. The ἐν a little after is not found in several ancient MSS. and Versions, and is cancelled by Griesbach and Lachman, but retained by Tittman, Vater, and Scholz, judiciously; for internal evidence is here perhaps as strong for as against the word, and external far stronger.

44. τοῖς γνωστοῖς] 'acquaintance.' The word very rarely occurs as a substantive, (being properly a participle or adjective) though it is so found in Ps. lxxviii. 9.

46. μεθ' ἡμ. τρεῖς] 'on the third day.' The first was spent in their journey; and the second in their return to Jerusalem. On the third they found him.

— ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ.] By this is meant a court in which the doctors sat, for the purpose of public instruction. We need not press on the sense of ἐν μέσῳ, which may simply mean 'among them;' the sense being, as Bornem. explains, 'sedeat inter doctores, namely, so as to be seen and heard by all. Nor are we from ἐπερωτῶντα αὐτοῖς to suppose any thing like disputation, but modest interrogation. Indeed, it is plain from the Rabbinical citations in Lightfoot, that the Jewish doctors used such a plan of instruction as dealt much in interrogation, both on the part of the teachers and the taught. Something very similar occurs in the account given by Josephus of his boyhood, Life, § 2:—'Εγὼ δὲ συμπαιδευόμενος, εἰς μεγάλην παιδείαν προέκοπτον ἐπίδοσιν, μνήμη τε καὶ συνέσει δοκῶν διαφέρειν. Ἐπὶ δ' ἄρα παῖς ὢν, περὶ τισσαρισκαϊδικάτων ἔτος, διὰ τὸ φιλογράμματον ὑπὸ πάντων ἐπηνούμην, συνιόντων αἱ τῶν ἀρχιερίων καὶ τῶν τῆς πόλεως πρίσταν, ὑπὲρ τοῦ παρ' ἐμοῦ περὶ τῶν νομίμων ἀκριβέστερον τι γινῶναι.

47. τῇ συνέσει] 'intelligence,' 'natural sagacity.' So Thucyd. i. 138. φύσεισιν ἰσχυρὸν δηλώσας· οἰκία γὰρ ἐξνήσει, &c. Similarly Joseph. Ant. ii. 9, 6. says of Moses: σύνεσις δὲ οὐ κατὰ τὴν ἡλικίαν ἐφύετο, αὐτῷ· τοῦ δὲ ταύτης μέτρου πολλὸν κρείττεον· καὶ πρῆβντιέραν διδίδκειν ταύτης τὴν περιουσίαν ἐν ταῖς παιδείαις, καὶ μεζόνων τῶν ὑπ' ἀνδρὲς γινουμένων ἐπαγγελίαν εἶχε τὰ τότε παρτιτόμενα. In τῇ συνέσει καὶ ταῖς ἀποκ. there is no Hendiadys (as Kuinoel imagines) but ἐν ταῖς ἀποκρ. is added, to show in what that σύνεσις especially consisted.

49. ἐν τοῖς τοῦ Πατρὸς μου.] Commentators are perplexed with this elliptical expression, in which some supply πράγμασι; others, οἰκίᾳ·

μασι. The former is well supported by Classical examples, and if this were a Classical author, it would deserve the preference, but in an Hellenistic writer the proof is invalid. It is therefore better, with the ancient and a great majority of the modern Commentators, to supply οἰκίᾳ, of which ellipsis Wetstein has adduced abundance of examples, both from the Classical and Scriptural writers. So Gen. xli. 51. Eccles. xlii. 10. Comp. John ii. 16. As, however, the question in respect to suitableness is nearly equal, and the former sense is more significant, and in some measure includes the latter, but not vice versa,—we may yet hesitate. Is it not possible that our Lord might speak with studied ambiguity, by making choice, as often, of an expression admitting of two senses? A principle which might especially be resorted to where one sense included the other. Neither of these, however, could well suggest itself to the parents of Christ; and the words in question were merely uttered in order to suggest matter for serious reflection, and to be comprehended afterwards; of which several other instances might be adduced. An effect which our Lord well knew they would produce on his mother.

51. ἦν ὑποτασσόμενος αὐτοῖς.] Ὑποτασσόμενος is used not only of forcible and compulsory, but also voluntary subjection and double obedience, as that of wives to husbands, or children to parents.

— διετήρει πάντα τὰ ῥήματα, &c.] Ῥήματα may here include both sayings and deeds, i. e. the words spoken, and all the circumstances connected with the affair just before spoken of.

The remark seems formed on that of Gen. xxvii. 11. ὁ δὲ πατήρ αὐτοῦ διετήρησεν αὐτὰ ῥήματα.

52. προέκοπτε, &c.] 'advanced.' By a metaphor taken from the falling of trees, or cutting of thickets, to effect a passage. 'Ελάφις is some interpreted stature, by others, age. The latter sense is possibly the true one, and is more agreeable to Classical usage; but it would still have required a double καὶ before σοφίᾳ; and the former is more suitable to the context. S.

III. 1. On the chronological questions contained in this passage, the reader is referred to Hales, Mr. Benson, and Mr. Townsend.
[In the margin: 'A. and K.] (Comp. infra Acts iv. xviii. 15.) There has been much perplexity aroused by the use, in the Gospels and also Josephus, of phraseology expressing or implying plurality, where the Law recognised but one strict propriety there could be but one High Priest at a time, who held the office for life. But, in the subjection of Judaea to the Roman yoke, as changes were made; and the occupants of an office, in which had been vested almost regal authority, were changed at the will of the conquerors.
Some have supposed that the office had become annual, and that Annas and Caiaphas serving it by turns, each, or both, might be said to be the High Priest. This, however, is a wholly unfounded supposition, and overturned by what is said in Joseph. Ant. xviii. 2. 2. Others think that Caiaphas was the High Priest, and Annas Sagan, or Deputy; a title given to him by Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6, 24. And great was the power of the Sagan, who was allowed, upon occasion, to perform the most sacred functions of the High Priest. Others, again, imagine that the office is given to Annas, as being the chief of his family then alive, and being regarded as the rightful High Priest by the Jews, though Caiaphas held the office by appointment of the Roman Governor. These last two methods likewise proceed on supposition; and although there is nothing which contradicts either, there is no reason for giving a preference to one or the other.

privileges of the Gospel extended to them as well as the Jews.

10. τί οὖν ποιήσομεν;] q. d. 'What then shall we do, to render such fruits, and to avoid the wrath to come?' [Comp. Acts ii. 37.]

11. αὐτοῖς.] Charity, then, is here enjoined, as a prominent part of that moral virtue in which the hearers were so notoriously deficient. [Comp. I John iii. 17. iv. 20.]

12. τί ποιήσομεν;] The Future here and just before is to be rendered by must rather than shall; a Hebraism. The ποιήσωμεν of many ancient MSS., edited by Scholz, is only a gloss.

13. μηδὲν πλέον—πράσσετε.] exact. This use of πράσσειν, as said of levying taxes (like perficere in Latin), is frequent in the Classical writers. The original sense seems to have been 'to manage.' The difference between the active and middle forms is this: the active signifies to collect for another's use, the middle to collect for one's own. Διατάσσειν is a vox signata, used of legal enactments, especially such as relate to laying on taxes. The παρὰ after a comparative, or a word which implies comparison (especially μέλλων or κρείττων), is used for ἢ, both in the Scriptural and Classical writers. So Appian, vol. ii. 78. πλείονες παρὰ τοὺς ἀρχαίους. The literal sense is 'alongside of'; and juxtaposition almost implies comparison. The Baptist does not, we see, condemn their profession, but only the abuse of the power it gave them. [Comp. infra xix. 8. I Cor. vi. 10.]

14. στρατευόμενοι.] Michaelis thinks that this denotes 'men under arms, or going to battle;' for he imagines that Herod's war with Aretas had already commenced; and that there is here reference to the troops engaged in that service. A chronological reason, however, lies against this supposition, so strong, that it is better, with the Commentators in general, to take στρατιῶται; which is confirmed by the ancient Versions and Interpreters. The Article may indeed seem wanting; but it may be understood, and indeed is found in several MSS.

—μηδένα διασεισῆτε.] This is by many Commentators taken to mean, 'do not harass'; a signification found in the Classical writers. But some more special sense seems to be intended. It is therefore best explained as equivalent to, and indeed formed on the Latin phrase concussio, 'to extort money by dint of threats of violence.' Συκοφ., signifies to extort money by false accusation, or the threatening of it. [Comp. Exod. xxiii. 1.]

—ἀρκείσθε τοῖς ὀφωνίοις.] In the early ages a soldier's pay consisted chiefly in a supply of food, and was called ὀφώνιον, from ὄφω; and meant something to buy ὄφωσιν withal. Now ὄφωσιν, according to Boeck, i. 187, originally signified every thing used as food, with the exception of what was prepared from corn; and that is what is here meant. In process of time an equivalent in money was substituted for the supply of food; and the ὀφώνιον, which had originally signified supply, came to denote pay: though still some allowance of food were left the soldier, which probably opened a way to the extortion alluded to. Much light is thrown on the matter by a passage of Joseph. de Vit. § 47. συνεβούλευον (namely, the soldiers), πρὸς μηδὲνα μὲτα πολέμου, πρὸς ἀρπαγὴ λαμβάνειν τὰς χώρας (harass), καὶ σκηνῶν κατὰ τὸ πίδιον ἀρκευμένους τοῖς αὐτοῖς ἐφοδίοις.

15. προσδοκῶντος τοῦ λαοῦ.] i. e. as the people were in suspense and anxious expectation; as Acts xxviii. 6. Ἀπεκρ., 'addressed them.'

16. ἑταίροις.] i. e. both those there, and those at Jerusalem, who (we learn from John i. 19) had sent a message of inquiry. On this comp. John i. 26. Acts i. 5. xi. 16. xii. 28. & xlv. 3. Joel ii. 28. Acts ii. 4.

19 Φιλίππου.] This is not found in very many MSS., and almost all the early Editions, and has been, with reason, cancelled by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz. [Comp. Matt. xiv. 1. Mark vi. 17.]

21. ἐν τῷ βαπτισθῆναι, &c.] A difference is to be noted between ἐν τῷ βαπτισθῆναι τὸν λαόν and ἐν τῷ βαπτίζεσθαι τὸν λαόν, of which the latter means, 'while the people were being baptized,' and the former, 'after they were baptized.' Accordingly, in order to render the peculiar meaning of the Greek more distinct, the whole may be rendered thus: 'And it came to pass, after all the people had been baptized, that when Jesus also had been baptized, and was praying, the heaven was opened,' &c.

The words καὶ προσευχ., here added by Luke, and which are not found in the other Evangelists, merit attention. Our Lord, who was content to be obedient unto the Law for man, underwent the same and performed the ceremonies of the Mosaic Law; and on the same principle underwent this baptism, because he wished to set an example to others of 'fulfilling all righteousness.' With respect to the use of prayer by our Lord, it was doubtless to set an example to others of the indispensable necessity of prayer, to make any external effectual. See Bishop Taylor, vol. ii. 190. ἀπὸ περιστερῶν, see Note on Matt. iii.

22. [Comp. Is. xlii. 1. Mark ix. 7. 2 Pet. i. 17.]

23. αὐτὸς ἦν ὁ Ἰησοῦς—ἀρχόμενος.] These words have occasioned much perplexity, not only to modern Commentators, but (as appears from the Varr. Lectt.) to the ancient Interpreters. The phraseology is rugged; yet the harshness must not be removed by cancelling any word (for the consent of MSS. will not permit that); nor even by silencing it. Some seek to remove the difficulty by connecting ὧν with ἀρχ. But this is doing violence to the construction, and yields a feeble and jejune sense. Upon the whole, no interpretation involves so little difficulty as that of the ancient and the best modern Commentators, by which ἦν is construed with ἀρχ., and εἰς understood after ἀρχ. The sense, then, is, 'Jesus was beginning to be of about 30 years,' i. e. he had nearly completed his 30th year, lit., 'was entering upon [the age of about] 30 years,' as Robinson (Lex.) explains. The Gen. ἔτι, he adds, may be governed of ἀνὴρ understood, or ἀρχόμενος. [See Num. iv. 3, 35, 39.]

—ὡς ἠομολ[ετο] 'as he was regarded,' or reckoned by the Jewish customs. This evidently alludes to the Divine origin of our Lord. See Abp. Magee on the Atonement, vol. ii. 422. [Comp. John vi. 42.]

—τοῦ Ἡλ[.] This must mean the son-in-law of Heli, for Jacob was the father of Joseph. So Matt. i. 16. Thus this genealogy must be considered as the lineage of Mary, the daughter of Heli. On the mode of reconciling the seeming discrepancy in the genealogies, see Dr. Hales.

35. Σερούχ.] This (for Σαρούχ) is found in almost all the best MSS., Versions, and early Editions, and is received by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz.

IV. 1. ἐν] for ὑπό; denoting the instrumental cause. So Æschyl. Ag. 1260, οὕτως ἀπαλλάσσουσιν ἐν θεῶν κρίσει.

2. ἡμέρας τεσσαράκοντα.] These words would seem to connect with πειραζόμενος following, as some Editors take them. But St. Matthew describes the temptation as taking place at the close of that period. Most recent Commentators attempt to remove the discrepancy by supposing the meaning to be, not that Jesus was tempted 40 days in succession, but that, at various times during those days, he was exposed to temptations, besides those which the Evangelist now proceeds to enumerate. This method, however, cannot well be admitted. At least it is better, with some ancient and modern Commentators, to connect the words with the preceding, comp. Exod. xxxiv. 28. 1 Kings xix. 8. Πειραζόμενος, however, is not, I conceive, put for πειρασθῆναι, but is a nominativus pendens, for Genit. absolute. This mode of taking the passage is confirmed by Mark i. 13, who here follows Luke: καὶ ἦν ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ ἡμέρας τεσσαράκοντα, πειραζόμενος ὑπὸ τοῦ Σατανᾶ. Moreover, at πειραζόμενος is implied τότε from the context. That, however, will not, as in the case of διὰ τὴν πειρασμὸν, involve any contradiction; since what takes place at the close of any period of time is understood, populariter, to fall within that term.

4. ὁ ἄνθρ., &c.] From Deut. viii. 2. The δ is omitted in very many MSS., and cancelled by Matthæi, Griesbach, and Scholz.

5. ἐν στιγμῇ χρόνου.] Meaning, the shortest space of time. So Plut. de Educ. 17, ἐν τῇ ἐλάχιστῃ χρόνῳ πᾶς ὁ βίος ἐστίν.

6. καὶ τὴν δόξαν αὐτῶν] scil. βασιλείας, i. e. 'and the glory which will result from the government of them.' (Comp. John xii. 31. xiv. 2. Rev. xiii. 2, 7.)

7. πᾶσα.] This (for the common reading πάντα) found in almost all the best MSS., several Versions, Fathers, and early Edd., has been received by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, and others, down to Scholz; and with reason; it being the more difficult reading. Yet πάντα may be defended, as being more natural, and agreeable to the popular style; though propriety requires πᾶσα as referred to ἐξουσίαν.

8. From Deut. vi. 13. 1 Sam. vii. 2. Ἰηρ, and δ in the next verse, not found in the best MSS., are cancelled by almost all the recent Editors.

10. See Ps. xci. 11.

11. The ἐτι, not found in very many MSS., early Edd., and Versions, is cancelled by Matthæi. Indeed, it probably came from the margin, and originated from those Critics who read γέγραπται γάρ ὅτι—ἐντελεῖται; thus regarding the words as not strictly speaking a quotation, but only a report of the sense. And thus the ἐτι would require to be repeated. But it should seem that there is an actual quotation, and therefore the ἐτι is pleonastic.

12. See Deut. vi. 16.

14. ἐν τῇ δυνάμει τοῦ Πν.] 'under the powerful influence of the Spirit.' Καθ' ὅλης, throughout, over all. This sense occurs also in Acts ix. 31, and is sometimes found in the later Classical writers, but is rare elsewhere. The Accus. is the more regular construction.

15. δοξαζόμενος for ἐν δόξῃ αὐν.

16. ἀνέστη ἀναγνῶναι.] For, as Lightfoot and Vitrings have shown, it was the received custom for the Scriptures to be read both by the minister and the people standing. The Pentateuch was so distributed into portions for Sabbath reading, that the whole might be gone through in the year; also that to them should be adjoined some such portion from the Prophets as either had an affinity to the lesson from the Pentateuch, or was selected by the reader for edification.

17. βιβλίον.] The βιβλία of the Hebrews, and, indeed, of the ancients in general, were rolls fastened to two laths with handles; by holding which in his hand, the reader could roll, or unroll the writing at his pleasure.

18.—20.] This portion (introduced, as it seems, out of the regular order) was selected by our Lord in order to draw the attention of the people, and to show its fulfilment in himself; as also with allusion to the reason why he was called CHRIST, and his religion termed the Gospel. Its application to the Messiah is acknowledged by the best Jewish Expositors. Its primary import, indeed, was probably the restoration of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity; but it seems to have had also a secondary reference to the MESSIAH, by that double sense of prophecy, which has two applications, of which the secondary is (as here) not unfrequently the more important.

— πνεῦμα Κυρίου ἐπ' ἐμέ.] Intimating his Divine appointment to say and do as he does.

— ἐχρίσά με.] The term signifies, not so much to anoint as inaugurate into an office; which, in the case of eminent persons (as kings, prophets, priests, &c.) was always conferred by unction. Christ's unction was the descent of the Holy Spirit upon him at his baptism; whereby, as Peter says, Acts x. 38, God anointed him with the Holy Spirit and with power. See also iv. 27. Hence, indeed, the appellation Messiah or Χριστός, i. e. the Anointed.

— εὐαγγελίσασθαι.] This, which is found in very many MSS., and early Edd. (for the common reading εὐαγγαλίσσασθαι) is preferred by almost all Editors from Matthæi to Scholz.

— ἰάσασθαι—καρδίαν.] These words, not found in a few MSS., Versions, and Fathers, have been rejected by Grotius and Mill, and cancelled by Griesbach and others; but most rashly, since they are found both in the Heb. and LXX., and, as they are only omitted in six MSS., we may impute the omission merely to the carelessness of the Scribes. The words probably formed one line of the Archetype (and on that account might be the more easily omitted); especially as the line before began with a word of the same ending as that which commenced this; namely, εὐαγγελίσασθαι. The words, too, are required by the parallelism; in which πτωχοῖς and συντετρ. τὴν καρδίαν correspond to each other, the latter signifying the afflicted or contrite, the former the distressed or poor in spirit; according as the literal or the spiritual sense be adopted. Συντ. is occasionally found even in the Classical writers, in a metaphorical sense, of mental sorrow. Thus Plutarch vi. 171, 8, μὴ συντριβεσθαι δὴ, μηδὲ ἀθυμῶν τὸν ἐλεγχόμενον. Polyb. v. 58, 13. It is a stronger term than λυπεῖσθαι.

The correspondent terms which follow, αἰχμαλώτοις, τυφλοῖς, and τεθραυσμένοις, have likewise a double sense. 'Αφείσι, in the sense of deliverance from captivity, is found also in the Classical writers. With respect to τυφλοῖς, the sense of the Hebrew, 'those who are bound,' is greatly preferable, though the other may be justified, by taking the term to denote those who are as it were blind with long confinement in dark dungeons. In the spiritual sense, αἰχμ. will denote those who are bound with the chain of sin; and τυφλοῖς, those who are blinded by sin and Satan; namely, 'the blind people that have eyes' (Is. xliii. 8), or those that 'seeing, see not.' (Matt. xiii. 13.) The next clause ἀποσταίλαι—ἀφείσι is not found in either the Hebrew or LXX. in this passage, though it is at C. 58. It was, no doubt, inserted, in reading, from that passage, as being illustrative. 'Ἐν ἀφείσι is not, as most Commentators imagine, for eis ἀφείσιν; but may be rendered 'in freedom,' a phrases for the adjective free.

19. κηρύξαι—δεκτόν. This sums up the whole of the above, in words which contain an allusion to the year of Jubilee; when, by sound of trumpet, was proclaimed deliverance, and restoration of every kind. Thus it is meant, that the Gospel is to the Law what the Jubilee year was as compared to all others. In the application, ἐνιαυτὸν will denote time generally, as in the Hebrew. Δεκτόν is for ἀρεστόν, as 2 Cor. vi. 2, καιρὸς δεκτός. The word is not found in the Classical writers.

κηρύξαι αἰχμαλώτοις ἀφείσιν, καὶ τυφλοῖς ἀνάβλεψιν· ἀποστεῖλαι τεθραυσμένους ἐν ἀφείσει· κηρύξαι ἐνιαυτὸν Κυρίου δεκτόν. 20. τῷ ὑπηρέτῃ i. e. the Chazan or officer who had charge of the sacred books. 'Ἐκάθισε' As those did who proceeded to address some instruction to the people, after having read the portion of Scripture. See Vitringa de Syn. Jud. p. 899.

21. ἐν τοῖς ὤσιν ὑμῶν 'in your hearing.' So most Commentators take it. It is better (with the Syr., Bengel, De Dieu, and Campbell) to render, 'which ye have just heard;' literally, 'which is now in your ears.' This, however, involves so harsh a catachresis, that thus we must suppose an ellipsis of ἡ. A strongly Hebraic idiom.

22. ἐμαρτύρουν α.] Μαρτυρεῖν with a Dative signifies, 'to bear testimony to, or for,' and almost always implies in favour of. The word here expresses commendation on the grounds afterwards mentioned. 'Ἐθαύμαζον ἑαυτοὺς, &c., is exegetical of the preceding. This syntax of θαυμάζω with ἑαυτοὺς (at) occurs also in Mark xii. 17, and sometimes in the Classical writers. Διὰ or ἐν is more usual. Τῆς χάριτος is a Genit. of a substantive put for an adjective (graceful and eloquent).

23. πάντως εἰπέτε, κίμειται.
— Ἰατρὲ, θεράπευσον σεαυτὸν. An idiom common alike to Hebrew, Greek, and Latin writers.

— γενόμενα scil. ὅπερ σοῦ. Πείσων ἀέ. Namely, as a full proof that thou art the passage foretold by Isaiah.

24. Our Lord now proceeds to show why he would not give them the proof they ask. And here we have the first argument in answer to the objection supposed at ver. 23.

25—27. We have here the second argument in answer to the above; that God has a right to, and will, dispense his extraordinary favours as he pleases; and that He does this in a way which sometimes appears strange to men's judgments, but is nevertheless consistent with perfect wisdom and equity; as in the instance adverted to, 1 King xvii. 9, and 2 Kings v. 1, 14. Or rather (as it has been observed) our Lord calls their attention to two cases where acknowledged prophets had so little honour in their own nation, that they bestowed their favours on foreigners; q. d. Such is

25. ἐκλείσθαι] for ἐκλείσθαι. In ἐκλείσθαι we have a metaphor occurring also in Rev. xi. 6, and Eccles. xlviii. 3. Ὡς is for ὥσπερ. So, with the same syntax, we have the Indicative in Mark iv. 27, and Heb. iii. 11.

26. εἰ μὴ εἰς Σάρεπτα.] On this use of εἰ μὴ, preceded by a negative sentence, and involving an ellipsis in which the verb is repeated, see Robinson's Lex. Γυναῖκα χήραν is not so much a pleonasm as a primitive oratio plena, like the Latin vidua mulier in Terence, and our widow-woman.

29. ἐξέβαλον ἔξω τῆς π.] So Ælian, V. H. ix. 12, ἐξέβαλον τῆς πόλεως.

— καὶ ἤγαγον.] Render: 'and they were leading or taking him,' &c.

— ὄφρους.] This is one of the terms denoting parts of the body, (such as μαστὲρ, δαιρὲν, στήν, στήνισσα, and the Latin dorsum, ventus, cervice, pes); which were also applied to describe various objects in nature, especially hills. The τῆς before ὄφρους is not found in very many MSS., and the early Editions, and is cancelled by most recent Editors.

— κατακρημνίσαι] 'hurl him down the precipice.' A death sometimes, as among the Romans, adjudged by the law, as in the case of sacrilege; of which, it seems, these superstitious zealots thought him guilty. See Philo ap. Euseb. viii. p. 392, νόμον καίμινος, τοῦ ἱερὸς οὐλοῦ κατακρημνίσσασθαι. In the present instance, however, it would have been a mere tumultuary proceeding, like the stoning of Stephen.

30. διελθὼν διὰ μέσου αὐτῶν.] Whether by any supernatural power, is not expressed, but it seems to be implied. Most recent Commentators, indeed, discountenance that idea; taking διελθὼν to mean, 'gliding through them;' as in John viii. 59 (where see Note). But this is an unwarrantable straining of the sense. For, as is well observed by Abp. Newcome, the Evangelist leaves us to conclude supernatural power; it being the manner of the sacred historians not to magnify our Lord's supernatural power. That he had a Divine power to controul the wildest passions of men, is certain from other parts of Scripture. And as illustrating the supernatural power by which he was thus enabled to 'pass through the midst of' his most deadly enemies unhurt, we have only to advert to the words of St. John vii. 30, in a very similar instance.

31—44.] See Notes on Mark i. 21—39.

33. πνεῦμα δαιμονίου &c.] There is here a blending of two synonymous expressions, for the sake of greater significancy.

34. See Note on Mark i. 24. [Comp. Pa. xvi. 10. Dan. ix. 24.]

35. τό.] The word is not found in most of the ancient MSS., and almost all the early Editions, and is cancelled by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, and Scholz. Μηδὲν βλάψαν &c., 'after having done him no hurt,' i. e. no injury unto death.

36. Θάμβος.] The term here imports a mingled feeling of amazement and awe.

36. ὁ λόγος οὗτος] 'doctrine,' meaning the Gospel; as supra i. 2.

38. ἡ πενθερά.] The ἡ is not found in most of the ancient MSS. and the Ed. Princ., and other early editions; and is cancelled by Wetstein, Matthiae, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz.

39. ἐπετίμ. τῷ πυρετῷ.] A highly figurative expression, signifying that he 'put a stop to the violence of the fever.'

— ἀφῆκεν α.] So Hippocr. Aph. a. 30, 61, ἀφίησι ὁ πυρετός.

41. ἐξήρχετο] expulsi sunt; neut. for pass., as often in this verb.

— σὺ εἶ, &c.] Comp. Mark iii. 11. Why the demons here confessed the power of their Conqueror, and proclaimed him to be the promised Messiah, was in order to impede his ministry. On which account our Lord checks them, and commands them to be silent.

The words ὁ Χριστός, not found in several ancient MSS., are cancelled by Griesbach and Lachmann; but wrongly; for the omission may well have arisen from the homoteleuton in the two ὁ's.

42. γενομένης ἡμέρας.] Mark adds ἰνυχον λίαν.

— ἐπορεύθη εἰς ἔρημον τόπον.] Mark adds καὶ ἐκαὶ προσήχετο.

— ἐπεζήτουν.] This, for the common reading ἐχέτ., is found in most of the best MSS., and received by all the principal Editors.

— ἕως αὐτοῦ.] Since ἕως is invariably used with a Genit. of place or time only, never of person, I cannot but regard αὐτοῦ, with Wakefield, as put for αὐτόθεν, as often in Scripture. ἕως is used with an adverb of place at Luke xxiii. 5, ἕως αὐτοῦ.

43. ταῖς ἐτέρ. πόλ.] Meaning, to the inhabitants of the other cities,—namely, where the Gospel has not yet been preached.

V. What is related in the 11 first verses of this Chap. agrees with what we find at Matt. v. 18, 22 (where see Note) and Mark i. 16, 20. On which see Dr. Townson.

1. καί.] On this use of καί see Note supra ii. 21.

2. ἰστώτα] i. e. as opposed to being in motion. For the Greeks used στήναι, and the Latin stare, to express the situation of ships, whether at anchor or fastened on shore. So Hom. II. 6. 44, νῆες δὲ ἀγχι θάλασσης ἰστᾶσ'.

Virg. Æn. v. 904, sunt littore puppes.

3. ἐπαναγαγεῖν.] Sub. ναῦν. Comp. Hero-
 dot. vii. 100, τὰς δὲ νῆας οἱ ναύαρχοι ἀναγα-γόντες δσον τε (I conjecture γε) τέσσαρα πλῆθρα ἀπὸ τοῦ αἰγιαλοῦ. The ἐπὶ is equivalent to our ward in composition. On this term, and on κατάγειν, to bring to land, see Wessel.
 on Herodot. iii. 39, and my Note on Thucyd. vol.
 i. p. 52, Transl.

4. ἐπανάγαγε—καὶ χαλάσατε.] This change from the singular to the plural, Bornemann accounts for thus: 'In altum enim navigat, qui cū gubernaculum dirigit, h. l. Simon, sed ad retia projicienda pluribus hominibus opus erat, qui in navi verabantur.' Χαλάειν is a vox sol. de hac re, though ἀφίειναι, καθίειναι, and ῥίπτειν are used by the Classical writers. Ἄγρα signifies the prey taken or caught.

5. ἐπιστάτα.] Ἐπιστάτης properly denotes one who is set over any persons or business, as here that of instruction; and is thus equivalent to master or teacher, used by the other Evangelist.
 The latter sense is rather rare in the Classical writers; when it does occur, it denotes a professor of any art, as opposed to a novice. 'Ρήματι, command. So the Heb. פֶּסַח. This is not, however, merely a Hebraism, since it is found in a monumental inscription in Herodot. vii. 228, αἰμαία, τοῖς καίνοις ῥήμασι παιδόμενοι.

6. συνέκλεισαν.] This and συλλαμβάνειν ἵχθες are terms appropriate to hunting and fishing; of which examples are cited by Wetstein.

—πλήθος ἰχθύων.] This, for the common reading ἰχθύων πλῆθος, is found in very many of the best MSS. and the early Editions, and has been adopted by all the Critical Editors from Wetstein to Scholz.

7. διερρήγυντο] 'was breaking, had begun to break,' i. e. had well nigh broke.

—κατένευσαν.] Literally, 'made signs with their hands, beckoned.' See Note supra i. 22.

 Τοῦ ἔλθοντα. Sub. ἔνεκα, for ἵνα with a Subjunctive. Συλλαβεσθαι, lit. to take hold of with, i. e. help them. The verb has, in complete construction, a Dative of the person, governed of the σὺν in composition, a Genitive of the thing, dependent upon πρὸς understood, and an Accusative of the thing, dependent on κατὰ understood. But in the best Greek writers the Accusative is found almost always omitted; not unfrequently the Genitive; and sometimes all three. 'Ὡστε βυθι-ζεσθαι, 'so that they were sinking,' i. e. ready to sink.

8. Ἐξελθε ἀπ' ἐμοῦ.] Valcknaer takes this to be a popular phrase for 'depart from my ship;' εἰσελθεῖν εἰς τινὰ and ἐξελθεῖν ἀπὸ τινὸς being used to denote entrance to, or departure from, any one's house; as Luke i. 28, εἰσελθὼν πρὸς αὐτήν. Acts xvi. 40, εἰσῆλθον εἰς τὴν Λυδίαν. The proof, however, is as defective as the sense would here be frigid. With respect to the object of this request, to refer it, with most modern Commentators, to Peter's superstitious fears of death or some heavy calamity, as having seen a supernatural being, is neither doing justice to the Apostle, nor is warranted by the context; which requires the more judicious view taken by Euthym., Capell., Grotius, Lightfoot, Doddridge, Rosenmuller, and Kuinoel, who regard it as an exclamation indicative of profound humility and deep reverence; as of one unworthy to appear in the presence of, or associate with, so great a personage. Θάμβος is to be taken as at iv. 36.

9. περιέσχεν] 'possessed,' as 2 Macc. iv. 16.
 Compare Homer, Θάμβος δ' ἔχεν εἰσροῶντα.
 —τῇ ἄγρα τῶν ἰχθύων ἢ συνέλ.] So Eurip.
 Bacch. 1201, ὡς ἴδῃτε τήνδ' ἄγραν—Φηροῖε ἢ

τοὺς διαλογισμοὺς αὐτῶν, ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπε πρὸς αὐτούς· Τί αἰρεῖσθαι, θηράσθαι, are, by the Greek and Hebrew writers, not unfrequently used of those who attach men to themselves; as I have in Recens. Synop. proved by numerous original examples from Xenoph., Diog. Laert., Plutarch, Ælian, and others. Ζωγρᾶν signifies 1. to take any one alive; 2. to capture; 3. to catch, as said of animals. Thus the full sense here is, 'As thou hast hitherto caught fish, thou shalt now catch and win over [to the truth] men.'

14. ἀλλὰ ἀπελθὼν δεῖξον.] This transition from the oblique to the direct address is sanctioned by the usage of the best Classical writers. It may be regarded as a relic of the inartificial simplicity of primitive diction. [Comp. Levit. xiii. 2. xiv. 2, 21, 22.]

17. καὶ δύνανται—αὐτοῖς.] Render, 'and the power of the Lord was [exercised] to heal them.' By Κυρίου some understand God. But that would require μετ' αὐτοῦ (i. e. Christ) to be supplied; an ellipse which can by no means be admitted. By αὐτοῖς must (as the recent Commentators have seen) be meant, not the Pharisees, but the sick.

19. διὰ.] This is omitted in very many MSS. and early Editions, and is cancelled by Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, Tittman, and Scholz; and with reason; for it is plainly an addition of the Scholiasts, as infra xix. 4. Since, however, the omission of διὰ would be very harsh, I am inclined to suspect that ποίας is not the true reading, but ποῦ, sub. ὅθω, which, though not noted from any of the MSS., seems to have been read by the Latin and Vulgate Translators, who render 'quâ parte.' The ε might easily have arisen from the ε following. My conjecture is confirmed by the opinion of Bornem., who cites Schæfer on Apoll. Rhod. i. 934, in proof that ποῖα (sub. μερὶς vel ὅθω) may mean 'quânam parte?' And there is little doubt but that, in the common dialect ποῖα was also used without interrogation for quâ parte.

 pears from the passage of Matthew. Κατακείalso Luke vii. 37. But ἀνακ. is regarded by the Grammarians as the more correct term.

30. αὐτῶν] 'them.' Meaning, the persons present, the Capernaumites. Very many MSS.

 which is received by Matthæi, Griesbach, and Scholz. But the common reading is sufficiently defended by Matt. ix. 11. xi. 19. Luke vii. 34.
 The new reading, indeed, may seem supported by Mark ii. 16. But I suspect the τῶν to have arisen from the τὰ in κατὰ.

 the Scribes and Pharisees mentioned at ver. 30, but, as appears from Matt. ix. 14, the disciples of John, or both these and the Pharisees, Mark ii.

34. See Is. lxii. 5. 2 Cor. xi. 2.

35. καὶ ὅταν ἀπ.] The καὶ is omitted in several MSS. and the greater part of the Versions; and in most of those it is inserted before τότε, exactly as in the parallel passages of Matthew and Mark, and as, I conceive, the Evangelist wrote; for it is difficult to account for a καὶ here. To call it a Hebrew plenam is but to shuffle over the difficulty. And yet it cannot well be rendered nempe with some, or et quidem with others. To construe it with τότε (as do Homberg and Abresch) is doing utter violence to the construction. It should seem that the καὶ was first omitted by accident, then written in the margin as to be inserted, and finally brought in at a wrong place.

— τότε—ἐν ἐκ. τ. ἡμέραις.] A similar mode of expression is cited by Demosth. de Cor. p. 288. τότε τοίνυν κατ' ἐκείνον τὸν καιρὸν.

36. ἐπιβλημα.] This, not found in many MSS., is cancelled by Wetstein, Mill, Markland, Matth., and Tittman, but retained by Scholz and Gratz; rightly; for it would be harsh, and inconsistent with the plain style of Scripture to supply a noun from such a distance. Beside, the word is found in all the Versions, except two later ones of little authority, and more than 3-4ths of the MSS., including some of the most ancient. I cannot therefore but suspect that the omission was accidental. The cause of it will immediately appear, if we consider that many MSS. and Editions have τὸ ἐπιβλημα; for it is obvious how easily the word ἐπιβλημα might be lost by means of the two τὸ's. Thus those very MSS. in which this word is omitted, bear testimony of the existence of the first τὸ in their Archetype. I have therefore admitted it into the text.

39. Of this illustration (which is found only in Luke) the scope is that of the preceding doctrine; namely, that all things should be suited to circumstances,—and that as use forms the taste, so men's long accustomed modes are not readily to be changed, nor can they be suddenly initiated into unwonted austerities.

— Σάββ.] scil. πίνειν, or Σάββα may here be taken in the sense obscure.

VI. 1. ἐν σαββάτῳ δευτ.] It is impossible for me to notice, much less review, the very numerous interpretations which have been propounded of this obscure expression; nor is it necessary; since the only one that has any semblance of truth is that of Theophyl. and Euthym. among the ancients, and Scaliger, Lightf., Cambr., Whitby, Schleusner, Kuinoel, &c. of the moderns; namely, that the sense is the first Sabbath after the second day of unleavened bread; namely, that on which the wave sheaf was commanded to be offered up, and from which, and not the first day of the Passover, the fifty days were reckoned to the Pentecost. Hence it is no wonder that all the Sabbaths from the Passover to the Pentecost should have taken their appellation ἀπὸ τῆς δευτέρας τοῦ πάσχατος.

— ψάχοντες.] This word is of rare occurrence. Yet it is adduced from Nicand. Ther. 580 and 629, and καταψ. from Herodot. iv. 73.

Mark 5. 30.

'prayer to God'; while some of the early modern Commentators, and others of the more recent ones, as Markland, Wetstein, Doddridge, and Campbell, maintain that it signifies 'in the proseucha, or oratory of God.' And that there were Jewish places of worship called προσευχαί, is undoubted. But whether that sense is here to be assigned is another question. Those Commentators adduce, indeed, several reasons why the common interpretation cannot be admitted. They urge that προσευχή τοῦ Θεοῦ, in the sense prayer to God, is abhorrent from the simplicity of Scriptural expression, and subversive of analogy; and that διανυκτερεύειν properly respects some place where the night is spent. But διανυκτερεύειν is not only used of places where, but of things (i. e. business) in which the night is occupied, as in the examples cited in Recens. Syn. And as to simplicity of expression, it is no more violated here than in numerous other cases; where the use of the Genitive falls under that Rule of Winer and Matthiæ. 'The Genitive after nouns which indicate feeling, speech, or action in respect to any thing, is sometimes to be understood as indicating the relation which that feeling, speech, or action has toward that thing;' ex. gr. Matt. xiii. 18. Luke vi. 7. Acts iv. 9. Joseph. Ant. ix. 9. ἐπὶ—ἰκεταίαν τοῦ Θεοῦ. Lys. Or. 31. ἰκεταίος θεῶν. Thucyd. iii. 67. ὑμῶν ἰκεταίαν ποιοῦνται. In such cases the Genitive has the force of an Accusative with πρός.

As to the other objections proposed, they proceed on a confusion of ancient with modern modes of expression. See Recens. Synop. That which respects the use of the Article here has been fully answered by Bp. Middleton; who, besides making well-founded objections to the sense oratory (as that προσευχή were situated near rivers, not in mountains; nor, if προσευχή had been meant, would τοῦ Θεοῦ have been added; for all oratories were τοῦ Θεοῦ), has shown that it is not uncommon with προσευχή in the sense of prayer. See Matt. xxi. 22. Acts i. 14. 1 Cor. vii. 5, and comp. Matt. xiv. 23. Finally, he observes that to pass the night in prayer, without going to an oratory, was (as Schoettg. shows) a common act of Jewish devotion. And when we see the common interpretation is the most simple, and that our Lord's going was to pray, and that on this, of great moment, he would be like powerfully and perseveringly, the interpretation is decidedly to be preferred. It must here be understood, not prayer that holy meditation and devout thoughts so suitable to precede and follow prayer.

15. I have pointed, as I have in the next verse, with Schulz, Scholz, and cause the Apostles are here evident be distributed into pairs. That they forth to evangelize, is certain from M

18. ὀχλούμενοι ὑπὸ πν. ἀκ.] Ὁχλ. signify 'to be troubled or vexed by irksome business, or by such sicknesses any one from pursuing his course which senses abundant examples, be σου expressed and understood, are Wetstein and others. In the New LXX., however, the latter is never only that of being vexed or troubled demoniacal possession. So Acts v. 16 νους ὑπὸ πνευμάτων ἀκαθάρτων, as ἰάν τινα ὄχλη δαιμόνιον ἢ πνεῦμα &c. And such is plainly the sense here that assigned by those who advocate the thesis of Mede. For the sick and the are here plainly distinguished.

For ὑπὸ many MSS. have ἀπὸ, as by Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Scholz. But it does not appear that sense is ever used in the New Test. passive; while ὑπὸ frequently is, in the New Test. and the Classical writers; in this sense (of origin, or cause), is enough to suit the Passive. And, phrase, we have ὑπὸ, at Acts v. 16 Acts x. 38.

that the power by which the sick were healed was exerted by a sort of efflux, or effluvia from his body. See Note on Mark v. 30. The best Commentators, ancient and modern, are agreed that ἐξίχυσθαι ἐκ here, like the Heb. שָׁפַךְ in Ruth i. 13, simply means se exierat.

20. Our Lord seems to have expressed the first two beatitudes, both in the literal sense and the metaphorical. Luke records the former sense only; Matthew, the latter only. (Newcome.)

22. ἀφορίσωσιν.] This was the first degree of excommunication among the Jews. On which see Yitringa de Synag. p. 722.

—ἐκβάλωσι—πονηρὸν.] Ἐκβάλλειν signifies generally to cast out, both in a civil and in a military sense; i. e. either 'to banish,' or 'to ouster.' It also signifies 'to displace officers,' or 'reject actors.' Hence many here assign the sense 'to reject with scorn and ignominy;' which is preferable to the sense 'to banish,' adopted by Kistoe, or 'to defame,' supported by Campbell. It seems to advert to the treatment which they would experience at the hands of the heathens, as ἀφορίσωσι does to that from the Jews. How covered with obloquy and contempt were the primitive Christians by the Heathens, we have abundant evidence, both in Scripture and in the writings of the first Christian Apologists. And the expression 'spurn at their [very] name,' is a very strong one, unjustifiably weakened by taking sense for the person bearing the name.

23. χάρηται.] This (for χαίρειν) is found in almost all the best MSS., and is adopted by Westcott, Griesbach, Matthæi, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz. On which use of the Subjunctive in an Imperative or hortatory sense, see Buttmann and Matthæi. Comp. Aristoph. Plut. 761. σκιρτᾶται καὶ χορεύεται.

—κατὰ ταῦτα] for οὕτω in Matt. v. 12, which excludes the reading κατὰ ταῦτά adopted by some Editors.

25. οὐαὶ ὑμῖν.] Campbell, in a long and able Note, proves, as Euthymius had long before done, that οὐαὶ here is not imprecative, but declarative: 'Woe is unto you! alas for you!'

—οἱ γελῶντες νῦν.] So Philo, p. 900. D. says: οἶδα ὅτι γελάσονται τινες ἀκούσαντες (namely, what he had just been saying on the evils of luxury and vice), γελάσονται δὲ οἱ κλαυθμῶν καὶ θρήνων ἄξι δρώντες.

26. καλῶν ὑμᾶς εἰπῶσι] 'speak you well.' So καλῶς εἰπεῖν Acts xxiii. 5.

—οὐαὶ, ὅταν καλῶς, &c.] This was meant primarily for the Apostles and first teachers of the Gospel, but mutatis mutandis for their successors. Grotius has appositely cited a narration respecting Phorion, recorded by Plut. T. ii. 187. F., where we are told, that when, in his orations, he had particularly pleased the multitude, he used to ask his friends whether any thing wrong had escaped him in his address. 'Υμῖν and πάντας are omitted in almost all the best MSS. and several Versions and Fathers, and are cancelled by nearly all Editors from Griesbach to Scholz. The same may be said of the καὶ at ver. 28, where the Asyndeton much increases the gravity of the injunction.

30. The expressions in this and the foregoing verse are not to be too rigorously interpreted; being merely intended to inculcate a spirit of forbearance and meekness under injuries or deprivations. Comp. Matt. v. 39. At τὰ σὰ subaud. χρήματα; and at κωλύειν sub. ἀπὸ τοῦ αἵρειν. The difference between ἀπαιτεῖν and ἀπαιτεῖν is that the former denotes to ask as a favour; the latter, to demand as a right.

32. χάρις] put for εὐεργεσία and its consequent μισθός. So Dionys. Hal. A. vi. 86. τίς ἐστιν ἡ σὴ χάρις ἡμῖν καὶ ὠφέλεια; In this and the following verses, μόνον is to be supplied after ὑμᾶς.

34. τὰ ἴσα] 'an equivalent.' An elegant Grecism.

35. καὶ δανίζετε μὴδὲν ἀπελπ. Some take μὴδὲν ἀπελπ. to mean, 'nothing despairing.' But though ἀπελπίζειν often signifies to despair, yet that it cannot have that sense here, is plain from the words of the preceding verse, παρ' ὧν ἐλπίζετε ἀπολαβεῖν. Others take ἀπελπ. in an active sense of causing despair. But such a sense of the word is unauthorized, and here unsuitable. The true interpretation seems to be the one generally assigned by ancient and modern Commentators, 'hoping for nothing again;' a sense which, however deficient in Classical authority, is very agreeable to analogy; for as ἀπολαβεῖν is used for λαβεῖν ἀπὸ τινος, so ἀπελπίζειν may be for ἐλπίζειν ἀπὸ τινος. So in Athen. p. 649. ἀπισθίσαι for ἐσθίσαι ἀπὸ τινος. The sense, therefore, is, 'Lend to those from whom there is little hope of receiving back your money.' Or, as Campbell expresses it, 'lend cheerfully, without fearing the loss of what is so bestowed.' From numerous passages of the Classical writers which I have adduced in Recens. Synop., it appears that the heathens sometimes used to lend money to respectable persons brought to unmerited distress; and, on certain occasions, made collections in aid of their distress, which the Greeks called ἐρανισμός. If any one, for instance, had lost a considerable part of his property by shipwreck, fire, or any other such calamity, it was not unusual for his friends to supply him with money, not to be paid back by any certain day, but when convenient. This, however, they scarcely ever did, except to those who,

they had some hope, might, by a more turn of fortune, some time or other, repay the money, but return the sum they termed ἀντερανίζειν. Whereas enjoins his hearers to do this good (in of Thucyd. ii. 40.) 'not with the notions of self-interest, but in the con liberality;' a confidence reposed in the poor man's surety.

— υἱοὶ τ. Ὑψ. i. e. either 'beloved (as in Eccles. iv. 10.) γίνου ὀρφανός; — καὶ ἔση ὡς υἱὸς Ὑψίστου) or, 'like as being animated with a spirit of be similar to that of the Deity.' The A found in many MSS. and the Ed. Præ celled by Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittmus and Scholz, agreeably to the usage of L i. 32, 35, 76.

— ὅτι αὐτὸς — πονηροῦν.] This Kuinoel asserts, 'the same sentiment, words, as that at Matth. v. 45.' For injunction is only to show kindness enemies; here we are also enjoined to al sence to our fellow-creatures. And are commanded to imitate God, who is even to the ungrateful,—this is said to an objection,—that the persons who benefit are almost sure to prove ungrateful which the answer is, [But yet benefit th God, &c. In the next verse, οἰκτ. rendered, not 'merciful,' but compassion ing and relieving, according to your p distresses of others.

37. καταδικάζετε.] Καταδ., κρίνει, are properly forensic terms; the former to condemn, the other to acquit. They ever, (as Grotius and other good Com have seen) to be accommodated to the The three clauses advert, the 1st to judgment on the faults of others; the 2 ing condemnation on them. The 3d contrary spirit, that of judging for the quitting our neighbour of such charges; manifestly well founded.

33. δοῦναι, &c.] With candour in judging is united liberality in giving, as being a kindred virtue. Inasmuch that, at the end of the verse, the words τῷ γὰρ αὐτῷ—ὑμῖν are employed to enjoin the exercise of the virtue mentioned in the preceding verse, by a metaphor derived from the imagery in this; wherein the καλόν (handsome and full) is further illustrated by the terms πεπιεσμένον, σεσαλευμένον, and ὑπερεκχυνόμενον; which have reference to the three principal of the many modes of giving abundant measure among the Jews: such as the supernatans, the abruza, the cumulata, pressa, agilata, operta.
Of these the abruza corresponds to our mode of measuring corn, by heaping up the measure, and cutting off the cumulus with a lath. The cumulata and operta were still larger than the abruza;
but the pressa, agilata, and supernatans, corresponding to the three here mentioned, were the simplest. Ὑπερεκχ. (which is also found in Joel ii. 24. ὑπερεκχυνήσονται οἱ ἄνθρωποι οἶνον, and ὑπερεκχύνει in Prov. x. 16. (for the Heb. פָּרַח, dispersed) and Joseph. Bell. i. 21. 4.) is not to be taken, with almost all Commentators, of a measure of liquida (for that is inconsistent with its being 'poured into the lap,' as just after), but (with Euthymius and Beza) of a measure of solida, by an idiom common to all languages.
Thus there is a climax; for the ὑπερεκχ. sup- press that the measure has been already pressed down and shaken together.

—δώσουσιν εἰς τ. κ. ὑ.] Not 'shall men give,' but, as Gataker explains (de Styl. N. T. pp. 70, 71.) 'debitur vobis,' scil. a Deo. So infra xii.
21. ἀναποδοῖσι he renders 'a to repetetur.' There is here an allusion to the Oriental custom of receiving a measure of corn or other dry articles in the bosom or lap of their flowing vests, the former of which they made use of like our pockets. See 2 Kings iv. 39. Prov. xvi. 33. As did also the Greeks and Romans. See Herodot. vi. 125. Hor.
Sat. ii. 3. 71. The expression is proverbial, and of course expressive of what generally takes place. Similar ones are cited by the Commemtators both from the Rabbinical and the Classical writers.

39. μῆτι δύναται—πεσοῦνται;] Our Lord had before said that they were to evince that they were his true disciples by loving their enemies and forgiving one another, &c. He now intimates, that if they do not practise, as well as preach these doctrines, they will be like blind guides; who perish themselves, and are the cause of destruction to those they lead. Ἐμπεσοῦνται is here found in several MSS., and is preferred by Bornemann, who compares ἐμπεσσεῖται εἰς βόθυνον at Jer. xxxi. 44. And certainly this is required by propriety of language. Yet may not the simple have been used for the compound in the plain phraseology of common life, so suitable to a proverb. As to Bornemann's appeal to xiv.
5, where we have εἰς φρενὰς ἐμπεσσεῖται, it is to be noted that many MSS., including the Alexandrian, have there πεσσεῖται, which is edited, perhaps rightly, by Lachman. Indeed the same bold Critics who here altered πεσοῦνται into ἐμπε- σοῦνται, also altered ἔπασι into συνέπασι at
v. 49.

40. The purport of these words, in their pre- sent application (for they have sometimes a different one) is this: 'The disciple is not usually above his teacher; but every one who is, or would be, a thoroughly instructed scholar, must be (i. e. must aim at being) perfect as his teacher.' Thus, as the disciple generally follows his master's example,—so, if you neglect your duty to God, neither will your hearers observe theirs. Καταρτίζω means properly to thoroughly repair, and figuratively, to make quite perfect.

43. οὐ γὰρ ἴστι, &c.] Render, 'for that is not a good tree which brings forth bad fruit.' The connexion may be thus laid down (as it is done by Abp. Newcome): 'The rectitude of your conduct is not to be judged of by your sagacity in discovering your brother's faults, and your freedom in censuring them, but by your own actions and words. For a man is known by his actions and words, as a tree is by its fruits.'

44. With the sentiment compare Ecclus. xxvii. 6. and Eurip. Hec. 599 seqq.

48. ἔσκαψε καὶ ἐβάθυνε.] By Hendiadys, for βαθῖος ἔσκαψε; a kind of expression found both in the Classical and the Hellenistical writers. So Judg. xiii. 10. ἐτάχυσε καὶ ἔδραμε, for ταχέως ἔδραμε. The moral (as Grotius observes) is, that the study of piety and virtue should not be superficial, but a principle well grounded and deeply rooted in the heart, so as to resist the assaults of passion, temptation, &c.

—πλημμύρας.] The word signifies properly a swell, flood, or inundation of any kind, whether of the sea, or of a river (and especially that of the tide). The latter is here had in view. Comp. v. 49. The house is supposed to be situated in the way of such a river as the Nile, without any emphor for security, like that so graphically described in Joseph. Ant. ii. 10, 62.

VII. 2. ὃς ἦν αὐτῷ ἐντιμος] 'who was in much esteem with him.'

3. πρεσβυτέρους τῶν Ἰουδαίων.] Perhaps the elders of the synagogue which he had built.

4. ἀξίος ἐστὶν ᾧ παρέξει.] Unless the phrase be a Latinism, ἀξίος must be taken in the absolute sense, of which I have adduced numerous examples in Recena. Synop. Παρίξιν is an Attic form for παρίξην, on which see Matth. Gr. § 197 and 496.

5. τὴν συναγωγὴν—ἡμῖν.] Render, 'And he it is who hath built for us the synagogue.' This was not unusual in an individual. The phrase was, no doubt, a proselyte.

mentioned as exemplifying or establishing what has just been before said.

— οὐδὲ ἑμαυτὸν ἤξιώσα π. σ. ἔλθειν.] The same use of the Accus. as infra xxiii. 2. λέγοντα ἱκανοὺς Χριστὸν βασιλίᾳ εἶναι, and Acts viii. 9. λέγων εἶναι τινα ἱκανὸν μέγαν.

8. εἶπε λόγῳ] 'give thy fiat at a word,' or, by word of mouth.

9. ἐθαύμασεν αὐτόν] 'held him in admiration.'

— οὐδὲ] neque, not even in Israel, much less amongst the Gentiles.

12. It is well remarked by Abp. Newcome, that 'the four circumstances here mentioned with so much simplicity and conciseness tend to raise compassion more strongly than the most laboured amplification of art.'

— ἐξεκομίζετο.] Ἐκκομίζειν is a funeral term corresponding to the Latin efferre; for the custom of interring the dead outside of cities or towns, in gardens or in private and unfrequented places, was common to all the nations of antiquity; so the Jews, because dead bodies were regarded as unclean; and to the Gentiles, in order to prevent infection. (Grotius.)

— ἰδοὺ μονογενῆ τῇ μητρὶ αὐτοῦ.] Native of possession for the Genitive, as not unfrequently in the Scriptural and also the Classical writers. See Matth. Gr. Gr. § 392. 3. With this pathetic circumstance in the narration, I would compare the touching words of Eurip. Alc. 305. μόνος γὰρ αὐτοῖς ἦσθα. and 925. κόρος ἀξιοθνήσκος ὦχατ' ἐν δόμοισι μονόπαις.

— καὶ αὐτὴ χήρα.] Supply ἦν, agreeably to the tense of the preceding verb, especially as it would be in some measure anticipated from the following ἦν; for a repetition of ἦν within so short a space would have been offensive. The ἦν just after is, indeed, omitted in many MSS., early Editions, and Versions; and is cancelled by almost all the Editors. Yet it cannot well be dispensed with. I suspect that its omission partly arose from a mistake, which originated in a confounding of this ἦν with the one just before. The καὶ is very significant; the full sense being, that 'besides her other sufferings [losing her son] she was also a widow.'

14. ἤψατο τῆς σοροῦ.] Meaning thereby to stop the bearers. Soror generally denotes a coffin, of marble or other materials. But as such were not in use among the Jews, the word must here denote the bier, or funeral couch, on which the dead of the higher classes among the ancient nations were carried forth. See my Note on Thuc. ii. 34.

15. ἀνεκάθισεν.] Meaning, not merely revived, but sat up; by which he would be seen, since the bier was nearly flat.

16. φόβος] awe.

17. ἐν ὅλῃ τῇ Ἰ.] Here and at Matt. ix. 31. the Commentators take ἐν for διὰ. But that is so harsh, that it is better to suppose ἐν used for εἰς (as often) in the sense ante, which implies over and through.

18. δύο τινάς.] The τις indefinite is simply used with a numeral at Acts xxiii. 23. & xix. 14. And the Philologists think that the addition of the τις renders the number indefinite; which is frequently the case in the Classical writers; and the τις may be there expressed by our some; but whether it has that force in the New Test., may be doubted. It is unsuitable to the sacred writers, and can hardly have place in numbers so small as two. Besides, Matthew mentions positively two. It rather seems to have the usual sense certain: q. d. 'certain persons, two in number.'

21. ἰθεράπευσεν] 'cured,' or 'was curing.' Or rather, we may (with the Pesch. Syriac) take the Aorist as put for the Pluperfect, by a use frequent in narration. So supra v. 2. ἀπέκλυον, 'had cleansed,' and infra xix. 1. διήρχετο (where see Note). Mark iii. 10. πολλοὺς ἰθεράπευσεν. John xviii. 24. ἀπέστειλεν αὐτὸν ὁ Ἀννας. Other examples may be seen in Winer Gr. Gr. § 41. 5. This idiom is indeed almost confined to narration, and chiefly has place in parenthetical sentences.

— νόσων καὶ μαστ. καὶ πν. π.] Here we see demoniacal possession studiously distinguished from disorders, and that by a Physician. The disorders are also distinguished into the ordinary and milder ones (νόσοι), and the more grievous and painful μαστίγες (as Mark iii. 10. and v. 29. and Ps. xxxii. 10.); so called, because such were regarded as peculiar scourges from God. So μαστίξ is used in Hom. II. μ. 37. Ἰαχὴ. Prom. 703. Theb. 604. Ag. 625, where see Blomfield. Ἰθεράπευσεν is used impropiété of the νόσων and μαστίγες, and impropiété of the dispositions. However, in that case there was almost always a disorder cured at the same time that a demon was ejected. Ἐχαρίσατο τὸ βλέ., 'bestowed sight,' meaning, the faculty of sight; for such is the force of the Article, which some Editors, wrongly, would cancel.

22. See Is. xxix. 18. xxxv. 5.

25. Τρυφῇ is by most recent Commentaries supposed to denote sumptuous dress; to which it is sometimes applied in the Classical writers, as in Eurip. Phœn. 1505. στολίδι κροκόεσσιν ἀνείσα τρυφᾷ. Thus it would stand for τρυφῶν. That, however, would be too poetic for plain prose; and there is no reason to abandon the general sense luxury, i. e. a luxurious life. Thus in a kindred passage of Artemid. iii. 66. τοῖς ἐν τρυφῇ διάγουσι. Comp. also 2 Pet. i. 13. The ὑπάρχ. must be accommodated in sense to each of the nouns with which it is connected.

29. ἐδικαίωσαν τὸν Θεόν. Of this disputed term the versions 'honoured,' 'obeyed,' and others, are but periphrases. It is best to suppose a significatio praeiudicis, and to adopt the sense espoused by many of the best Commentators: acknowledged and commended the justice of God (i. e. of his purpose in calling them to repentance by John), and were accordingly baptized. This interpretation is required by the antithetical formula in the next verse, τὴν βουλὴν (counsel) τοῦ Θεοῦ ἠθέτησαν, &c. A disputed point, however, still remains,—namely, whether this and the verse following are to be considered as the words of our Lord (which is the common opinion), or whether (as some eminent Interpreters maintain) the words of the Evangelist, containing a remark, that in consequence of what our Lord then said concerning John, the people immediately resorted to his baptism. But (as is justly urged by Campbell) such cannot be the sense here; because John was then in prison, where he remained till his death. An objection so serious, that Bornemann, who strenuously maintains the words to be the Evangelist's, is compelled, in stating their sense, to pass over all mention of the people being baptized by John. And then, as if distrustful his own view, he 'sees no reason why the Aorists ἐδικαίωσαν and ἠθέτησαν should not be taken as Pluperfects.' But it may be shown that there is a reason,—namely, that the use of the Aor. 1. for the Pluperf. is an idiom only to be admitted under certain circumstances, on which see Winer Gr. Gr., and Note supra v. 21. Here, however, no such circumstances exist. In short, had the writer meant to express a Pluperfect sense, why should he not have used the Pluperfect tense? As to what is urged by Bornemann, that 'the words, regarded as those of Christ, are languid and frigid,' that is a mere question of taste. But if we allow these to be frigid, it would not be difficult to prove the words which similarly follow in Matt. xi. 12, 13, to be so also. And yet even Bornemann must acknowledge those to be Christ's. Finally, the words under consideration can be no other than Christ's, because they are evidently of the very same nature with the above, and related to the same conversation of our Lord. For as πᾶς ὁ λαὸς here means the people at large, the populace (called at John vii. 49. ὁ ὄχλος ὁ μὴ γινώσκων τὸν νόμον), as opposed to the Rulers and the Pharisees,—so also the best Commentators interpret the expression βιασται at Matt. xi. 12. of the meaner crowd.

But, to advert to what may be considered as principally leading to the opinion of these verses being from the Evangelist,—namely, the words which introduce the verse following, εἶπε δὲ ὁ Κύριος; these are now universally admitted to be not genuine. And vain is it that Bornemann seeks to build even upon this sandy foundation an argument for the preceding being those of the Evangelist. Nothing, surely, is more improbable than that the words should have originated in any such desire to prevent mistake in the words following; for no one could fail to see that they were Christ's. In short, it is plain that the words originated from the Lectonaries, since the verse commences an ἀνάγνωσις, or Reading, and which required to be introduced by some such words. Thus Scholz attests that they are found, not only in the Lectonaries, but in the margin of those MSS. textus perpetui, which always mark the commencement of the Readings in the margin. It may, moreover, be urged, that the οὖν at v. 3, which is found in all the MSS., evidently has reference to what was said at v. 29, 30.

Lastly, there is another reason why the verses under consideration cannot but be from our Lord—namely, that they are evidently adverted to by him at v. 35. καὶ ἐδικαίωθη ἡ σοφία ἀπὸ τῶν τέκνων αὐτῆς πάντων. And thus we are there supplied with an authentic interpretation of one of the most variously expounded passages in all the New Test. By σοφία there is meant the wise counsel of God for bringing men to the Gospel, by what was a preparation thereto,—namely, thoroughly repenting of their former sins, and being baptized by John. And by the children of wisdom are meant those who recognized that wisdom, and approved it by acting conformably thereto, and who were therefore children of God.

The passage may be rendered thus: 'And now the great body of the people who have heard him,—and even the publicans,—have acknowledged and fulfilled the just purpose of God (see Acts xx. 27.), by being baptized by John: but the Pharisees and Lawyers have set at naught the purpose of God respecting themselves, having not been baptized by John.' Εἰς ἑαυτοὺς is by some interpreted 'against themselves,' 'to their own injury.' But although this sense of εἰς is supported alike by Classical and Scriptural authority, and would here give a good sense, it is better (with Cameron, Grotius, Hammond, Wolf, Whitby, Wetstein, Campbell, Rosenmüller, and Kuinoel,) to suppose a slight transposition, and connect εἰς ἑαυτοὺς with βουλὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ, in the sense 'in regard to themselves': a use of εἰς very frequent. Ἀθετεῖν signifies properly to displace, and fig. to abrogate; and also, as here, to make void by rejection. It is not meant that they frustrated the counsel of God (for that were impossible; see Rom. ix. 19.), but merely that they did as much as in them lay to make void that counsel, and thereby practically rejected it.

33. [Comp. Matt. iii. 4. Mark i. 6.]

ἡσθε καὶ ἰδοὺ τίς ἐδεσσεύετο ἔμπροσθεν ὑμῶν ἰδοὺ τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἐκ τῶν ἀμαρτωλῶν. καὶ λέγετε· Ἰδοὺ ἄνθρωπος ἐκ τῶν ἀμαρτωλῶν. * ὅλας τελευτῶν καὶ ἀμαρτωλῶν. ἐκκαθάρτη τὴν ψυχὴν ἐκ τῶν πεπτωκότων πάντων.

Ἰδὼν δὲ ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, εἶπεν ἐν ἑαυτῷ, λέγων· Οὐκ ἔστι τοιοῦτος, ἰσχυροῦς ἂν τις καὶ ποταπὴ ἡ γυνή, ἀγγίζει αὐτοῦ ὅτι ἀμαρτωλὸς ἐστι.

— ἐκκαθάρτη [ἐκ] for καθαρίσθη is often in the New Test. Though Valartius maintains that the former phrase was only a common expression of reverence, it is to be noted that καθαρίσθη which the earlier Greeks expressed by καθαρίσθη and καθαρίσθη.

34. φίλος τελευτῶν. Such is the reading of the great body of the MSS., Versions, and early Editions; which is received by Bengel, Matthæi, Griesb., Tittm., Vat., and Schoz. The other reading arose probably from the passage of Matt. xi. 19.

35. καὶ ἰδοὺ, γυνή, &c. It has been a much disputed question whether this story be the same with that narrated at Matt. xxvi. 6. Mark xiv. 3. John xii. 3. or not. The former view is maintained by some ancient and most early modern Commentators, especially Lightfoot and Grotius. The latter by Theophylact and Euthymius (from Chrysostom), and by many of the best modern Commentators, as Buxtorf, Hammond, Whitby, Wolf, Markland, Michaelis, Rosenmuller, Lampe, Tittmann, and Kuinoel. The points of dissimilarity between the two narrations, and between the Mary here mentioned and Mary Magdalene, are striking. As to the similarity, the action (anointing) was not unusual, the name of the vessel common, and the name of the Pharisee one of those most frequently met with. This is quite independent of the sense to be assigned to ἀμαρτωλός, whether sinner or Gentile. Of the latter sense there is perhaps not one undoubted example in the singular; and even with the plural it requires the Article, unless united with τελῶνας. Though therefore that interpretation has been adopted by several good Commentators, the former, which is espoused by most Commentators, is greatly preferable. But when they assign to the word the sense harlot, or adulteress, they adduce no proof of that signification from the Classical writers. Nor is it necessary to suppose any such position. There is no reason why it may not be taken in the general sense person; in which signification the singular, ex. gr. Luke v. 8. ὅτι ἀμαρτωλὸς. Thus we are enabled to get rid of the of taking ἦν in a pluperfect tense (met with), which all the Commentators who assign to ἀμαρτωλός the signification The woman, it seems, was then a sinner, however, under conviction of sin, the sincere desire of amendment.

36. σῶσα ὄντως.] Jesus, it seemed, reclining at table on a couch, leaning elbow, his head and countenance turn to the table, and his naked feet (the σῶσα taken off before the meal) turned to the way, towards that which the servants — κατεφίλει.] The κατεφίλει is intended to imply the deepest reverence and profound humility; as the bathing his feet with her hair was also a mark of profound reverence; it being an ancient custom of the great, after washing their hands, to dry on the long hair of some attendant. 39. οὗτος, εἰ ἦν προφήτης, &c.] If this man were a prophet, he would have known that I sent from God, and consequently as supernatural knowledge.

more elegant mode of expression; but the other is the more pointed and forcible.

44. Our Lord now contrasts the incivility of Simon, who had neglected the usual offices of attention, with the respectful assiduity of the woman. And here we have allusions to the several customs in use among the Jews to guests who were made very welcome. 1. Their sandals were unlaced, and their feet washed and carefully wiped, and, if the person were of high rank, anointed. 2. A kiss was the usual salutation on entrance, or as soon as the person was comfortably seated. 3. The head was usually anointed with aromatic oils or unguents. The words τῆς κεφαλῆς, not found in many MSS. and Versions, have been cancelled by Griesbach, Vater, Scholz, and others; on insufficient grounds. The MSS. are comparatively few; Versions are, in a case like the present, no sure evidence; and better reasons may be given for the omission than for the insertion of the words. Moreover, there may be an antithesis between πόδας and κεφαλῆς, as at v. 46; as there is also between ὕδωρ and δάκρυα at v. 44.

45. εἰσῆλθον.] The chief Editors and Commentators agree in preferring εἰσῆλθον, which is the reading of some MSS. and Versions. The authority, however, for it is so slender, that, small as the difference is, an Editor is scarcely warranted in receiving it, especially as it cannot be proved that the common reading is positively wrong; for we have only to regard the language as partaking of the same hyperbolic cast, which is so characteristic of Oriental phraseology. Besides, it is probable that the woman came in very soon after our Lord was seated, and thus supplied those observances which Simon had neglected. Indeed, there is something feeble in the sense of εἰσῆλθον. That εἰσῆλθον is as proper is grammatically as εἰσῆλθον, is plain from a kindred passage of Luke, which I have cited in Recens. Synop.: ὁ δὲ ἀνθρώπος ἐκείνος, ἀφ' οὗπερ ἤκον, οὐ διέλιπε βάλανον.

47. αἱ πολλαί.] I would compare Philostrate. Vit. Ap. i. 13. μετέρρυθμισε τῶν ἁμαρτημάτων πολλῶν ὄντων.

—ὅτι ἡγάπησε πολὺ.] On the sense of the ὅτι here Commentators are not agreed. The ancient and early modern ones interpret it for or because. But all the most eminent of the recent Expositors regard this sense as repugnant to the scope of the parable; which, say they, represents the gratuitous forgiveness of sins as the cause of the love, not the love the cause of the forgiveness; (an effect, they remark, at v. 50 ascribed to faith,) and they render the ὅτι therefore. Since, however, this signification is deficient in authority, others suppose that the love of the woman is adduced as the sign, not the cause of her pardon, and that οὐ χάριν expresses an inference from the antecedent to the consequent: 'Wherefore [since she has shown so great a regard for me] I say unto you, [it is plain that] her many sins are forgiven, for, or because, she loved much.' Yet even this method is not a little objectionable; and the ancient interpretation, being the most simple, and involving the least difficulty, deserves the preference. And as to what has been alleged, that it represents love as the meritorious cause of the remission of sins, that is by no means the case. Although faith is afterwards said to have saved her, yet as it was faith working by love, the latter might be said, in a popular sense, to be the cause of her salvation. The meaning of ὅτι ἡγάπησε πολὺ (where ὅτι is for ὅτι, i. e. καθότι, eo quod: see Note on Mark ix. 11.) may be expressed by 'inasmuch as she hath given full evidence of her love and attachment.' Now that of itself implied faith in the Messiahship of Jesus, and may be presumed to have sprung from true repentance.

48. ἀφείωνται σου αἱ ἀμ.] 'thy sins are [hereby] forgiven thee.' Many regard this as a repetition of the consolatory assurance, which Christ had on some previous occasion given to the woman. But the truth is, that we have here a formal pronouncement of that forgiveness, which the foregoing words only implied.

11 11 ἡ παραβολὴ αὕτη. Ὁ δὲ εἶπεν· Ὑμῖν δίδεται γινώσκειν τὰ 10
13 μυστήρια τῆς βασιλείας τοῦ Θεοῦ· τοῖς δὲ λοιποῖς ἐν

even forgiveth sins.' The kai is used as in similar passages at viii. 25, and Matt. viii. 27. Mark iv. 41; and here, as there, τίς means quis, qualis, or quantus.

VIII. 1. κατὰ πόλιν.] Wetstein rightly distinguishes between this expression κατὰ τὴν πόλιν; the latter being said of one, the former of more than one. In fact, the κατὰ has the distributive force, which takes place not only in numerals, but also in words which are not so. The sense is: 'through or by city and town.'

2. Μαγδαληνῇ] i. e. of Magdala, on the lake of Genesareth. The best Commentators are agreed that there is no authority in Scripture for supposing this Mary to have been a harlot; nay, it should seem that she was a person of some consequence. Ἐξεληλύθει, 'had been expelled.' Neut. for passive, as often in the Gospels and Acts. Many recent Commentators take the ἐπτά for 'many,' definite for indefinite, as in Matt. xii. 45, and xii. 26. But that idiom, as it ought nowhere to be introduced unnecessarily, so here it is unsuitable.

3. ἐπιτρόκον.] The Commentators are not agreed on the exact office designated by ἐπιτρόκος; which, as it denotes generally one who has an office committed to his charge, is of very extensive signification, and may denote Guardian, or Lieutenant of a province, or Treasurer, or house or land Steward, agent and manager. So Xen. (Econ. xii. 2. ἔχω ἐπιτρόκους ἐν τοῖς ἀγροῖς.

— διηκόνουν] 'supplied with the necessities of life;' as Matth. iv. 11. xxvii. 55. Mark i. 13. xv. 41. Theophr. Char. ii. 4. For αὐτῷ a great number of MSS. and many Versions have αὐτοῖς, which is edited by Matthæi and Scholz. But both external and internal evidence are rather in favour of the common reading, which is retained by Griesbach.

6. ἕτερον] scil. τὸ σπέρμα, to be supplied from σπείρειν. Φυὲν, from ἐφύησεν, grows, a late form for the earlier ἐφύον.

7. ἐν μέσῳ.] Not 'in the midst of,' but simply 'among' or amidst.

— καὶ συμφυεῖσαι αἱ ἀκ., &c.] Συμφύει is a form of later Greek, instead of the Act. Inf. 2. συνέφυεν; yet it occurs in Philo. What is meant by the choking here spoken of will appear from Xenoph. (Econ. § 12. Τί γάρ, ἔφη, ἐν ὕλῃ πνίγη, συνεχομένη τῷ σίτῳ καὶ διατρέχουσα τοῦ σίτου τὴν τροφήν.

8. εἰς.] This reading (for ἐπὶ) is found in many MSS. and Versions, and is adopted by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz, it being the more difficult reading; whereas the other seems to be derived from the passage of Matth. and Mark. Εἰς occurs again in this sense infra xiv. 10.

9. τίς εἴη ἡ παραβολὴ α.] 'what may be the meaning of this parable.' So Cebes Tab. δευγῆσαι ἡμῖν—τί πότε ἔστιν ὁ μῦθος.

10. See Note on Matt. xiii. 10, and compare Matt. xi. 25, 26. 2 Cor. iii. 8. 14. Is. vi. 9. Ezech. xii. 2. Rom. xi. 8.

 extreme brevity. By μεριμνῶν here be μεριμνῶν τοῦ αἵματος of Matthew
 the anxious cares to avoid poverty, and preserve wealth. The former rated from Theocrit. Idyll. xxi. 1—5, sm Eurip. Med. 599. By πλούτου is called in the passages of Matthew be deceitfulness of riches; with referdeceitful lusts; so termed, as pro-they never perform.

 3. ποποροῦσι for ἀκαρποὶ γίνονται and Mark. The word is used pro-or plants bringing fruit to maturity, next always with an Accus., though sometimes ἡδονῶν; as Philo p. 26. αἰσῶσι καὶ τελειοποροῦσι.

15. καλῇ καὶ ἀγαθῇ.] This is by Beza and Grotius regarded as an expression ex adytis Phi- losophiæ. And they compare the expression of the Classical writers καλὸς κάγαθος as said of one who is endowed with all the advantages of body, mind, fortune, &c. But the present is rather to be viewed as a phrase of common life, simply designating an honest (i. e. worthy) and good, or virtuous, heart. The καλῇ, however,
 may have reference to the καλῇ γῇ just before,
 which denotes, as in Xen. Æcon. xvi. 7, ground
 naturally fertile.

— ἐν ὑπομονῇ.] Meaning, 'by patient perseverance.'

18. ὃ δοκεῖ ἔχειν.] The δοκεῖ is not redundant, in the present, and perhaps in very few of the many passages adduced in proof thereof. Luke has here expressed something more than Matthew and Mark; namely, that what such a person yet retains is likely to be so soon lost, that he can hardly be said to have it. [Comp. infra xix.]

19. οὐκ ἡδύνατο συντυχεῖν αὐτῷ 'could not get access to him because of the multitude'
 [pressing about him].

20. ἀπηγγέλη—λεγόντων.] Supply τινῶν, or αὐτῶν. Ἰδοὺν, for συντυχεῖν, namely, λα- λῆσαι, as in the passage of Matthew (antecedent for consequent). So in Thucyd. iv. 125. Xen.
Cyr. iv. 6, 2.

23. ἀφύπνωσε] 'obdormivit.' A rare sense of the word, which in the Classical writers signifies 'to raise oneself from sleep,' to arise. This, however, (probably a provincial or popular use of the word,) is found in the Sept., Judg. v. 27. and Ignat. Martyr. § 7.

— κατέβη.] Stormy gusts are, in the Classical writers, often said κατεῖναι. So Thucyd. ii. 25. ἀνέμου κατεῖντος. Pausan. xi. 34, 3. κατεῖντος ἐπὶ τοῦ πνεύματος καταβαίνειν.

— συνεπληροῦντο.] A popular and frequent catachresis, by which what happens to the ship is ascribed to the sailors.

29. πολλοῖς χρόνοις] for ἐκ χρόνων ἱκανῶν, v. 27. So Plut. de Educ. xiv. 26. ἐν δεσμετηρίῳ πολλοὺς κατεσάπη χρόνους, simply, 'for a long time.'

— συνηρπάκει.] The syn suggests the idea of the action being complete; as was especially the case in demoniacal possession. Hence the term is also employed by Philo, p. 219. ὅλον τὸν καιρὸν ὑπὸ θείας κατοχῆς συναρπάσθαι εἰσπρεπ.

31. τὴν ἄβυσσον] scil. χώραν, i. e. Tartarus, that part of Hades in which the souls of the wicked were supposed to be confined. See 2 Pet. i. 14. Apoc. xx. 1. So also Eurip. Phœn. 1682. Ταρτάρου ἀβύσσου χάσματα, and Acts Thm. § 32. ἡ ἀβύσσοις τοῦ Ταρτάρου. And as in 2 Pet. ii. 4. we have ταρταρώσας. See Professor Stuart's Essays on the words relating to Future Punishment, especially on ἔσχατος, ἔσχατος, and Τάρταρος. 'Sheol (says he) was considered as a vast domain or region (of which the gulf was only a part, or a kind of entrance way), extending deep down in the earth, even to its lowest abysses. It may also be remarked, that, as in the Old Test. Sheol is a place to which the righteous go, as well as the wicked; and as our Saviour, subsequently to his death, is represented as being in Hades, Pa. xvi. 10. Acts ii. 27, 31; as

33. εἰσῆλθεν.] Very many MSS. have εἰσῆλθον, which is received by Matthæi and Scholz.

39. καθ' ὅλην τὴν πόλιν.] Not meaning the whole city [of Gadara], but the saie; for, from what goes before, it appears they had been told what had happened; and at v. 37. it is said ἠρώτησαν αὐτὸν ἵνα εἰσέλθῃς εἰς τὸν οἶκόν σου τῶν Γαδ. ἀπελθεῖν.

40. ἀπεδέξατο] 'joyfully received him.'

42. ἀπέθνησκαι] 'was (as it were) dead,' 'was near unto death.' Bornemann compares Plato Phæd. ἀποθνήσκαι τε καὶ τεθνάναι. Συνέπνι-γον. A stronger term than συνέθλιβον, which is used by Mark.

43. οὖσα ἐν ῥύσει.) This use of εἶναι with ἐν, denoting to labour under a disorder, occurs elsewhere in Scripture. We may compare ἀνθρώποις ἐν πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτω in Mark v. 2. In either case the ἐν is for σύν. For εἰς ἰατροῦς is written ἰατροῖς in almost all the best MSS., which is adopted by every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz. On the force of the Dative, see Matth. Gr. Gr. § 387.

45. καὶ εἶπεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς· τίς, &c.] He asked, not that he was ignorant who had touched him, but that he might not be himself the divulger of the miracle; and that the woman, hearing the question, and drawing near, might testify the benefit she had received, and that, in consequence of her declaration, she might presently hear from his lips that 'her faith had saved her'; and that, by this means, others might be excited to come and be healed of their disorders.

46. ἔγνω δύνάμιν ἐξελθοῦσαν ἀπ' ἐμοῦ.] See Note on Mark v. 30.

49. μὴ σκύλλε τὸν διδ.] Meaning, 'do not trouble the master [to come].' So supra vii. 6. μὴ σκύλλου. Herodian, iv. 13, 8. ἵνα δὲ μὴ πάντα τὸν στρατὸν σκύλλῃ. On the primary force of the word, see Note on Matt. ix. 36.

51. εἰσελθὼν.] Many MSS. have ἐλθὼν, which is received by Wetstein, Griesbach, and Scholz.

Καὶ Ἰωάννην καὶ Ἰάκωβον (for Ἰάκωβ καὶ Ἰωάνν.) is found in all the best MSS. and Versions, and Theophylact; and is edited by Wetst., Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, and Scholz; perhaps rightly; as the mistake might easily arise from the καὶ—καὶ.

52. ἐκόπτοντο αὐτήν.] Κόπτεσθαι properly signifies to beat or strike oneself; and then, because that was a frequent accompaniment of extreme grief, to bewail, grieve for any one. It answers to the Heb. נָחַם, which is followed by ל, for, or over, and has sometimes in the Sept. (as here) simply an Accusative, thus becoming a Depositive. On the various modes of lamentation for the dead, see Geier de luctu Heb.

54. ἡ παῖς.] Nomin. for Vocat., which occurs also at vi. 25. x. 21. xii. 32. xviii. 11. and Mark v. 41, and sometimes in the Classical writers, especially the Attic ones. The words ἐκβαλεῖν ἔξω πάντας καὶ, not found in some very ancient MSS. and Versions, are rejected by Schulz and Bornemann, and cancelled by Lachmann. They may possibly have been introduced from the parallel passage of Mark. But as the MSS. are very few (only about eight), may we not rather suspect an accidental omission?

IX. 1. μαθητὰς αὐτοῦ.] These words, not found in very many of the best MSS., several Versions, and some Fathers, are cancelled by almost every Editor from Wtstein to Scholz. Some MSS. too, and those Versions which have not μαθ. αὐτοῦ, have ἀποστόλων αὐτοῦ. Nothing, therefore, can be plainer than that δωδ. are from the margin. It may be said, indeed, that these words are confirmed by Matth. x. 1. But it is more probable that they have been introduced from thence; since better reasons may be imagined for their insertion than for their omission.

— καὶ νόσους θεραπεύειν.] This is, as Bornemann remarks, an elliptical form of expression for καὶ ἐξουσίαν ἑαρ. νόσους, of which he adduces an example from Xen. Anab. i. 2. 27. Συγμλ. See Matth. Gr. Gr. § 532. a.

2. ἀπέστειλεν, &c.] Comp. Matth. x. 7. In the foregoing verse it is said, that he gave them power to cast out demons and to heal disorders: in this, that he gave them a commission to go forth and exercise that power, in conjunction with the preaching of the Gospel-Dispensation.

3. ῥάβδους.] Many MSS. have ῥάβδους, which is preferred by almost all the recent Editors. See Note on Matt. x. 10. 'And, a-piece. So Matt. x. 9. ὁλοθρον ἀνὰ θυμῶν. and John ii. 6. ἀνὰ πηγάς δύο ἢ τρεῖς. On this distributive sense, the Bornemann and Matthias, Gr. Gr. § 579. 3; who, however, seem wrong in supposing that in this idiom the numeral and noun belong to the proposition ἀνὰ. They are rather to be referred to the verb; and the preposition is to be taken as put absolutely, (thus becoming, as it were, an adverb) by an ellipsis of ἕκαστον, which is sometimes expressed, though generally left to be understood. Our word a-piece well expresses the force of the idiom; being for at-piece (as it was formerly written), where 'piece' coming from the Italian pezzo, answers to ἕκαστον.

— ἔχειν.] This is usually explained as Infin. for Imperat. ἔχετε; a not unfrequent idiom, to lessen the harshness of which, Philologists generally suppose an ellipse of an Imperative of ιενή, or of δαί. But it is better, with Herm. on Vig. p. 591, to suppose the idiom to be a relique of ancient simplicity of language, when a wish was expressed simply by a verb in the Infinitive. Of this there is a confirmation in the use of the Hebrew verb. The principle, however, cannot apply to the phraseology of later Greek writers, especially prose writers. It will usually be found that the Infinitive has a reference to some verb which has preceded, and to which the writer inadvertently accommodates the construction. Thus the idiom falls under the head of Anastrophe; ex. gr. here ἔχειν is used as if αἴρῃν (with reference to ἔλας, take) had preceded, and not αἴρῃν.

5. καὶ τὸν κον.] With the construction Bornemann compares Aristoph. Av. 1735. διὰ τὰ πάντα κρατῶντες καὶ (even) πᾶρεδρον Βασιλείαν ἔχει Διός.

7. διηπόρει.] 'he was in doubt what to think.' 10. Βηθσαϊδᾶ.] Not the Bethsaida of Galilee, but that on the N. E. of the Lake (where Julius was afterwards colonized), mentioned by Joseph.

 μικρότερος ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ μείζων αὐτοῦ ἐστί.

18. δύο τινάς.] The τις indefinite is simply used with a numeral at Acts xxiii. 23. & xix. 14. And the Philologists think that the addition of the τις renders the number indefinite; which is frequently the case in the Classical writers; and the τις may be there expressed by our some; but whether it has that force in the New Test., may be doubted. It is unsuitable to the sacred writers, and can hardly have place in numbers so small as two. Besides, Matthew mentions positively two. It rather seems to have the usual sense certain: q. d. 'certain persons, two in number.'

21. ἐθεράπευσε] 'cured,' or 'was curing.' Or rather, we may (with the Psch. Syriac) take the Aorist as put for the Pluperfect, by a use frequent in narration. So supra v. 2. ἀπέπλυναν, 'had cleansed,' and infra xix. 1. διήρχετο (where see Note). Mark iii. 10. πολλοὺς ἐθεράπευσε. John xviii. 24. ἀπίστευαν αὐτὸν ὁ Ἄννας. Other examples may be seen in Winer Gr. Gr. § 41. 5. This idiom is indeed almost confined to narration, and chiefly has place in parenthetical sentences.

— νόσων καὶ μαστ. καὶ πν. π.] Here we see demoniacal possession studiously distinguished from disorders, and that by a Physician. The disorders are also distinguished into the ordinary and milder ones (νόσοι), and the more grievous and painful μάστιγες (as Mark iii. 10. and v. 29. and Ps. xxxii. 10.); so called, because such were regarded as peculiar scourges from God. So μάστιξ is used in Hom. Il. μ. 37. Æschyl. Prom. 703. Theb. 604. Ag. 625, where see Blomfield. Ἐθεράπευσε is used proprie of the recess and μάστιγες, and improprie of the dispositions. However, in that case there was almost always a disorder cured at the same time that a demon was ejected. Ἐχαρίσατο τὸ βλέ., 'he bestowed sight,' meaning, the faculty of sight; for such is the force of the Article, which some Editors, wrongly, would cancel.

22. See Is. xxix. 18. xxxv. 5.

25. Τρυφῇ is by most recent Commentators supposed to denote sumptuous dress; to which it is sometimes applied in the Classical writers, as in Eurip. Phœn. 1505. στολίδι κροκόσσω ἀντίστα τρυφᾶς. Thus it would stand for trifery. That, however, would be too poetic for plain prose; and there is no reason to abandon the general sense luxury, i. e. a luxurious life. Thus in a kindred passage of Artemid. iii. 38. τοῖς ἐν τρυφῇ διάγουσι. Comp. also 2 Pet. i. 13. The ὑπάρχ. must be accommodated in sense to each of the nouns with which it is connected.

29. ἰδικαίωσαν τὸν Θεόν. Of this disputed term the versions 'honoured,' 'obeyed,' and others, are but paraphrases. It is best to suppose a significatio praeferens, and to adopt the sense espoused by many of the best Commentators: acknowledged and commended the justice of God (i.e. of his purpose in calling them to repentance by John), and were accordingly baptized. This interpretation is required by the antithetical formula in the next verse, τὴν βουλὴν (counsel) τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡθέτησαν, &c. A disputed point, however, still remains,—namely, whether this and the verse following are to be considered as the words of our Lord (which is the common opinion), or whether (as some eminent Interpreters maintain) the words of the Evangelist, containing a remark, that in consequence of what our Lord then said concerning John, the people immediately resorted to his baptism. But (as is justly urged by Campbell) such cannot be the sense here; because John was then in prison, where he remained till his death. An objection so serious, that Bornemann, who strenuously maintains the words to be the Evangelist's, is compelled, in stating their sense, to pass over all mention of the people being baptized by John. And then, as if distrusting his own view, he 'sees no reason why the Aorists ἰδικαίωσαν and ἡθέτησαν should not be taken as Pluperfects.' But it may be shown that there is a reason,—namely, that the use of the Aor. 1. for the Pluperf. is an idiom only to be admitted under certain circumstances, on which see Winer Gr. Gr., and Note supra v. 21. Here, however, no such circumstances exist. In short, had the writer meant to express a Pluperfect sense, why should he not have used the Pluperfect tense? As to what is urged by Bornemann, that 'the words, regarded as those of Christ, are languid and frigid,' that is a mere question of taste. But if we allow these words which similarly follow in Matt. xi. 12, 13, to be so also. And yet even Bornemann must acknowledge those to be Christ's. Finally, the words under consideration can be no other than Christ's, because they are evidently of the very same nature with the above, and related to the same conversation of our Lord. For as πᾶς ὁ λαὸς here means the people at large, the populace (called at John vii. 49. ὁ ὄχλος ὁ μὴ γινώσκων τὸν νόμον), as opposed to the Rulers and the Pharisees,—so also the best Commentators interpret the expression βασταί at Matt. xi. 12. of the meaner crowd.

But, to advert to what may be considered as principally leading to the opinion of these verses being from the Evangelist,—namely, the words which introduce the verse following, εἰς δὲ ὁ Κύριος; these are now universally admitted to be not genuine. And vain is it that Bornemann seeks to build even upon this sandy foundation an argument for the preceding being those of the Evangelist. Nothing, surely, is more improbable than that the words should have originated in any such desire to prevent mistake in the words following: for no one could fail to see that they were Christ's. In short, it is plain that the words originated from the Lectionaries, since the verse commences an ἀνάγνωσις, or Reading, and which required to be introduced by some such words. Thus Scholz attests that they are found, not only in the Lectionaries, but in the margin of those MSS. lectus perpetui, which always mark the commencement of the Readings in the margin. It may, moreover, be urged, that the οὖν at v. 3, which is found in all the MSS., evidently has reference to what was said at v. 29, 30.

Lastly, there is another reason why the verses under consideration cannot but be from our Lord—namely, that they are evidently adverted to by him at v. 35. καὶ ἰδικαίωθη ἡ σοφία ἀπὸ τῶν τέκνων αὐτῆς πάντων. And thus we are there supplied with an authentic interpretation of one of the most variously expounded passages in all the New Test. By σοφία there is meant the wise counsel of God for bringing men to the Gospel, by what was a preparation thereto,—namely, thoroughly repenting of their former sins, and being baptized by John. And by the children of wisdom are meant those who recognized that wisdom, and approved it by acting conformably thereto, and who were therefore children of God.

The passage may be rendered thus: 'And now the great body of the people who have heard him,—and even the publicans,—have acknowledged and fulfilled the just purpose of God (see Acts xx. 27.), by being baptized by John: but the Pharisees and Lawyers have set at naught the purpose of God respecting themselves, having not been baptized by John.' Εἰς ἑαυτούς is by some interpreted 'against themselves,' 'to their own injury.' But although this sense of εἰς is supported alike by Classical and Scriptural authority, and would here give a good sense, it is better (with Cameron, Grotius, Hammond, Wolf, Whitby, Wetstein, Campbell, Rosenmüller, and Kuinoel,) to suppose a slight transposition, and connect εἰς ἑαυτούς with βουλὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ, in the sense 'in regard to themselves': a use of εἰς very frequent. Ἀθετεῖν signifies properly to displace, and fig. to abrogate; and also, as here, to make void by rejection. It is not meant that they frustrated the counsel of God (for that were impossible; see Rom. ix. 19.), but merely that they did as much as in them lay to make void that counsel, and thereby practically rejected it.

— δαιμόνιον ἔχει] for δαιμονίζεται, as often in the New Test. Though Valcknaer maintains that the former phrase was only a common expression of reviling, for to be mad; q. d. μελαγχολᾷ; which the earlier Greeks expressed by δαιμονῶν and κακοδαιμονῶν.

34. φίλος τελωνῶν.] Such is the reading of the great body of the MSS., Versions, and early Editions; which is received by Bengel, Matthæi, Griesb., Tittm., Val., and Scholz. The other reading arose probably from the passage of Matt. xi. 19.

37. καὶ ἰδοὺ, γυνή, &c.] It has been a much disputed question whether this story be the same with that narrated at Matt. xxvi. 6. Mark xiv. 3. John xii. 3, or not. The former view is maintained by some ancient and most early modern Commentators, especially Lightfoot and Grotius. The latter by Theophylact and Euthymius (from Chrysostom), and by many of the best modern Commentators, as Buxtorf, Hammond, Whitby, Wolf, Markland, Michaelis, Rosenmuller, Lampe, Tittmann, and Kuinoel. The points of dissimilarity between the two narrations, and between the Mary here mentioned and Mary Magdalene, are striking. As to the similarity, the action (anointing) was not unusual, the name of the vessel common, and the name of the Pharisee one of those most frequently met with. This is quite independent of the sense to be assigned to ἁμαρτωλός, whether sinner or Gentile. Of the latter sense there is perhaps not one undoubted example in the singular; and even with the plural it requires the Article, unless united with τελωναι. Though therefore that interpretation has been adopted by several good Commentators, the former, which is espoused by most Commentators, is greatly preferable. But when they assign to the word the sense harlot, or adulteress, they adduce no proof of that signification from the Classical writers. Nor is it necessary to suppose any such particularity. There is no reason why it may not be taken in the general sense of a viceous person; in which signification the singular is frequent, ex. gr. Luke v. 8. ὅτι ἁμαρτωλὸς εἰμι. Thus we are enabled to get rid of the harshness of taking ἦν in a pluperfect tense (very rarely met with), which all the Commentators must do who assign to ἁμαρτωλός the signification harlot. The woman, it seems, was then a sinner; a sinner, however, under conviction of sin, and having the sincere desire of amendment.

38. στάσα ὀπίσω.] Jesus, it seems, was reclining at table on a couch, leaning on his left elbow, his head and countenance turned towards the table, and his naked feet (the sandals being taken off before the meal) turned the contrary way, towards that which the servants bearing the dishes were waiting on at the triclinium.

— κατεφίλει.] The κατα is intensive. This action implied the deepest reverence and most profound humility; as the bathing his feet with her tears did earnest supplication. The anointing of the feet was also a mark of profound respect, retained even in modern times. Both these actions are alluded to by Aristoph. Vesp. 608. καὶ πρῶτα μὲν ἡ θυγάτηρ με Ἀποκρίσας, καὶ τὸ πόδ' ἀλείφει, καὶ προσκύσασα φίλῳ. The wiping his feet with her hair was also a mark of deep reverence; it being an ancient custom for the great, after washing their hands, to wipe them dry on the long hair of some attending page.

39. οὗτος, εἰ ἦν προφήτης, &c.] Render: 'If this man were a prophet, he would know.' By προφήτης is here meant a Divine legate, 'one sent from God,' and consequently endued with supernatural knowledge.

more elegant mode of expression; but the other is the more pointed and forcible.

44. Our Lord now contrasts the incivility of Simon, who had neglected the usual offices of attention, with the respectful assiduity of the woman. And here we have allusions to the several customs in use among the Jews to guests who were made very welcome. 1. Their sandals were unlaced, and their feet washed and carefully wiped, and, if the person were of high rank, anointed. 2. A kiss was the usual salutation on entrance, or as soon as the person was comfortably seated. 3. The head was usually anointed with aromatic oils or unguents. The words τῆς κεφαλῆς, not found in many MSS. and Versions, have been cancelled by Griesbach, Vater, Scholz, and others; but on insufficient grounds. The MSS. are comparatively few; Versions are, in a case like the present, no sure evidence; and better reasons may be given for the omission than for the insertion of the words. Moreover, there may be an antithesis between πόδας and κεφαλῆς, as at v. 46; as there is also between ὕδωρ and δάκρυα at v. 44.

45. εἰσῆλθον.] The chief Editors and Commentators agree in preferring εἰσῆλθον, which is the reading of some MSS. and Versions. The authority, however, for it is so slender, that, small as the difference is, an Editor is scarcely warranted in receiving it, especially as it cannot be proved that the common reading is positively wrong; for we have only to regard the language as partaking of the same hyperbolic cast, which is so characteristic of Oriental phraseology. Besides, it is probable that the woman came in very soon after our Lord was seated, and thus supplied those observances which Simon had neglected. Indeed, there is something feeble in the sense of εἰσῆλθον. That εἰσῆλθον is as proper in grammar as εἰσῆλθαι, is plain from a kindred passage of Lithan, which I have cited in Recens. Synop.: ὁ δὲ ἀνθρώπος ἰακύνθη, ἀφ' οὗπερ ἤκον, οὐ διέλιπε βέβηλυν.

47. αἱ πολλαί.] I would compare Philostrot. Vit. Ap. i. 13. μετεβρόμῃσι τῶν ἁμαρτημάτων πολλῶν ὄντων.

— ὅτι ἡγάπησε πολὺ.] On the sense of the ὅτι here Commentators are not agreed. The ancient and early modern ones interpret it for or because. But all the most eminent of the recent Expositors regard this sense as repugnant to the scope of the parable; which, say they, represents the gratuitous forgiveness of sins as the cause of the love, not the love the cause of the forgiveness; (an effect, they remark, at v. 50 ascribed to faith,) and they render the ὅτι therefore. Since, however, this signification is deficient in authority, others suppose that the love of the woman is adduced as the sign, not the cause of her pardon, and that οὐ χάριν expresses an inference from the antecedent to the consequent: 'Wherefore [since she has shown so great a regard for me] I say unto you, [it is plain that] her many sins are forgiven, for, or because, she loved much.' Yet even this method is not a little objectionable; and the ancient interpretation, being the most simple, and involving the least difficulty, deserves the preference. And as to what has been alleged, that it represents love as the meritorious cause of the remission of sins, that is by no means the case. Although faith is afterwards said to have saved her, yet as it was faith working by love, the latter might be said, in a popular sense, to be the cause of her salvation. The meaning of ὅτι ἡγάπησε πολὺ (where ὅτι is for ὅτι, i. e. καθότι, eo quod: see Note on Mark ix. 11.) may be expressed by 'inasmuch as she hath given full evidence of her love and attachment.' Now that of itself implied faith in the Messiahship of Jesus, and may be presumed to have sprung from true repentance.

48. ἀφείωνται σου αἱ ἀμ.] 'thy sins are [hereby] forgiven thee.' Many regard this as a repetition of the consolatory assurance, which Christ had on some previous occasion given to the woman. But the truth is, that we have here a formal pronouncement of that forgiveness, which the foregoing words only implied.

even forgiveth sins.' The καὶ is used as in similar passages at viii. 25, and Matt. viii. 27. Mark iv. 41; and here, as there, τίς means quis, qualis, or quantus.

VIII. 1. κατὰ πόλιν.] Wetstein rightly distinguishes between this expression and κατὰ τὴν πόλιν; the latter being said of one, the former of more than one. In fact, the κατὰ has the distributive force, which takes place not only in numerals, but also in words which are not so. The sense is: 'through or by city and town.'

2. Μαγδαληνῇ] i. e. of Magdala, on the lake of Gennesareth. The best Commentators are agreed that there is no authority in Scripture for supposing this Mary to have been a harlot; nay, it should seem that she was a person of some consequence. Ἐξεληλύθει, 'had been expelled.' Neut. for passive, as often in the Gospels and Acts. Many recent Commentators take the ἐπτά for 'many,' definite for indefinite, as in Matt. xii. 45, and xii. 26. But that idiom, as it ought nowhere to be introduced unnecessarily, so here it is unsuitable.

3. ἐπιτρόπου.] The Commentators are not agreed on the exact office designated by ἐπιτρόπος; which, as it denotes generally one who has an office committal to his charge, is of very extensive signification, and may denote Guardian, or Lieutenant of a province, or Treasurer, or house or land Steward, agent and manager. So Xen. (Econ. xii. 2. ἔχω ἐπιτρόπου ἐν τοῖς ἀγροῖς.

— διηκόνουν] 'supplied with the necessities of life;' as Matt. iv. 11. xxvii. 55. Mark i. 13. xv. 41. Theophr. Char. ii. 4. For αὐτῷ a great number of MSS. and many Versions have αὐτοῖς, which is edited by Matthæi and Scholz. But both external and internal evidence are rather in favour of the common reading, which is retained by Griesbach.

6. ἕτερον] scil. τὸ σπέρμα, to be supplied from σπείρειν. Φυὲν, from ἐφύην, phusis, a late form for the earlier ἐφυν.

7. ἐν μέσῳ.] Not 'in the midst of,' but simply 'among' or amidst.

— καὶ συμφύεσαι αἱ ἀκ., &c.] Συμφύειν is a form of later Greek, instead of the Act. Am. 2. συνίφυν; yet it occurs in Philo. What is meant by the choiking here spoken of will appear from Xenoph. (Econ. § 12. Τί γάρ, ἔφη, ἐν ὕλῃ πνίγη, συνιζορμῶσα τῷ σίτῳ καὶ διατρέχουσα τοῦ σίτου τὴν τροφήν.

8. εἰς.] This reading (for ἐν) is found in many MSS. and Versions, and is adopted by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz, as being the more difficult reading; whereas the other seems to be derived from the passage of Matt. and Mark. Εἰς occurs again in this sense infra xiv. 10.

9. τίς εἴη ἡ παραβολὴ α.] 'what may be the meaning of this parable.' So Cebes Τὰς διηγήσας ἡμῖν—τί ποῖός ἐστιν ὁ μῦθος.

10. See Note on Matt. xiii. 10, and compare Matt. xi. 25, 26. 2 Cor. iii. 5. 14. 1a. vi. 2. Eph. xii. 2. Rom. xi. 8.

[Indeed πορ. should not be considered separately, but considered separately of the words, and taken as put for or it is not pleonastic, but may be the progress of time, as the Heb. תָּקַן

do.' In ὑπὸ μεριμνῶν καὶ πλούτου τοῦ βίου a certain obscurity exists, extreme brevity. By μεριμνῶν here
be μεριμνῶν τοῦ αἵματος of Matthew
the anxious cares to avoid poverty, and preserve wealth. The former translated from Theocrit. Idyll. xxi. 1—5, Eurip. Med. 599. By πλούτου
it is called in the passages of Matthew be deceitfulness of riches, with reference to ἡδονῶν just after the ἐπιθυμία of of Mark; such as is called in Eph.
deceitful lusts; so termed, as prophets never perform.
[πορευόμενοι] for ἀκαρποὶ γίνονται
and Mark. The word is used pro-
or plants bringing fruit to maturity, most always with an Accus., though sometimes without; as Philo p. 26. αὖθις καὶ τελεσφοροῦσι.

15. καλῇ καὶ ἀγαθῇ.] This is by Beza and Grotius regarded as an expression ex adyiti Philo- sophiæ. And they compare the expression of the Classical writers καλὸς κάγαθος as said of one who is endowed with all the advantages of body, mind, fortune, &c. But the present is rather to be viewed as a phrase of common life, simply designating an honest (i. e. worthy) and good, or virtuous, heart. The καλῇ, however,
may have reference to the καλῇ γῇ just before,
which denotes, as in Xen. Æcon. xvi. 7, ground
naturally fertile.

— ἐν ὑπομονῇ.] Meaning, 'by patient perseverance.'

18. ὃ δοκεῖ ἔχειν.] The δοκεῖ is not redundant, in the present, and perhaps in very few of the many passages adduced in proof thereof. Luke has here expressed something more than Matthew and Mark; namely, that what such a person yet retains is likely to be so soon lost, that he can hardly be said to have it. [Comp. infra xix.]

19. οὐκ ἠδύναντο συντυχεῖν αὐτῷ.] 'could not get access to him because of the multitude'
[pressing about him].

20. ἐπηγγέλη—λεγόντων.] Supply τινῶν, or αὐτῶν. Ἰδεῖν, for συντυχεῖν, namely, λαλῆσαι, as in the passage of Matthew (antecedent for consequent). So in Thucyd. iv. 125. Xen.
Cyr. iv. 6, 2.

23. ἀφύπνωσε] 'obdormivit.' A rare sense of the word, which in the Classical writers signifies 'to raise oneself from sleep,' to awake. This, however, (probably a provincial or popular use of the word,) is found in the Sept., Judg. v. 27. and Ignat. Martyr. § 7.

— κατέβη.] Stormy gusts are, in the Classical writers, often said κατεῖναι. So Thucyd. ii. 25. ἀνέμου κατεῖντος. Pausan. ii. 34. 3. κατεῖντος ἐπὶ τοῦ πνεύματος καταβαίνειν.

— συνεπληροῦντο.] A popular and frequent catachresis, by which what happens to the ship is ascribed to the sailors.

29. πολλοῖς χρόνοις] for ἐκ χρόνων ἱκανῶν, v. 27. So Plut. de Educ. xiv. 26. ἐν δεσμοτηρίᾳ πολλοὺς κατεσάπη χρόνους, simply, 'for a long time.'

is also employed by Philo, p. 219. ὅλον τὸν αἰῶνα ὑπὸ θείας κατοχῆς συναρπασθεὶς οἰστήρ.

31. τὴν ἄβυσσον] scil. χώραν, i. e. Tartarus, that part of Hades in which the souls of the wicked were supposed to be confined. See 2 Pet. i. 14. Apoc. xx. 1. So also Eurip. Phœn. 1661. Τάρταρον ἄβυσσον χάσματα, and Acts Thm. § 32. ἡ ἄβυσσος τοῦ Τάρταρου. And so in 2 Pet. ii. 4. we have ταρταρώσεως. See Professor Stuart's Essays on the words relating to Future Punishment, especially on ἕως, ἐν, and τάρταρος. 'Sheol (says he) was considered as a vast domain or region (of which the gehenn was only a part, or a kind of entrance way), extending deep down in the earth, even to its lowest abysses. It may also be remarked, that, as in the Old Test. Sheol is a place to which the righteous go, as well as the wicked; and as our behaviour, subsequently to his death, is represented as being in Hades, Ps. xvi. 10. Acts ii. 27, 31; & probable that the general conception meaning the region of the dead, common Elysium and a Tartarus (to speak language), or a state of happiness and misery.' See more in the ample Dis- Mr. Greswell 'on the existence and Indes,' forming the 10th Chapter of x to his work on the Parables. I observe, that the etymology of the word need not have so perplexed Philolo- notwithstanding the doubts of Gesenius, ly derived (as Parkhurst and others say ἥω; yet not from the signifi- cation; nor has it any sense in common I suspect that the primitive physical of ἥω was to dig deep, to scoop out, and as men dig deep only in search of the verb came to mean, figuratively, seek for. So Job iii. 21. 'and dig for εὖ seek) death more than for hidden Thus the word was originally merely simple of ἥω, and denoted a pit thus the word hell (called in German die Gruft were originally only past t verbs meaning to dig out, to hallow.

32. ἐν τῷ ὄρει.] This is meant to explain ἐκεῖ.

33. εἰσῆλθιν.] Very many MSS. have εἰσῆλ- θον, which is received by Matthæi and Scholz.

34. τὸ γεγενημένον.] Many MSS. have τὸ γεγονός, which is received by Griesbach and Scholz; while Matthæi retains the common read- ing. 'Ἀπελθόντες before ἀπήγγ., is rightly cancelled by all Editors, as being absent from almost all MSS., and, no doubt, introduced from Matt. viii. 33.

37. [Comp. Acts xvi. 39.]

38. ἀπέλυσε] 'dismissed him.' Mark, οὐκ ἀφῆκε.

39. καθ' ὅλην τὴν πόλιν.] Not meaning the whole city [of Gadara], but the state; for, from what goes before, it appears they had been told what had happened; and at v. 37. it is said ἠρώτησαν αὐτόν ἀπαν τὸ πλήθος τῆς περιχώρου τῶν Γαδ. ἀπελθεῖν.

40. ἀπεδέξατο] 'joyfully received him.'

42. ἀπὸ θνήσκων] 'was (as it were) dead,' 'was near unto death.' Bornemann compares Plato Phæd. ἀποθνήσκειν τε καὶ τιθῆναι. Συνέπνι- γον. A stronger term than συνέθλιβον, which is used by Mark.

43. οὖσα ἐν ῥύσει.] This use of εἶναι with ἐν, denoting to labour under a disorder, occurs elsewhere in Scripture. We may compare ἀνθρώπος ἐν πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτω in Mark v. 2. In either case the ἐν is for σύν. For εἰς λατροῦς is written λατροῖς in almost all the best MSS., which is adopted by every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz. On the force of the Dative, see Matth. Gr. Gr. § 387.

45. καὶ εἶπεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς· τίς, &c.] He asked, not that he was ignorant who had touched him, but that he might not be himself the divulger of the miracle; and that the woman, hearing the question, and drawing near, might testify the benefit she had received, and that, in consequence of her declaration, she might presently hear from his lips that 'her faith had saved her;' and that, by this means, others might be excited to come and be healed of their disorders.

46. ἔγνω δύνάμιν ἐξελθοῦσαν ἀπ' ἐ.] See Note on Mark v. 30.

49. μὴ σκύλλε τὸν διδ.] Meaning, 'do not trouble the master [to come].' So supra vii. 6. μὴ σκύλλου. Herodian, iv. 13. 8. ἵνα δὲ μὴ πάντα τὸν στρατὸν σκύλλῃ. On the primary force of the word, see Note on Matt. ix. 36.

51. εἰσελθόν.] Many MSS. have ἔλθόν, which is received by Wetstein, Griesbach, and Scholz.

Καὶ Ἰωάννην καὶ Ἰάκωβον (for Ἰάκωβ καὶ Ἰωάνν.) is found in all the best MSS. and Versions, and Theophylact; and is edited by Wet., Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, and Scholz; perhaps rightly; as the mistake might easily arise from the καὶ—καί.

52. ἐκόπτοντο αὐτήν.] Κόπτεσθαι properly signifies to beat or strike oneself; and then, because that was a frequent accompaniment of extreme grief, to beail, grieve for any one. It answers to the Heb. נָסַח, which is followed by לְ, for, or by, over, and has sometimes in the Sept. (as here) simply an Accusative, thus becoming a Depersonal. On the various modes of lamentation for the dead, see Geier de luctu Heb.

54. ἡ παῖς.] Nomin. for Vocat., which occurs also at vi. 25. x. 21. xii. 32. xviii. 11. and Mark v. 41, and sometimes in the Classical writers, especially the Attic ones. The words ἐκβαλὼν ἔξω πάντας καὶ, not found in some very ancient MSS. and Versions, are rejected by Schulz and Bornemann, and cancelled by Lachman. They may possibly have been introduced from the parallel passage of Mark. But as the MSS. are very few (only about eight), may we not rather suspect an accidental omission?

Ant. xviii. 2, 1. It was not then a city, but was afterwards made such by Philip, when he restored it.

12. ἡμέρα ἤρξατο κλίνειν.] Κλίνειν and its compounds are often used with ἥλιος, to denote the declination of the sun to the horizon. Sometimes, as here, ἡμέρα is used instead of ἥλιος. In these cases some suppose an ellipsis of αἱ ἡμέραι, which is expressed in Judg. xix. 11. & Arrian Exp. Al. iii. 4. ἐγκλιναντες δὲ τοῦ ἡλίου αἱ ἡμέραι.

— τὰς κύκλῳ κώμας.] Supply ἐν and οὐδας, or κοιμένας.

— ἵνα καταλύσωσι] i. e. 'that they may seek καταλύματα, or lodgings;' as xix. 7. and Gen. xxiv. 23. (Sept.) The figure is derived from travellers unloading their beasts, and ungirding themselves.

— εὐρωσιν ἐπισιτισμόν] 'may procure food for themselves.' So Thucyd. i. 31. ὠφέλιαν τινὰ πειρᾶσθαι ἀπ' αὐτῶν εὐρίσκεισθαι. Ἐπισιτ. is properly a military term, and literally signifying a provisioning.

— ὅτι ὥδε, &c.] The full sense is: 'for we are here in a desert place, without any thing to eat; which last is to be understood by implication.'

13. ἰχθύες δύο.] This, instead of δύο ἰχθύας, is found in a very great number of MSS., and is received by all the best Editors.

— εἰ μήτι.] Here some Expositors suppose an ellipsis of οὐ δυνατόν ἐστι, or οὐ δύναμει. A method so harsh, that others seek to remove the difficulty by taking εἰ μήτι for nam quia, and making the sentence interrogative. For the above signification, however, they adduce no valuable authority. It is better, therefore, to adhere to the usual signification of εἰ μή, i. e. unless; and suppose that the τι has either what Hooper calls the vis στοχαστική, fortasse, or fortasse. And so 1 Cor. vii. 5. 2 Cor. xiii. 5.

14. κλισίας.] So Joseph. Ant. vi. 4, 1. συνεκλίνει αὐτὸν ἐπὶ τὴν ἰστίασιν. The word is rare in the Classical writers. The most appropriate example may be found in Athen. xi. init. συνεκλινάς (scil. αὐτὸν) ἐν τῇ πόδι, θαλλῶν τι κατακλᾶσαι, ἀντὶ τραπέζης, παρῆθαι τῶν τυθέντων.

16. εὐλόγησεν αὐτούς.] Lit. 'asked the Divine blessing upon them.' Agreeably to the Jewish custom, by which it was usual for the head of the family, at every meal, to pronounce a blessing on the food, previously to partaking of it, commencing with the words 'Blessed art thou, O God, who bringest bread out of the earth,' &c. Thus the term εὐλογεῖν came to be transferred to the food itself, and, with the Accus. of the thing, was equivalent to εὐχαριστεῖν, as here and in Matt. xxvi. 26. et al.

20. ὁ Π.] The ὁ, not found in many good MSS., is cancelled by Matthæi and Schell.

22. The alteration in punctuation which I have inserted in τούτῳ· εἰπὼν, δὲ, seems called for by propriety, and is confirmed by the parallel usage of Matthew and Mark. This narrative use of εἰπὼν is very frequent.

23. καθ' ἡμέραν.] The Editors and Critics are not agreed as to the genuineness of this expression. It is rejected by Wetstein, Matthæi, and Scholz, but retained by Griesbach, Knapp, Litzman, and Vater. External evidence is pretty evenly balanced; the Alexandrian recension and most all the Versions having it, and the Constantinopolitan, with the other Versions and several Fathers, being without it. Griesbach thinks it was removed by the librarii, as not being in the other Gospels. But he adduces no example of a similar curtailment from the same cause. Litzman, on the contrary, thinks it was introduced by the Fathers and Interpreters; who had perhaps in view 1 Cor. xv. 31. And of this he adduces some strong proofs. I entirely agree with him; and would add that the same asceticism which induced several of the Fathers to throw out εἰπὼν at Matt. v. 22, may have induced them to retain καθ' ἡμέραν here. But I rather think that they only brought it forward to complete the text, not the text; and that having been taken up by them by the Scholasticæ, it was occasionally used in the margin of copies, and then was introduced into the text of the transcripts. [Comp. at x. 38. infra xiv. 27.]
L. [Comp. Matt. x. 39. xvi. 25. John xii. 25.]

25. ζημιωθείς] sc. ἑαυτὸν, i. e. αὐτοῦ ψυχὴν. Herodot. vii. 39. has τὴν ψυχὴν ζημιώσασθαι.

26. [Comp. infra xii. 9. Matt. x. 33.] In arranging a harmony, Mark xvi. 27. should be brought in immediately after this verse.

27. ἱστώτων.] This, for the common reading ἱστηκότων, is found in very many MSS. and the Ed. Princ., and was received by Bengel, Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, and Scholz.

28. ἐγένετο—ὀκτώ.] There is here something seemingly anomalous in the construction: to remove which, some recur to the idiom whereby, in Hebrew and Hellenistical phraseology, verbs singular are united with nouns plural. But that principle is inapplicable here. And as to ἐγίνοντο, which some would read, it is a mere conjecture. The truth is, that ἐγένετο is not the true verb to ἡμέραι, but, together with δὲ, constitutes (by an ellipse of τοῦτο) a formula, frequent in St. Luke, which merely serves to introduce some new narration. Thus ἐγένετο δὲ, &c. will be connected with καὶ παραλαβὼν; and consequently ὥσπερ ἡμέραι ὀκτὼ will be a parenthetical parenthesis of the preceding μετὰ τ. λ. τ. Τὸν, not found in very many MSS. and early Editions, is cancelled by Matthæi, Griesbach, and Scholz; perhaps without sufficient reason.

29. λευκὸν ἕξ.] 'very dazzling white.' The ἕξ, is intensive.

30. ὁφθόντες ἐν δ.] 'appearing with a resplendent light.' See supra ii. 9.

31. τὴν ἔξοδον.] This word often signifies a military expedition, both in the Scriptural and Classical writers. Hence some have imagined that it here figuratively represents the contest our Lord was afterwards to maintain against the rebellious Jews, on his advent at the destruction of Jerusalem. But this is neither warranted by the words, nor permitted by the context. The best Commentators since the time of Grotius have been agreed that ἔξοδος (by an ellipsis of τοῦ ζῆν, expressed in Joseph. Ant. iv. 8, 2.) is here used to denote death; by a euphemism common both in the Scriptural and Classical writers, and indeed found in every language, and which is justly considered among the allusions that have preserved that most ancient of traditions, the immortality of the soul. The misinterpretation above adverted to probably arose from the verb with which ἔξοδος is construed, πληροῦν; which would be very applicable to ἀγῶνα: whereas, in its usual sense, it seems not to suit ἔξοδος. Yet it does; since, by a sort of sensus praesens, there is an allusion to the previous accomplishment of the work he came to perform (see John xvii. 4.); just as in the Latin phrase obire mortem, which is used with allusion to obire paucos; as also defungi vultu, with allusion to the previous discharge of the business of life. So Curtius writes defunctus moris.

32. βεβαρημένοι ὕπνῳ.] So Anacr. Od. 50. βεβαρημένοι ἐς ὕπνον. and Anthol. Gr. iv. 177. βαβ. ὕπνῳ.

— εἶδον τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ, &c.] [Comp. Dan. viii. 18. x. 9.]

33. [μίαν Μωϋσεῖ.] This, instead of Μωϋσεῖ, is found in almost all the best MSS. and Versions, together with the Ed. Princ., and has been adopted by Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz.

34. ἐν τῷ ἐκείνους εἰσελθεῖν εἰς τὴν νεφ.] 'when they entered into the cloud,' meaning by a common permutation of terms, 'when the cloud enveloped them.' They were 'afraid,' because the cloud was a symbol of the Divine presence. See Note on Matt. xvii. 6.

35. [Comp. Matt. iii. 17. Mark i. 11. 2 Pet. i. 17.]

36. ἐν τῷ γαμίσθαι τὴν φωνήν.] 'when the voice had ceased;' lit., had been.

— εὐρέθη ὁ Ἰησοῦς μόνος.] Perhaps εἶρ. is here to be taken as at Acts viii. 40. Φῶς, εὐρέθη αὐτῷ ὡς ἄλῳτον, and so may be rendered, 'made his appearance, or was seen to be alone.' This answering to the account of Matthew and Mark, οὐδένα εἶδον εἰ μὴ τὸν Ἰησοῦν μόνον.

38. ἐπιβλέψαι.] This, for the common reading ἐπιβλέψων, is found in almost all the best MSS., and has been edited by Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, Tittman, and Scholz.

39. συντρίβον αὐτόν.] liter. 'breaking down, crushing his strength.'

40. ἐκβάλεσιν.] This, for ἐκβαλλ., is edited from MSS., by Matthæi, Griesbach, and Scholz.

41. πρὸς ὑμᾶς.] apud vos. Equivalent to the μὲθ' ὑμῶν of Matthew. The same signification is found in John i. 1. Ἀνέξομαι ὑμῶν, 'shall I bear with you?' This sense is frequent in the New Test., and sometimes occurs in the Classical writers, though with the Accusative.

— τὸν—ὥδε.] This (instead of ὥδε τὸν υἱὸν σου) is found in almost all the best MSS. and the Edit. Princ., and is received by Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, and Scholz.

42. συνεσπάραξε.] 'threw him into strong spasms or convulsions;' the syn being intensive. 43. ἐπὶ τῷ μυ. τοῦ Θεοῦ] 'at the mightiness of God' as manifested in Christ. Μεγαλειότης is a word which, in Scripture, is almost appropriated to designating Divine power. So it is used in Acts xix. 27. of Diana; and in 2 Pet. i. 16. of Christ, thus showing Peter's belief in the Divinity of our Lord. See Phot. Epist. 125.

44. Σίσθε—ὥτα ὑμῶν.] Equivalent to Σίσθε ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ, which occurs in Luke xxi. 14. Commentators are not agreed as to the reference in τῇ καρδίᾳ τ. Most recent ones understand thereby the sayings of the people, who had seen his late miracles, and had accordingly glorified God, and acknowledged Jesus as the Christ. The expression, however, is not τὰ ῥήματα, but τοὺς λόγους. And no such words have occurred in the preceding context; and to suppose them implied in ἔξεπλήσσοντο and θαυμαζόντων, would be extremely harsh. Not to say that the admonition would seem scarcely necessary; for the disciples would be ready enough of themselves to lay to heart and remember any such sayings. Hence it is better, with others, to suppose τοὺς λόγους τούτους to mean the words just about to be said. Thus the γὰρ will here, as often, serve for explanation, and have the sense scilicet, namely. See. A rendering supported by the authority of the Arabic, Persian, and Æthiopic Versions.

45. ἵνα μὴ αἰσθ. The best Commentators are agreed that ἵνα is for ὥστε, adeo ut, inasmuch that; the sense being, 'And it was hidden (i. e. obscure) to them, so that they did not understand it.' They understood, as Kuinoel observes, the words of Christ, but were at a loss how to reconcile them with their preconceived opinion (founded on their own traditions), that the Messiah would live for ever, or with the great things they expected from him. These prejudices, in after ages, led to the distinction, made by the Rabbins, between Messiah Ben Joseph, who was to die, and Messiah Ben David, who was to triumph and live for ever. See Whitby.

46. εἰσῆλθε.] (Comp. Joseph. Ant. xiv. 14. 4. 'Αντώνιον οἴκτος εἰσέρχεται.)

— τὸ, τίς, &c.] This use of τὸ, in reference not to a noun, but to a sentence, or part of a sentence, is almost peculiar to St. Luke, though it occurs also in Matt. xix. 18, and Mark ix. 23. (Campbell.) In fact, the neuter Article 'stands before all propositions which are cited as proverbs or maxims, or which, on account of their importance, require to be made distinctly prominent.' See Winer, Gr. Gr. p. 54.

49. τὰ.] This is omitted in very many MSS., and is cancelled by Matthæi, Griesbach, and Scholz.

— οὐκ ἀκολουθεῖ μεθ' ἡμῶν.] The sense is, 'does not belong to our company [of disciples],' 'is not our fellow disciple.' Mark, οὐκ ἀκολ. ἡμῶν. The phrase is supposed to have been formed from the custom of the Jewish Doctors (like that of the Greek Philosophers), of being accompanied by their disciples wherever they went.

50. ὃς γὰρ—ἡμῶν.] See Note on Mark ix. 40.
51. συμπλ. τὰς ἡμέρας τῆς ἀναλ. α.] Συμπληροῦσθαι, when used of time, denotes such a completion of a period between two given periods as that the latter is fully come. Here it is, as often, taken populariter; an event being thus spoken of as come, when it is very near at hand. On the sense of ἀναλήψεως the Commentators are not agreed. Some take it to signify a removal, others a lifting up, i. e. on the cross: interpretations alike inadmissible. The true one is, no doubt, that of the Syriac and Arabic, Euthymius, Beza, De Dieu, Grotius, and others down to Rosenmüller, Kuinoel, Schleusner, and Wahl, who understand it of our Lord's being received back into heaven (Comp. John iii. 13.), with allusion to his having come from heaven. The sense, indeed, does not elsewhere occur either in the New Test. or the LXX., except in 2 Kings ii. 11. of the translation of Elijah; but the verb ἀναλαμβάνειν is often used to denote Christ's ascension, ex. gr. Acts i. 2. ii. 23. 1 Tim. iii. 16. And ἀνάληψις occurs in Test. xii. Patr. in Fabric. Cod. Pseud. i. p. 585, and in the name of a Treatise, called Ἀνάληψις Μωϋσίου. [See Mark xvi. 19.]

— τὸ πρόσωπον α. ἐσθίριξ.] This is best explained as a Hebraism formed from נָפֶשׁ וְנָפֶשׁ, which often in the Sept. denotes to firmly determine and resolve. So the Pers. Vers. renders 'positum firmum fecit'; and Valcknaer, 'firmiter animo destinavit,' 'he firmly resolved to go.'

53. οὐκ ἰδίξαντο] for ἰδίξ. s. olcian, as in Arrian, Epict. iii. 26. and Luke xvi. 4; meaning, hospitio excipere.

— ὅτι τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ ἦν πορευόμενον, &c.] This phrase is Hebraic (so in 2 Sam. xvii. 11. נָפֶשׁ וְנָפֶשׁ וְנָפֶשׁ, which is rendered by the LXX. καὶ τὸ πρόσωπόν σου πορευόμενον ἐν μέσῳ αὐτῶν), and the sense is, 'because they knew that he was travelling to Jerusalem.'

54. ἀναλῶσαι] 'to consume, destroy.' This signification is found both in the Scriptural and Classical writers, and is applied to destruction by famine, in Gen. xli. 30. Ezek. xix. 12. On the wide difference between the case and the Apostles and their οἶκον, see Grot.

55. οὐκ οἴδατε—ἴσται.] Most commentators take this sentence interrogating, 'know ye not with what spirit ye ought to be actuated [as my The ancient and the earlier moderns stand it declaratively, 'Ye know no disposition ye are actuated [and whither hurry you];' ye do not consider the ness of what you propose. The latter seems preferable; the former violence to the words by requiring taken in the sense assigned to it by Expositors, 'ye ought to be.' And if them, with Bornemann, 'nonne per animo sitis?' even that is somewhat frigid, and the sense far inferior in simplicity to the declarative one. ⁸ were rather the circuitous manner of philosopher, 'willing to wound, but strike,' than in the bold and decisive rebuke which characterized our Lord. It is a no small objection to the latter mode, that not one of the ancient MSS. so understood the words.

This whole clause, and the introduced καὶ εἰπεν, are absent from many MSS. and Fathers, and are suspected by some to be not genuine; but without sufficient cause. There is more cause to suspect the omission of the next clause, ὁ γὰρ Υἱὸς—οἱ, has been cancelled by Griesbach and indeed it may possibly have been a mark formed on John iii. 17. and x with respect to the other two clauses, reason to suspect the genuineness of the MSS. in which the latter is not found very few exceptions, the same as have not the former. Inasmuch then but suspect that in these MSS. the two clauses were omitted by the careless Scribes, whose blunder was probably by the two καὶ's, each of which may have commenced a line in the very ancient MSS. which the Uncial MSS. were copied.

61. ἀποτάξασθαι τοῖς, &c.] Heins. and Doddridge apply the words to the man's possession, supposing an ellipse of κτήμασι; and they take the sense to be, 'to arrange and settle my affairs.' But this is very harsh. The common interpretation, by which τοῖς εἰς τὸν οἶκον is taken for τοῖς οἰκείοις, yields a sense so simple and natural, that we cannot doubt its truth. And of the sense to bid farewell in ἀποτ. abundant examples have been adduced by Kypke.

62. οὐδεὶς ἐπιβαλὼν—Θεοῦ.] We have here an admonition couched under an agricultural figure, derived from the ploughman, who must keep his eyes intent on his work, and not permit them to be turned aside to any other object; otherwise his labour will be fruitless. See Hesiod. Op. D. li. 61. and Theocr. Id. 10. init. Turning back implies either inattention, or preference to some other employment than that he is engaged in; either of which were inconsistent with the right discharge of duty. Compare the Pythagorean maxim, in Simplic. on Epict. 332, cited by Grotius, εἰς τὸ λαρὸν ἀποσχόμενος, μὴ ἐπιστρέφω. To the present purpose also are the words of Heb. x. 38. ἰδὺν ὑποστὰίληται [ὁ δούλος], οὐκ εὐδοκεῖ ἡ ψυχὴ μου ἐν αὐτῷ and Phil. iii. 14.

X. 1. ἀνέδειξεν—καὶ ἑτέροις] 'appointed besides others also,' i. e. besides the Apostles. Some few MSS., Versions, and Fathers read ἰβδ. &c. But their authority is weak; and I suspect that the B was derived from the K following. Those two letters are, in MSS. written in the uncial character, frequently confounded. Some, however, are of opinion that 70 is a round number for 72; the number, they say, of the Elders selected by Moses as his colleagues in the government of the people, and of the Jewish Sanhedrim. But in the first case seventy was the number; and in that of the other, there is reason to think that not 72, but 70, was the real number.

2. See Matth. ix. 37. and Notes. For οὖν some ancient MSS. read δέ, which is thought to be confirmed by most of the Versions, and it is placed in the inner margin by Griesbach, and received into the text by Lachmann; but rashly; for it is a mere alteration of the Alexandrian school. The Critics stumbled, it seems, at this rather unusual sense of οὖν, by which it has a resumptive, or continuative force, and may be rendered porro; as in 1 Cor. viii. 4.

—ἐκβάλῃ.] This, for the common reading ἐκβάλλῃ, is found in very many MSS. and early Editions, and is received by almost all Editors from Matthæi to Scholz.

3. See Note on Matt. x. 16.

4. μηδένα κατὰ τὴν ὁδὸν ἀσπ. Not meaning that they should violate the common forms of courtesy (as appears from Matt. x. 12. Luke x. 5.), but that they should suffer nothing of vain form, or merely complimentary address, still less mere trifling conversation, to divert them from their sacred office.

5. εἰρήνη τῷ οἴκῳ τ.] A custom transmitted from the Apostles to the Bishops of the Church. See Recens. Synop.

6. μὲν.] This (not found in most of the ancient MSS., and in several Versions, Fathers, and early Editions) is cancelled by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz. It was probably inserted to complete the apodosis. The Article ὁ is omitted in almost all the best MSS., some Fathers, and nearly all the early Editions. I suspect that it crept, by an error of the press, into the 5th Edition of Erasmus, and consequently was introduced into the 3d of Stephens, where it is found. Accordingly it could not, as some imagine, be a mere conjecture of Beza. It is true he considered the Article as indispensable: in which, however, he was so far mistaken, that the Article can by no means be tolerated; the regimen (as Bp. Middl. observes) not permitting it, this being one of those numerous cases in which υἱὸς (by Hebraism) is put before a Genitive, to indicate the relation of possession or resemblance, participation, &c., as in Luke xvi. 8. υἱὸς τοῦ αἵματος τούτου. Matt. xxiii. 15. υἱὸς τῆς γλύννης. 1 Thess. v. 5. υἱὸς τοῦ φωτός, &c. The sense is, ‘one deserving of your blessing.’

7. ἄξιός γάρ ἐστι.] The full sense is, ‘[And this ye may freely do,] for the labourer is worthy of his hire: as much as to say, ‘ye will earn your temporal support by your labour for the spiritual good of your hosts.’ Μὴ μεταβαίνετε—οἰκίαν, literally, ‘do not change your lodgings, by going from house to house,’

9. ἡγγικεν ἐφ' ὑμᾶς.] Lit., ‘has approached,’ ‘is at hand.’

11. τὸν κον. ἀπομασσόμεθα ὑμῖν.] Render, ‘we return it back to you;’ a form of giving up all intercourse: q. d. ‘even the very dust from your city, which cleaveth unto us, we wipe off [and return it back] to you.’ Ἐφ' ὑμῶν is by almost all Commentators supposed to mean, ‘against you,’ ‘to your harm.’ But that sense cannot be admitted. All that is meant seems to be this,—that the same solemn message is to be delivered unto them, whether they will bear, or whether they will forbear. Render, ‘But (or however) know ye this (i. e. receive this our testimony), that the kingdom,’ &c. Griesbach indeed cancels ἐφ' ὑμᾶς, from some MSS.; but wrongly.

12. Λέγω δὲ ὑμῖν.] The δὲ, not found in very many MSS., most of them ancient, and several Versions and early Editions, is cancelled by Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, and Scholz. But the present formula is almost always accompanied with some conjunction. And periphrasis here would require one. [See Matth. x. 19.]

13. ἐν σάκκῳ—καθήμεναι.] This posture is mourning (namely, sitting on the ground) and is used not only among the Eastern, but the Western nations of antiquity. Comp. Eurip. Iph. A. 1175. Xen. Anab. v. 1. vii. 3. and see D'Oville on Charit. p. 488. The putting on sackcloth was not confined to the East. So Plutarch, iii. 168. says of the superstitious man, ἔξω καθήμενος ἔχων. [See Ezek. iii. 6.]

17. in τῷ ὀνόματί σου i.e. when commanded in thy name to come out of the person possessed.

18. ἰδεώρουν τὸν Σ., &c. The best Commentators are agreed that this is a bold and figurative mode of expression, anticipating the future triumph, already commencing, of the Gospel over the powers of darkness. So Bp. Warburton, Serm. xxvii. says, 'it is a lively picture of the sudden precipitation of the Prince of the air, where he had so long held his empire; and hung, like a pestilential meteor, over the sons of men; and that, as being exalted to heaven imports widely spread dominion, so falling from heaven denotes a sudden fall from eminence and power to ruin and destruction. There is here an allusion to Is. xiv. 12; the lightning being emblematic of swiftmess; q. d. 'the power of Satan is broken.' Comp. John xii. 31. Rev. xii. 7. sq. xx. 2. seq. Eph. vi. 12. A similar form of expression occurs in the Classical writers. Thus Cicero Epist. Att. 5. says of Pompey, 'ex astris decidisse.'

19. πατεῖν ἐπάνω ὕφρ. καὶ σκορπ. This expression may be taken literally, as in Mark xvi. 17. ὅφεις ἀρῶντες. Yet, from the connection with the preceding verse, it should rather seem to be another figure expressive of their safety,—namely, from men as deadly in their hostility as serpents and scorpions. The connection of the two verses is this: 'I saw (by anticipation) devils depart at your bidding, and by the power I gave you. In virtue of the same power you shall now be preserved both from the assaults of Satan and all his emissaries, and shall prevail over the most bitter hostility. By τῷ ἐχθρῷ is to be understood Satan; that being the literal meaning of the appellation. — καὶ οὐδὲν ὑμᾶς οὐ μὴ ἔδικήσῃ. There is here an intensive accumulation of negatives. See Matt. xxiv. 21. and Note. So in Lucian Pisc. § 19. οὐδὲν οὐ μὴ γίνεσθαι δίκαιον, δικαιοσύνην παραρῶσθαι.

20. To repress that excessive elation, which new privileges and powers of a temporal kind would too surely generate in minds not yet weaned from the world, our Lord now addresses to them a most serious admonition; which, to be well understood, must be taken with due modification, and applied agreeably to the metaphor employed to convey it. They are not so much to rejoice that the demons are subject to them, as that, &c.

— ὅτι τὰ ὀνόματα, &c.] The best Commentators are agreed that there is here an allusion to the methods of human polity; future life being represented under the image of a temporal πολιτεία, in which the names of citizens were inscribed in a book, from which were occasionally expunged the names of those persons who were deemed unworthy, and who thereby lost the jus civitatis. An image not unfrequent in the Old Test., and which is sometimes found in the New Test.; nor is it rare in the Classical writers.

Μᾶλλον (not found in very many MSS., Versions, Fathers, and early Editions) is cancelled, I think rightly, by almost all Editors.

21. ἡγαλιάσατο τῷ πν., &c.] Here we have the same rapturous expressions of praise and thanksgiving, as on the return of the twelve Apostles from executing the same commission. See Note on Matt. xi. 25—27. xiii. 11; and comp. Is. xxix. 14. Ecclus. iii. 19. 1 Cor. i. 19, 26. Ὡς, 'time,' answering to the καιρῷ of Matthew.

— ὅτι ἀπέκρυψας, &c.] The phrase here employed, of 'hiding these things from the wise and prudent,' is similar to language often found in Scripture; which ascribes to Divine agency the permitted results of human voice or folly. To a customary phrase, then, proceeding from our Saviour's lips must be assigned its usual meaning; as indeed appears from the tenour of the preceding exhortation. If the Father had hidden these things from the wise and prudent, it was only in a sense consistent with the display, before their eyes, of miracles plain and numerous,—with the employment of a machinery contrived and admirably fitted for the purpose of effecting their conversion and conversion. (Ogilvie's Bampton Lect.)

22. γινώσκει.] Meaning that full and complete knowledge expressed by ἐπιγινώσκει in the parallel passage of Matthew. The knowledge in question is primarily as respects the nature of the Father and of the Son. See Smith's Scrip. Test. ii. 61. seqq.

Πατήρ, εἰ μὴ ὁ Υἱὸς, καὶ ᾧ ἐὰν βούληται ὁ Υἱὸς ἀποκαλύψαι. * Καὶ, στραφεὶς πρὸς τοὺς μαθητὰς κατ' ἴδιαν, εἶπε· Μακάριοι οἱ ὀφθαλμοὶ οἱ βλέποντες ἃ βλέπετε! λέγω γὰρ ὑμῖν, ὅτι πολλοὶ προφῆται καὶ βασιλεῖς ἠθέλησαν ἰδεῖν ἃ ὑμεῖς βλέπετε, καὶ οὐκ εἶδον· καὶ ἀκοῦσαι ἃ ἀκούετε, καὶ οὐκ ἤκουσαν.

Ἐῖπε δὲ αὐτῷ· Ὁρθῶς ἀπεκρίθης· τοῦτο ποίει, καὶ ζήσῃ. Ὁ δὲ, θέλων δικαιοῦν ἑαυτόν, εἶπε πρὸς τὸν Ἰησοῦν· Καὶ τίς ἐστί μου πλησίον; Ὑπολαβὼν δὲ ὁ Ἰησοῦς εἶπεν· Ἀνθρωπὸς τις κατέβαινεν ἀπὸ Ἱερουσαλὴμ εἰς Ἱεριχῶν, καὶ λησταῖς περιέπεσεν· οἱ καὶ ἐκδύσαντες αὐτόν

25. ἐκπειράζων.] From the elaborate investigation of the sense of the word by Mr. Greswell, it appears to mean, 'putting his skill to full proof,' i. e. consulting him on questions most difficult.

— κληρονομήσω.] On the full sense of the term, see Mr. Greswell, in Par. iii. p. 3. seqq.

26. ἐν τῷ νόμῳ τί γίγ., &c.] Our Lord refers him to the Law, that he may show him how inadequately he had observed it, and thus bring him unto the Saviour Christ.

27. ἐξ ὅλης τῆς καρδίας σου καὶ ἐξ ὅλης τῆς ψυχῆς, &c.] Recent Commentators usually regard this iteration of καρδίας, ψυχῆς and ἰσχύος as pleonastic. But it is rather intended to strengthen the sense; nor is this mode of expression without example in the Classical writers. Thus Plautus, Capt. ii. 3. 'Id petam, idque persequar, corde et animo atque viribus.'

29. Θέλων δικ., i. e. wishing to excuse himself from the imputation of not having attended to the Law he taught; for the Pharisee desired to show that he had not proposed a slight or easily solvable question, but one of importance, and difficult determination. And since πλησίον is a term of extensive application, he takes occasion, from that ambiguity, to put the question καὶ τίς ἐστί μου πλησίον; An answer, however, is returned quite contrary to the expectation of the lawyer; and Christ, by teaching that (after the example of the Samaritan, who showed such kindness to the Jew) the offices of humanity and kindness were to be extended even to strangers, foreigners, and enemies, leaves the Pharisee nothing to answer. (Kuin.)

— τίς ἐστί μου πλησίον;] The use of ὁ πλησίον here has before been illustrated in the Notes on Matthew and Mark. And the expression may, in this view, be defined to mean any one of our fellow-creatures with whom we are in any way connected, whether in respect of country, religion, or political institutions. It was a noble sentiment of a heathen, 'HOMO SUM: nihil humani a me alienum puto:' a sentiment, however, which can alone be properly felt and acted on by a Christian.

30. ὑπολαβὼν.] Sub. τὸν λόγον, which ὑπολαβὼν is supplied in Herodot. iii. 146. Responsum 'taking him up,' i. e. 'answering;' a significant common not only to the Scriptural and Hellenistic, but also to the Classical writers. So the Latin excipere and suscipere. It is well observed by Kuinoel, that in the best Classical writers ὑπολαβὼν is joined to ἔφη, when any one interrupts the speaker, and so answers him as to take exception at, reprehend, or at least circumscribe; correct, any position laid down by the other; in which case the word is not, as some say, redundant. Thus it here seems to convey, by implication, an intimation that he had not, as he thought thoroughly kept the moral law.

— ἀνθρωπὸς τις, &c.] Our Lord was pleased to reply by an example in point.

— κατέβαινεν.] The term is used with allusion to the situation of Jericho as regarded Jerusalem.

— λησταῖς περιέπεσε] 'fell among robbers.' The scene, as it were, of this story is well laid out on the road between Jerusalem and Jericho: which ran through a kind of wilderness diversified with rocks and defiles, and, at that time,—and even the days of Jerome,—was beset with robbers and murderers; inasmuch that it was called the blood road. Another reason (besides its situation highly favourable to banditti) was that of its being the most frequented road in Judea, as being the principal one to Galilee and to Perea. And a Pharisee and Levite are aptly represented as travelling the way, since the classes, or stations, of the priest were fixed at Jericho as well as Jerusalem.

The phrase πληγὰς ἐπιβέβαιον is found also in Acts xvi. 23. and occasionally in the N then, but never in the Classical writers; so that it is supposed to be a Latinism formed from the phrase imponere plagas. We may compare 2 Mac. iii. 26. πολλὰς ἐπιρρίπτουτες αὐτῷ πληγὰς.

31. κατὰ συγκυρίαν.] The Classical writers not unfrequently use κατὰ συντυχίαν, but never κατὰ συγκυρίαν. Inasmuch that we might suppose it to be entirely Hellenistic, did it not occur several times in Hippocrates. Hence it appears that the phrase κατὰ συγκυρίαν was early in use, but afterwards supplanted by κατὰ συντυχίαν. Yet it maintained a place in the popular idiom, even to the time of Eustathius.

— ἀντιπαρῆλθεν.] The exact sense of this term is not clear. It cannot well be that commonly assigned to it, 'passed by on the other, or further, side,' i. e. by getting out of the road. Most recent Commentators consider the ἀντι as passive. But that is declining the difficulty. I should be inclined to think, with Grotius, that it might mean, 'passed by, going the contrary way,' i. e. from Jerusalem to Jericho. But that is forbidden by the κατέβαιναν: neither would such a circumstance be to the purpose. It should seem that ἀντι here means over against, which, indeed, was probably its original sense; it being for [ἐν] ἀντι, from the old word ans, whence the common term ἀνιστάς. Thus the sense is: 'He passed by over against him, on the contrary side of the road': a conduct the more inexcusable, since, by the Mosaic Law, it was ordered that not even a fallen beast of burden was to be passed by, even if it were an enemy's. See Exod. xxiii. 4, 5.

32. ἰδὼν καὶ ἰδὼν.] The ἰδὼν is not redundant, but serves to show that the Levite did more than the priest.

34. ἐπεμελήθη.] Κατέβη is a surgical term, occurring also in Xen. Cyr. v. and Eccles. xxvii. 21, and signifying to apply bandages to hold down the lips of a wound.

— ἐπιχέων ἔλαιον καὶ οἶνον.] Ἐπιχ. is not well rendered pouring in. Rather (as ἐπιχέω, προσχέω, and παρὰχέω), pouring on, affording, offering, i. e. externally. The use of oil and wine, both separately and as a mixture called οὐνέλαιον is plain from passages cited by Wetstein from the ancient Medical writers. The mixture was considered a sovereign remedy for wounds on the head or legs; wool, lint, or pounded olive being first laid upon the wound. The oil (which in Palestine is very generous) was doubtless taken with him, by the Samaritan, for the purpose of anointing; and the antiquity of the custom of carrying oil on a journey is (as Schoettg. observes) shown by the case of Jacob in the Old Test.

— κτήνος.] Corresponding to our general term beast, whether horse, mule, or ass. An ass is probably here intended, as being that most used. Indeed this general term is sometimes in the Classical writers used for the special one. See Xen. Cyr. viii. 2, 8. Πανδοχεῖον denotes a public hostelry, such as are still known in the East by the name khan. The word is said to occur only in the later writers; but I find something very similar to it in Æschyl. Choeph. 649. Σκοτεινὸν ὥρα δ' ἐμπόρου μεθίναται ἀγκύραν ἐν δόμοισι πανδόχοις ξένων.

35. ἐκβαλὼν] 'having cast or put down.' The two denarii were equivalent to two days' wages of a labourer (see Matt. xx. 9.), and therefore sufficient for temporary relief. This, Mr. Greswell shows, was a sum adequate to maintain a person six or seven days.

— ἐπιμελήθητι αὐτοῦ, &c.] Ἐπιμελεῖσθαι was a term appropriated to the nursing of the sick, as θεραπεύειν was to medical attendance.

— προσδαπανήσῃς.] A word only found in the later writers. The earlier and purer ones use προσταλείς.

36, 37. Here our Lord gives the true answer to the above question; enabling the interrogator to answer it himself.

37. ὁ ποιήσας τὸ ἔλεος μετ' αὐτοῦ] 'he who exercised kindness towards him.' A Hebraism. See Notes on Luke i. 58, 72. The moral lesson inculcated in the parable is, as Mr. Greswell says, that 'every man who is so situated as to require the good offices of his fellow-men, without regard to place, nation, consanguinity, or any of the ties which connect one man, or more, with a part of mankind, more closely than with the rest, must be regarded and treated as their neighbour.

Καὶ τῇδε ἦν αἰ καλουμένη Μαρία, ἣ καὶ παρακαθίσασα παρὰ τοὺς πότου Ἰησοῦ ἤκουε τὸν λόγον αὐτοῦ. Ἡ δὲ Μάρθα ἐσπᾶτο περὶ πολλὴν διακονίαν· ἐπιστᾶσα δὲ εἶπε· Κύριε μέλει σοι ὅτι ἡ ἀδελφὴ μου μόνην με κατέλιπε διακονεῖν; οὐδὲν αὐτῇ ἵνα μοι συναντιλάβηται. Ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ εἶπεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Μάρθα, Μάρθα, μεριμνᾷς καὶ τυρβάζῃ περὶ πλεονέκτης δὲ ἐστὶ χρεία. Μαρία δὲ τὴν ἀγαθὴν μερίδα ἐξελέχθη, ἣτις οὐκ ἀφαιρεθήσεται ἀπ' αὐτῆς.

38. κώμην τινά.] Namely, Bethany, as appears from John xii. 1. The phrase ὑποδέχισθαι εἰς οἶκον, 'to take or receive to oneself,' implies hospitable entertainment, and is found in Hom. Od. π. 70. τὸν ξεῖνον ἄγων ὑποδέξομαι οἶκῳ, and Herodot. i. 44. οἰκίοισι ὑποδέξαμενος τὸν ξεῖνον.

39. καὶ] also, i. e. as well as the disciples. — παρακαθίσασα] 'having seated herself.' That the phrase itself, and the custom of sitting, as a posture of instruction, was not unknown to the Greeks and Romans, as well as the Jews, is clear from the citations adduced by Weiststein.

40. περισπᾶτο.] Περιεσπᾶν signifies properly 'to draw from, around, or off, to draw aside, draw out of course,' as 2 Sam. vi. 6. Thus, by an elegant metaphor, persons are said περισπᾶσθαι, whose minds are drawn aside in various directions by anxious cares. So Diod. Sic. p. 82. ἀπῆλθε περισπασθεὶς ὑπὸ βιωτικῇ χρείᾳ. Eccles. xli. 2. περισπᾶσθαι περὶ πάντων.

— διακονεῖν.] The word here denotes the preparation of the meal, and other services required by hospitality. Συναντιλαβίσθαι signifies 'to lend a hand with one,' to help in any work.

41. τυρβάζῃ περὶ πολλὰ] 'thou distractest thyself with a multiplicity of cares.' Compare Aristoph. Pax 1006, and Athen. 336. Τυρβάζειν comes from τέρβη, which is equivalent to our old English substantive a stir, Ang. Sax. stour.

42. ἐνός.] Several ancient and some modern interpreters suppose an ellipsis of βρώματος here, and of βρωμάτων at πολλὰ, thus conveying a moral gnomé, that one dish is sufficient for any reasonable person. But, besides that the ellipsis is most irregular, surely such a commendation of temperance and frugality were worthy rather of a second-rate Heathen Philosopher, than the lips of Him who 'spake as never man spake' are of opinion that we have here a kin spiritually applied, knowledge being compared to food. But that sense is not probable. There can be no doubt that by ἐνός there is in reality no ellipsis (as is commonly understood) the care of the soul is intended trasted with that of the body. So it xxvii. 4. 'one thing have I desired of that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the Lord,' &c.

— μερίδα.] Grotius, Elsner, Kypk and almost all recent Commentators, suppose that μερίς here signifies business, as in Xen. Cyr. iii. 3. 5. Anab. So the Latin pars in Cic. Quint. Frat. p. 253. (cited by Elsner) οὐ μικρὴν Φιλόσοφος προίστηκεν, i. e. non exi praefectus est Philosophus. It should be noted that the term μερίδα is adopted with any one's taking his part or portion of before him to choose from. (Comp. l. xvi. 5.)

XI. 1. διδάξον ἡμᾶς προσ.] We suppose but that our Lord had given instructions on prayer, both as to the matter. But it was the custom of the time that his disciples some brief form of prayer. 2. seqq. On the interpretation here on Matt. vi. 9. seqq. I cannot but be struck by the omissions which are found in few MSS., Versions, and Fathers, and almost invariably adopted by Greek and other Editors. The words ἡμῶν ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς are not found in about eight MSS., and some Peric Versions. But that such slender to claim any attention. The omission may readily be conceived if it were vain to imagine reasons for so many alterations which were introduced by Alexandrian biblical Aristocrats.

But the omission here cannot well be as otherwise than unintentional. And so very small number of MSS. (about its us to suppose this; but there is a local principle which increases the pro-oof; namely, that as this clause beμε δὲ γυνήθηται τὸ δνομά σου,—so it at these each formed a line in the very chetype or Archetypes; and thus (as and other cases) the scribes' eyes might l, and hence they would inadvertently read of those clauses.

the words ἀλλὰ δοῦναι—πονηροῦ are about the same number of MSS. and as the before-mentioned clauses; with a of three or four others, and Origen; recalled even by Scholz. Here the cannot be accounted for on the same as at γυνήθηται—γῆς: yet the testiso weak, and the quarter whence it suspicious, as to destroy all confidence. far more probable, that the words were the above-mentioned Critics for some doctrinal reasons, than that in all the pt about ten, the clause should have deuced from St. Matthew. This last l also apply to the other omissions; as the doxology, which is found in the MSS. of Matthew, is here found. Is it likely that those who introduced pulations should all of them omit to the fourth?

ἵνα αὐτοί, &c.] These words may seem the interpretation of those who render Matthew vi. 10. by for, or forasmuch is no real discrepancy; since in Luke is taken for granted as indispensable, Matthew is made the condition, or means forgiveness that we implore. And surely no discrepancy between 'Give us and 'Give us day by day.'
 her Lord now proceeds to show the necessity of diligent perseverance in prayer for any blessings, temporal or spiritual, if we would hope to attain them. This he illustrates even from what is found to hold good in the case of men. And, of course, the application is to be carried no further than the plain purpose of the illustration.

—τίς.] The best Commentators here take τίς for εἰ τις, as in 1 Cor. vii. 18. and James v. 13; q. d. 'Should any one of you,' &c. But I rather agree with Fritz. on Matth., p. 726. and Bornemann in loc., that the true import of τίς in such cases is quisnam? where the interrogation, according to Fritz., expresses animi commotionem. The truth, however, may be simply stated as follows: that our Lord here supposes a sudden and great emergency to have arisen, and inquires to what expedient we should have recourse.

6. ἐξ ὁδοῦ.] Valcknaer and Campbell construe this with παρεγένετο, and render, 'is come out of his road.' This sense, however, is forced, and the construction harsh; and it is better, with others, to connect παρεγένετο with πρὸς με (a very frequent construction, especially in Luke), and suppose ἐξ ὁδοῦ to depend on ὦν understood. Render, 'who is just come to me off a journey.' On κόπους πάρ. see Note at Matt. xvi. 10.

7. εἰς τὴν κοίτην.] Newcome and Middleton would take κοίτην to mean bed-chamber. A signification, however, for which there is no authority. The interpretation was probably adopted to avoid the difficulty of supposing that all were in the same bed, since κοίτην has the Article. But such does not necessarily follow; for the Article may here have the force of the pronoun possessive, and εἰς τὴν κοίτην may best be rendered by our a-bed, for at-bed. Mat. ἑμοῦ does not necessarily imply in the same bed; rather, according to the simplicity of ancient manners, in the same room. Or it may mean, as the Pesch. Syriac, Pearce, and Campbell render, 'as well as myself.'

8. εἰ καὶ οὐ δώσω.] Render, 'if even (or though) he should not rise and give him.' A sense supported by all the ancient Versions except the Vulgate.

—διὰ γε τὴν ἀναίδειαν.] The γε here ought not to have been passed over in the Versions; since it means at least, pointing at the lesser reason for the action. 'Avaideia denotes that importunity which has no regard to time, place, or person, and will not be repressed by shame. So ἀναίδης in Hom. II. 8. 521. [Comp. infra xviii. 1, &c.]

9. Our Lord here shows us how to apply the subject, first in a way of direct affirmation (αἰτεῖτε, καὶ δοθήσεται ὑμῖν), and then in a way of inference; q. d. εἰ οὖν ὑμεῖς, &c., where the comparison is not à simili, but à majori; q. d. 'If the importunate teaser obtains so much from men, what will not he that offers up fervent and assiduous prayers obtain from his Father in heaven.' [Comp. Mark xi. 24. John xiv. 13. xv. 7. xvi. 23. James i. 5. 1 John iii. 22.]

11. ὑμῶν.] Many MSS., Versions, and Fathers prefix ἐξ, which is approved by Matthæi, and adopted by Griesbach and Scholz. But it seems to come from the margin. See infra xiv. 5.

— ἐπιδώσει α.] 'reach forth to him;' a graphic manner of speaking. 'H, instead of ei, is found in a great number of the best MSS., in most of the Versions, several Fathers, and the Edit. Princ.; and is adopted by Wetstein, Matth., Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz. The words are perpetually confounded in the MSS., but ἡ seems to be required by the context.

12. ὦν—σκορπίον.] To understand the scope of this saying, see Note on Matth. vii. 10. The words used in both passages come to the same thing; since the body of the white scorpion bears some resemblance in size and appearance to an asp.

13. ἐξ οὐρανοῦ] for οὐρανοῖς, as often. By πνεῦμα ἅγιον are meant the ordinary aids of the Holy Spirit. So Euthym. χάρις πνευματική.

14. κωφόν.] This is said to be put, by metonymy, for what causes deafness, as Mark ix. 25. But it may mean dumb, as often elsewhere. On the present portion, v. 14—23, see Note on Matt. xii. 22—30, and comp. Matt. ix. 32.

16. [Comp. Matt. xvi. 1.]

— ἐζήτουν.] Bornemann would read ἐζήτων, which would indeed be more Classical; but the common reading is more agreeable to the character of Scriptural Greek.

17. The connexion seems to be this: 'But he, knowing the crafty intent with which they had asked for this sign, and the gross fallacy then passing in their own minds by the base imputation of demoniacal influence, said,' &c.

— καὶ οἶκος—πίπτει.] Campbell's version, 'one family is falling after another,' yields an unsatisfactory sense, and is irreconcilable with the parallel passages of Matthew and Mark. The sentence contains a parallelism; and (as Valart saw) διαμρ. in the former member is to be repeated, with an adaptation of gender, in the latter. This mode of taking the passage is confirmed by the parallel ones in Matthew and Mark, and is adopted by almost all the ancient and the best modern Commentators, who illustrate the sentiment both from the Classical and Rabbinical writers. [Comp. John ii. 25. Mark iii. 24.]

Middleton's canon of insertions in Hypothesis. The force of it is 'he who [is]'. Thus also ὁ ἰσχυρότερος is 'he who [is] stronger.' The reason at ver. 23 is, that when another attacks, conquers, and spoils any one's property, it is plain that the other is more powerful than he. — ἐν εἰρήνῃ.] By εἰρήνη is here meant security from violence or rapine. At Acts ix. 31. and xxiv. 1. it is used of personal tranquillity and security.

22. τὰ σκύλα.] Many eminent modern Commentators take σκ. to signify 'effects,' corresponding to the εὐαγγ. of Matthew. This they confirm from the Heb. שָׁוָה, which, though it properly signifies spoil, often denotes goods, as in Eccl. iii. 8. That sense, however, is not established on any unexceptionable authority; nor, indeed, is it necessary to resort to it, since the common sense of the word, denoting the goods made a spoil of, includes the other sense. [Comp. Is. liii. 12. Col. i. 12.]

25. κεκοσμημένον.] Meaning, as Hemsterh. on Lennep Etym. in κόσμος suggests, 'provided with all necessary and well-ordered furniture.'

26. [Comp. John v. 14. 2 Pet. ii. 20. Heb. vi. 4. x. 26.]

27. μακάριοι, &c.] With this exclamation the Commentators compare several from the Classical and the Rabbinical writers; the most apposite of which is one from Musæus 138.

Ὁλβιοὶ θεοὶ φέτιναι, καὶ δλβιοὶ ἡ τίκε μήτηρ, Γαστήρ τ' ἡ σ' ἰλόχισται μακαράτη!

Κοιλία and μαστοὶ are put for μήτηρ. 28. μενοῦνγε.] Μενοῦνγε is a stronger expression than μαίνου, and is used at the beginning of a sentence; which the other is not. The γε is used as in καίτοι γε, μήτις γε, &c. Brender, 'imo vero,' yes, indeed, as in Rom. ix. 20. x. 18. Phil. iii. 8.

MSS. and Editions, even to that of Mill, but is evidently from the margin). It is better, however, to suppose, with Schleusner, that κρυπτήν (or rather, as it ought to be accented, and I have ventured to edit, κρύπτῃν) is a substantive, especially as examples of this use, though rare, are occasionally found; one being adduced from Athen. p. 205. A., and another from Heraclides de Civit., p. 73. Indeed, in the sense vault, the word occurs not unfrequently in the writers of late Grecism, and gave birth to the Latin crypta and our croft. That, however, is, I apprehend, not the sense here, but rather such as is found in the passage of Heraclides; namely, a dark hole or corner, in which articles are stowed out of the way. [Comp. Mark iv. 21. supra viii. 16.]

35. σκότος ἐστίν. Render, 'is darkness;' the Indicative being here used to intimate that the thing feared already exists, or is on the point thereof.

36. Our Lord here pursues the similitude in v. 33, where an open manner of teaching is compared to a lamp placed on a stand.

In order to remove what they call an irregularity and tautology, several Commentators devise various conjectures, all of them unauthorized, and indeed unnecessary. There is, properly speaking, no tautology at all (the clause μὴ ἔχον τὴ μέρος being meant to strengthen the preceding position), nor any greater irregularity, than is often elsewhere found in Scripture, and sometimes in the Classical writers. This section, vv. 33—36, forms one of the many independent and separate sayings of our Lord, which St. Luke has put together, in a miscellaneous form, without attention to time or place, from ch. xi. to xviii. 14. And therefore it is uncertain whether there be any connection between this section and the preceding one, vv. 27—32. What is here said by Christ does, indeed, appear in another connection at Matt. v. 15. Mark iv. 21. But our Lord might choose to introduce it twice, under different circumstances; meaning to caution his hearers against that prejudice which blinded the eyes of their understanding to the evidences of his Messiahship, and demanded a sign. Accordingly, he exhorts them to profit by the light of reason and conscience, illumined by the truths of the Gospel. He means to say (v. 33.) that as he who lights a lamp does it that it may give light to all around, so the faculty of reason and the gift of conscience should not be allowed to lie hid and be useless. And that (v.

34.) as the natural eye, when the vision is sound, directs a man's steps aright; so the mental eye of reason and conscience is a valuable guide, when not perverted. Therefore they are warned (v. 35.) to take heed that this internal and spiritual light be not obscured (for otherwise, as it is said in St. Matthew, great indeed will be that darkness). Then at v. 36 is a further illustration of the great importance of preserving and cultivating this light; and that is introduced, in a familiar and popular manner, with the not unusual intermixture of the comparison with the thing compared. Οὖν has here the continuative sense inquit, quippe, ceterum, porro (as was perceived by the Pesch. Syr. Translator), on which see Scholz. Lex. in v. § 3. The clause ἔσται φωτεινόν ὅλον is meant to illustrate what was just before said, by a reference to the figure employed at v. 33. of the lamp; and ὅλον for καθ' ὅλον is placed after φωτ., the better to connect with the comparison ὡς ὅταν, &c. The word ἀστραπή almost always elsewhere denotes the lightning, but here, as sometimes in the Sept., it signifies, in its primitive and general sense, a bright flame or lamp.

37. ἐν δὲ τῇ λαλήσει. Render, 'When he had thus spoken.' See Note on iii. 21.

— ὅπως ἀριστήσῃ π. α.] Not, 'that he would dine,' but, 'breakfast with him.' For ἀρτεως then denoted a noon-day meal, like the Latin prandium; our late breakfast or luncheon.

— ἀνίστασιν. The word has reference to that reclining posture adopted at meals. 'Ελθὼν σιγνifies 'immediately after entering;' which is required by what follows, where the sense is meant to be strongly marked by πρῶτον and πρὶ. Of ἐβαπτίσθη, Pass. for Midd., the sense is the same as at Mark vii. 4, where see Note.

38. [Comp. Mark vii. 3.]

39. οὖν.] In the interpretation of this particle, the Commentators generally run into the extreme, either of regarding it as expletive, or expressing on the sense. It is best, with Schleusner and Wahl, to consider it as an affirmative particle, signifying 'same, profecto,' as in Acts xxi. 18. So we sometimes use Now! or ay, now! At ὕμῶν Kuinoel and others suppose a transposition, and construe it with ἀρταγῆς. This method, however, is quite at variance with the context, and the passages adduced in its support are not to the purpose. We have only to suppose (v. 39.) Bornemann) a brevis of construction ἐν τῇ ἐξίστασιν ὕμῶν οὐ καθάριζεν γάρ γὰρ ἀρταγῆς, &c. Ἀρταγῆς καὶ πᾶσι. may be rendered:

'opacity and roguery.' See Note on Mark vii. 21. Else Eloner aptly compares Porphyry de Abstinent. p. 18. ἀποσχόμενοι τῶν ἀκαθάρτων βρωσίων, καὶ οὕτως ἀκαθαρσίας. [Comp. Tit. i. 15.]

40. οὐχ ὁ ποιήσας τὸ ἔξωθεν, &c.] The interpretation of Eloner and Kuinoel (who here mean in the sense, 'Not he who purifies the outside of cups, &c., does also by that means purify the inside, i. e. the meats'), however ably supported, is too far-fetched to be received. The common interpretation, by which τὸ ἔξωθεν (scilicet) is taken to denote the body, and τὸ ἔσωθεν the mind and soul, bears, in its simplicity, the stamp of truth.

41. τὰ ἐόντα.] The ancient and most modern Commentators consider this as an elliptical phrase, and supply κατὰ and χρήματα, in the sense 'according to your ability,' or 'your substance;' 1 Cor. iv. 7. ἐκ τῶν ὑπαρχόντων σοι ποιεῖς ἐλεημοσύνην. Of each signification examples have been adduced; and the ellipse is not unusual in τὰ ἐνυπόκρινται. Others, however, (as Beza, Heum., Kypke, and Wetstein) object that such a sense would require ἐκ τῶν ἐόντων. But they take τὰ ἐόντα to signify 'what is within the cup,' or dish, i. e. its contents; q. d. 'I am not anxious about the outward part [or its appearance]; but [rather] attend to its contents, I do but give alms therefrom, and then food for every thing else shall be pure to you.' Thus the sense will be in apposition with, and external of, τὰ ἐόντα. The above interpretation is strongly confirmed by the parallel passage of Mt. xxiii. 23, which shows that τὰ ἐόντα refer to what is within the cup. [Comp. Is. lviii. Dem. iv. 27. infra xii. 33.]

42. τὴν κρίσιν καὶ—Θεοῦ.] Meaning justice and equity, by Hebraism. [Comp. 1 Sam. xv. 22. Hos. vi. 6. Mich. vi. 8. Matt. ix. 13.]

43. τὴν πρωτοκαθεδρίαν.] The more Classical term would have been προεδρίαν. So Aristoph. Acharn. 42. εἰς τὴν προεδρίαν πᾶς ἀνὴρ ἐστίζετο.

44. οὐκ οἶδασιν] for οἱ ἄνθρωποι, οἱ περιπατοῦντες ἐπάνω αὐτῶν, οὐκ οἶδασιν [περιπατοῦντες], 'know not that they are walking over them.' [Comp. Ps. v. 9.]

45. καὶ ὑμῖν τοῖς ν.] Some recent Commentators take the καὶ in the sense præsertim. And indeed the νομικοὶ were, in dignity, superior to the Scribes and Pharisees, as being their teachers. But it seems harsh to suppose so rare a sense of καὶ,—a sense, moreover, which Bornemann asserts is found only with adjectives or adverbs in the superlative. There is, indeed, no reason to abandon the common interpretation, which assigns to καὶ a sense at once usual and equally agreeable to the context; for since the Scribes and Pharisees, and the νομικοὶ, or Jurists, were closely connected, as instructors and instructed, he who spoke to the prejudice of the one, spoke also to that of the other. [Comp. Is. x. 1.]

48. ὅτι αὐτοὶ μὲν—μνημεῖα.] This is well rendered by Bornemann, 'because, while your forefathers killed the prophets, you have built their tombs.' The Greek writers, he observes, often put a primary sentiment in the second place, and a secondary one in the first place of the sentence. See Note on Matt. xxiii. 29, 30, sq.

49. ἡ σοφία τοῦ Θεοῦ.] Several ancient Commentators, and some modern ones, take this to mean the Λόγος, or Son of God, i. e. Christ himself.

self, who is called in 1 Cor. i. 24. the Wisdom of God; q. d. 'the Divine wisdom as manifested in me.' And indeed this interpretation is confirmed by the ἐγὼ of Matthew in the parallel passage. It should rather seem, however, as the generality of modern Commentators understand it, that ἡ σοφία τοῦ Θεοῦ is abstract for concrete, for ὁ Θεὸς ὁ σοφός; as in the Horatian Virtus Scipiadæ and mitis sapientia Læli, for the persons themselves. [Comp. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 15, 16. 2 Esdr. i. 32. Heb. xi. 35. Acts viii. 10. Matt. x. 16. supra x. 3. John xvi. 2. Acts vii. 51.]

51. [See Gen. iv. 8. 2 Chron. xxiv. 21.]
52. ἤρατα τὴν κλεῖδα τ. γ.] The Christian doctrine is here compared to an edifice, which, when the key is taken away, becomes inaccessible. The sense is the same as at Matt. xxiii. 13. Here read, from nearly all the best MSS., εἰσῆλθατε, which will exactly correspond to ἐκωλύσατε, Aor. for Pres., as in James ii. 6. ἡτιμάσατε.

53, 54. The severity of our Lord's reproofs had so provoked the Pharisee and his other guests, that they attempted to entrap him in his words, so as to extract matter of accusation to the magistrates.

53. δεινῶς ἐνέχειν] i. e. ἐγκοταῖν, on which sense see Note on Mark vi. 19. Ἀποστοματίζειν is properly a Rhetorical term, equivalent to λέγειν ἀπὸ στόματος, 'to bring forward any thing from memory,' or ex tempore. Sometimes, however, as here, it is used in an active or transitive sense, to make any one speak ex tempore; of which examples are given from Plato.

54. καί.] This (not found in almost all the ancient MSS., several of the Versions, and almost all the early Editions), is cancelled by West-stein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz.

XII. 1. ἐν οἷς.] Supply χρόνους, 'meanwhile,' or rather πράγμασι, 'during which proceedings.' Μυριάδων, like the Heb. מֵרִבָּז, stands for an exceedingly great number.

— πρῶτον.] This may be taken either with the preceding ἤρξατο λέγειν, or the following προσέχετε. The Editors, almost without exception, point according to the former mode; while most modern Translators and Expositors prefer the latter. Thus πρ. will signify especially, especially as in Matt. v. 23, and other passages to which they refer. In many of these, however, that is not the meaning of the word. There is almost always some particle corresponding to πρῶτον in the apodosis, either expressed or implied. When it does signify especially, it usually I believe, commences a sentence, or even a clause preceded by a colon. Still less does πρῶτον commence a sentence ushered in by a verb in the Imperative. In such a case, it is brought in afterwards, as Matt. vi. 16. ζητεῖτε πρῶτον, &c. On this account the former construction is probably, especially as it is supported by the MSS., the Pesch., Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic Versions. Moreover, as our Lord began to speak to the disciples first, so he afterwards, at v. 54—55, addressed the people at large, principally if not exclusively. [Comp. Mark viii. 15.]

— τῇ ζύμῃ τῶν Φαρισαίων.] The metaphor here has reference to the silent, but sure, effect of the vice of hypocrisy, which distinguished Pharisees generally, and which, when once kindled, gradually pervaded the whole disposition and character. On the full force of the term ζύμη see the Scriptural and Classical writers, see Comment on Par. vol. iii. 89, seqq.

 — τοῦ ὄχλου.] Meaning the people at large,
 as opposed to the disciples.
 — μερίσασθαι μετ' ἐμοῦ.] This use of μετὰ imports participation. The sense is, 'so to divide, as to admit me to my share.' For, as we learn from Seneca, Decl. x. 3. the law was, for the elder brother to divide the inheritance into two portions, and the younger to take his choice of them.
 14. τίς με—ἐφ' ὑμᾶς.] In allusion to Exod.
 ii. 14. Comp. Acts vii. 27. The difference between δικαστῆς and μεριστὴν I had myself thought to be this; that the former signifies an arbitrator, or referee in general; the latter such a one as has power to adjust conflicting claims, by apportioning to all parties their proper share.
 Thus ἡ μερ. may be said to be exegetical of δικ., as in a kindred passage of Appian. T. i. 64. 96.
 μέτρε ἡγεῖσθαι Ῥωμαῖοις δικαστὴν ἢ διαιτῆν.
 And Menander, Εἰ τις δικαστὴς ἢ διαιτὴς Σκῆψιν. VALCKENAE, however, I find, has pronounced an opinion, which, though it somewhat differs from the above, and indeed from that of all other Commentators, may probably be thought entitled to the preference. He maintains, that by δικ. is meant a judge publicly appointed! and by μεριστῆς, a privately appointed judge, i. e. an θησαυρίζων ἑαυτῷ, καὶ μὴ εἰς Θεὸν πλουτῶν.

arbitrator, one authorized to determine conflicting claims, and apportion what is right to all, and usually called a δαιτῆς: such as Luke calls μεριστὰς, and Plato de Legg., p. 915, first terms αἰρετοὺς δικαστὰς, and then δαιτητὰς.

15. αὐτοὺς] i. e. 'the bystanders, his hearers in general.'

— ὁρᾶτε καὶ φυλάσσετε] 'mind and carefully guard against.' So Heliodorus, cited by Wetstein, ὅρα δὲ οὖν, φυλάττων. The construction φυλ. ἀπὸ often occurs in the Septuagint, and sometimes in the Classical writers; as Xen. Cyr. ii. 3, 5. Πλεονεξία here means an excessive desire of increasing one's substance. And it is the scope of the subsequent parable to show how little such a spirit avails, whether to produce happiness or procure longevity. On which subject the Commentators compare many moral maxims of the Heathen Philosophers.

— οὐκ ἐν τῷ περισσεύειν, &c.] On the sense, and still more on the construction, of this passage some difference of opinion exists. Kuinoel maintains that ἐν τῷ περισσεύειν τινι signifies, 'when there is abundance to any one,' i. e. when he has abundance. Οὐκ, he says, is to be referred to ἔστι, which is to be joined with ἐκ τῶν ὑπαρχ. αὐτοῦ. Ζωὴ is by Rosenmüller, Schleusner, Kuinoel, Wahl, and Bornemann, taken for the comfort or enjoyment of life, as in Acts ii. 28. Rom. viii. 6. and 1 Pet. iii. 10. Thus the sense will be: 'In whatever affluence a man may be, his happiness depends not on, is not the result of, his possessions.' A sentiment, to which numerous parallel ones have been adduced from the Classical writers. (See Recens. Synop.) These, however, will only show what might, not what must, be the meaning. And the above sense, however applicable elsewhere, does not well suit with the following parable, introduced to illustrate the moral lesson here; and which is meant to show that no opulence or abundance will be any guarantee for the security of life. The very sense, it should seem, intended here; though the other may also be meant to be included.

16. χώρα for ἀγρός, by an Hellenistic idiom. Εὐφρόρησα, 'bore well,' 'yielded abundant produce.' The word is rare, but it occurs in Joseph. Bell. i. 2, 43. ii. 21, 2.

18. γενήματα.] This, for the common reading γενήμα., is found in many of the best MSS. and the Ed. Princ. and other ancient Editions; and is edited by Matthæi, Oriesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz; rightly, I apprehend; since this reading is better suited to the later Greek usage. Render: 'all the produce [of my lands]:' a sense occurring also infra xxii. 18, and in the later Greek writers and the Sept. Τὰ ἀγαθὰ may mean goods generally, as just after, or such produce as might not fall under the name of γενήματα, as wool, &c. Κείμενα, for ἀποκείμενα.

19. τῇ ψυχῇ μου.] Meaning 'to myself.' An idiom found elsewhere in the New Test., as Matt. x. 33, and sometimes in the Classical writers, as Liban. Or. 463. Παρρησίᾳ ἑμαυτῶν, πρὸς τῇ ἑμαυτοῦ ψυχῇ ἐπών· Ἀθηναῖοις εἰμι.

— ἀναπαύου.] This may be rendered 'recreate thyself'; as Eurip. Alc. 804. Εὐφραίνου denotes, in a general way, the animal delight resulting from the animal gratifications just mentioned. So Tob. vii. 9. φάγε, πίε, καὶ ἡδέεαι γίνεαι. (Comp. Eccles. xi. 9. Eccles. xi. 19. 1 Cor. xv. 32. James v. 5.)

20. εἰπα.] Not in direct words addressed to the man, but by a silent decree. See Prov. i. 23. [Comp. Job xx. 22, 23. Ps. lii. 7. Jer. xli. 11.]

— ἀπαιτοῦσι.] It has been disputed what is the Nominative here. Most Commentators suppose an allusion to those angels who, as the Jews thought, accompanied the angel of death to acquire the debt of life; a sense inherent in ἀπαιτεῖν. It should seem, however, that, by an idiom common to both Hebrew and Greek, the sense is suppressed, and to be supplied from the context. Or rather, ἀπαιτοῦσι may, with Grotius and others, be regarded as Personal for Impersonal; 'it shall be required;' of which idiom many examples might be adduced.

— ἃ δὲ ἡτοίμα., τίνι ἔσται.] Not as though it were of any consequence to the person whose the possessions should be, which he has lost his soul to gain; it being merely an emphatic way of saying that they will not be his.

21. Now comes the brief, but striking, conclusion. — οὕτως.] Meaning, 'such is the case with such the folly of.' Εὐφρόρησα, scil. αὐτοῦ, 'himself [only].' On the sense of εὐφρόρησα τῶν a slight difference of opinion exists. Some a.] This is not well rendered by Bar. The word scarcely differs in ἀποθήκη. The distinction, if any, this,—that ταμεῖον, as it originally store-room of the ταμίης or dispens- wards came to mean a store-room specially for grain, like our granary; denoted merely one of those subter- reanean repositories for grain, which are common in the East.

 29. μὴ μεταωριζέσθαι.] Meaning, 'Be not anxiously fluctuating between hope and fear,' as to the supply of your daily wants. Μεταωριζέσθαι signifies properly to be lifted on high: being used especially of vessels tossed aloft at sea, and then depressed to its very depths; an apt image of anxiety. See Hor. Epist. i. 18, 109, 110.

 quent expression ἔθνη, the Heb. עַמִּים denoting
 'the [other] nations of the world [besides the Jewish].' Δι, 'whereas.'

 interposed amidst admonition, and drawn forth by intense feeling.
 — τὸ μικρὸν ποίμνιον.] The Article is either for the pronoun possessive, or is intended to supply the place of the Vocative, Hellenistic. This double diminutive has great emphasis; and Commentators adduce examples. The true rationale of the thing is ably pointed out by Mr. Greswell.

 money contained in the purse. The word signifies the same as θησαυροί in the other member of the sentence, except that by θησαυροί is meant a greater, and by βαλ. a lesser portion of wealth.

rare word, but which occurs in the Sept., and occasionally in Diod. Sic., and other later writers.

35—46. Here Christ addresses them in respect of diligent attention to their proper work, as he had before done as to moderation, indifference about things temporal, and trust in God for the supply of their daily wants.

35. αἱ ὀσφύες περιζῶ. We have here an allusion to the precaution necessary to the long-robed inhabitants of the East; who, before engaging in any active employment, have to bind their garments tight around them. A custom, indeed, extending to the ancients generally, as appears from many passages of the Classical writers. See Hom. Od. E. 72. Hor. Sat. ii. 8, 70. [Comp. Eph. vi. 14. 1 Pet. i. 3.]

36. ἀναλύσει· 'shall return.' A sense derived from a nautical metaphor, and used both in the Sept. and the Classical writers. Γάμος is here, as often, used to denote a feast generally.

37. περιζῶ. καὶ ἀνακλῶ.] Many Commentators

The image in question only as the master will treat such servants usual condescension and kindness, heavenly Master, of his free bounty your diligence and fidelity with reward. 39, 40. Here we have an indirect allusion to the coming of the Son of Man to be a night-robber. [Comp. 1 Thess. v. 10. Rev. xvi. 15.]

42. τίς ἀρα, &c.] To the question by Peter our Lord does not answer by implication. 47. καὶ μὴ ἰτοιμάσας—αὐτοῦ.] Per synchysis, i.e. μὴ ἰτοιμ. [ἰαντόν] πρὸς [τὸ ποιῆν] καὶ ποιῆσαι, &c. [Comp. Numb. xv. 30. John ii. 41. xv. 22. James iv. 17.]

48. δαρήσεται ὀλίγας.] Here, and just before, there is supposed to be an ellipsis of κατὰ. But as the complete phrase has never been produced, while the elliptical one is common, this may be reckoned among false ellipses.

As it were manifestly unjust to inflict stripes at all upon any one for not performing his Lord's will when he had no knowledge of it, some would therefore restrict these words to the knowing his Lord's will by special revelation, and the not knowing it by that means. But it should rather seem that they are to be understood comparatively, namely, of one who knew it more perfectly, as compared with one who knew it less perfectly; and comparative opportunities being taken into consideration. [Comp. Levit. v. 17. 1 Tim. i. 13.] — παντί.] This is not, as Winer imagines, a laetive absolute, but is put for παντός, being accommodated, by attraction, to ὧ.

49. πῦρ ἦλθον βαλεῖν, &c.] From the necessity of Christian vigilance, our Lord is led to hint to those times of persecution, when it would be especially needed; and the fire of which would be kindled soon after his death and passion; which are represented under the figure of pain. (Grotius.) Fire is here meant to represent discord and violence, of which it is an apt emblem. [Comp. v. 51. Ps. lxvi. 12, and see also on Matt. x. 34.]

— τί θέλω, εἰ ἤδη ἀνήβη;] This clause parades the obscurity which is generally attendant on language spoken under high-wrought feeling, passion, Whist, and others assign to the εἰ the sense, O that, rendering: 'And what do I wish? that it were already kindled!' But though εἰ sometimes used for εἴθε, as in Luke xix. 42. & xxii. 42, it is in a very different construction in the present. Others, as Rosenmüller and Alford, take the τί for τίς, and the εἰ for ὡς, is the Heb. כִּי, rendering: 'And how much

I wish that it were already accomplished!' Yet both of those senses, in such a context as the present, are precarious. It is better, with Le Clerc and Campbell, to follow the Vulgate, 'Quid volo, nisi ut accendatur?' But to thus take εἰ for εἰ μὴ, is unauthorized. Hence it seems best to retain the usual signification of εἰ, and, with the Syriac Translator, take θέλω for θέλωμι, 'And what should I have to wish, if it were but already kindled?'

50. βάπτισμα δὲ ἔχω βαπτ. q. d. 'I have to undergo a baptism of suffering;' i. e. as it is elsewhere said, 'to suffer many things.' In baptism the whole body was immersed under water; and in reference to this our Lord calls his sufferings a baptism, because he was about to be wholly immersed in sorrows, to become 'a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief.' See Note on Matt. xx. 22, and comp. Mark x. 38.

— καὶ πῶς συνέχομαι ἕως οὗ ταύτῃ.] 'And how anxious am I till it be accomplished!' Συνέχεσθαι signifies properly to be hemmed in or straitened for room, and is used either with a dative of instrument (whether in a natural, or, more usually, in a figurative sense, as of disease, anxiety, or desire); or, as here, absolutely. Thus it may be rendered, 'how much am I distressed!'

51. ἀλλ' ἡ.] This is by the best Commentators rendered, 'imò potius.' But of such a sense no proof has been adduced. There will indeed be no necessity to deviate from the usual signification of ἡ, if the ἀλλ' be taken, not for ἀλλά, but ἄλλο, and an ellipsis be supposed; or rather, a repetition from the context after ὑμῖν of οὐδέν] παρεγενόμην δοῦναι ἐν τῇ γῇ. [Comp. Mic. vii. 6.]

53. [Comp. Matt. x. 35. Micah vii. 6.]

54. τὴν νεφέλην] 'the cloud;' alluding to a well-known phenomenon, regarded as a certain prognostic of rainy weather. We learn both from Scripture (see 1 Kings xviii. 44.) and from the accounts of travellers in the East, that a small cloud, like a man's hand, is often the forerunner of violent storms of wind and rain.

57. τί δὲ καὶ—δίκαιον;] On the connection here some difference of opinion exists. The older Commentators almost universally refer them to what precedes; most recent ones, to what follows. Both may be said to be, in a certain sense, right. The grammatical connection is, by means of the ὡς γὰρ, with the following; but there is a connection of thought with the preceding; these words, in fact, forming the vinculum between two sentiments; q. d. 'Why do ye not of yourselves judge what is fit and proper to be done at this crisis; and as ye can discern the signs of the weather, and take your measures accordingly, how is it (τί ἴσται) that ye do not discern and recognise the signs of the Messiah's coming, and adopt a suitable conduct.' Even without the express declarations of the Prophets, ye might, from what "ye hear and see," (comp. Matt. xi. 3—5.) recognise the signs of the times and the person of the Messiah [in me]. Ver. 58 is not, as many think, a detached moral maxim taken from Matt. v. 25, but, as the connective formula ὡς γὰρ suggests, a great moral truth applied, for warning, to the present purpose, and formed on a paraboli- cal comparison, whereby the Jews are warned to make their peace with God; by repentance and faith in the Messiah, before the time of vengeance, now impending, should arrive, and they be involved in irretrievable ruin. See Matt. xxi. 44. The application, however, is at Ch. xiii. 16. left to be made by the hearers themselves; probably in either case to avoid needlessly exasperating the people. At the same time our Lord took occasion, from the bystanders telling him of the atrocity which had been recently committed, and, no doubt, insinuating that the sufferers were eminently sinners, to supply the moral application here omitted.

58. δὸς ἐργασίαν.] Said to be a Latinism for da operam. Yet the phrase is found in a pure Greek writer, Hermog. de Invent. iii. 5. 7, where it is used of elaborate composition. 'Ἀπαλλάτ- τασθαι ἀπὸ τινος' signifies properly either to be rid of any thing, or to be dismissed, or let go by any person. It is also used, as here, in a forensic sense, either of a criminal, who is set at liberty when his persecutor does not follow up his accusation; or of a debtor, who receives an acquit- tance from his creditor, by paying the money due, or making a composition. Κατασύρειν signifies properly to haul or drag down, but sometimes to draw away, as used of hurrying persons to judg- ment or execution.

— πράκτορι.] Πράττειν and εἰσπράττειν signify to exact the payment of a d or of its equivalent in corporal pu of imprisonment till it should be pa ingly πράκτωρ denotes the executioner Eschyl. Eum. 315. πράκτορες εἰς πρακτόρις φόνου Soph. El. 953. general sense, the executioner of a sentence.

and Latin writers. The complete expression occurs in Philo, ii. 315. (cited by Wetstein), where, giving a reason why God commanded that a homicide who had fled for refuge to an altar should be delivered up to justice, it is said that otherwise αἵματι ἀνδροφόνων αἷμα θυσίων ἀνακαθίσταται. So also Theophyl. Simoe. p. 127. Οἱ μὲν οὖν ἐκκεντήσαντες τὸν Β. ἀνέκλινον ἀναμυγμένον τοῖνον τοῦ δαίπνου καὶ (even) ἀζμασιν. This is, then, a boldly figurative way of saying, that they were slain while attending the sacrifice. And how atrocious it was thought to slay any one at an altar, is well known. Accordingly the occurrence in question was, it seems, considered the effect of a Divine judgment on the sufferers, as especially sinners. And our Lord's answer is meant to correct the erroneous notion of supposing that, or such like general calamity, so far different from the common dispensations of Providence, as to be marks of Divine vengeance on the individuals who are the chief sufferers; and moreover to, in some measure, predict a similar fate to those who would not repent.

This passage, indeed, as Bp. Warburton observes (Sermon xviii. on the Fast-day after the Earthquake at Lisbon) has been usually regarded as a reproof of the opinion which ascribes the general calamities effected by natural or civil causes to God's displeasure against sin; but incorrectly; that opinion being founded in the very essence of religion, and being agreeable both to reason and religion; as manifesting God's glory, and effectually promoting man's peace and happiness. What it condemns is the superstitious sense of it, which uncharitably concludes that the sufferers in a general calamity are greater sinners than other men. The conclusion, indeed, on which their presumption as to the case of the sufferers was founded (as Mr. Greswell observes) on the belief, that temporal calamities were dispensations and effects of Divine Providence, and were so many judgments upon sin. With the truth of this our Lord's answer has nothing to do (nor was it necessary; for the Jews, of all people on the earth, having been accustomed to receive not only rewards, but punishments, through the instrumentality of physical causes, as the effectors of moral good, could not doubt it, and had by sad experience, in their own case, verified it);

it being simply an argumentum ad hominem, the object of which was to reprove the hearers, and to bring home conviction to their consciences, even on their own assumptions; q. d. 'These Galileans might be sinners deserving of their fate; but yet it was not for the hearers to draw the consequent inference of their especial guilt, or pass any judgment upon them, if, being equally sinners in the sight of God, they, too, were equally obnoxious to his judgments by temporal visitations for sin.' In short, the point at issue concerned the moral lesson to be derived from the late event,—whether such a meaning was to be given it as would make it general, or partial in its signification. Our Lord proves the former. The persons addressing him considered it as a judgment; he bids them regard it as a warning; and from it was enabled to supply the moral application just before only intimated.

2. παρὰ] 'beyond,' as Luke iii. 13. et al.

4. ἐν τῷ Σιλ.] The sense is 'at,' i. e. by Siloam. This tower was probably one of the towers of the city walls, and was, we may suppose, the one at the S. E. angle thereof. Thus the fountain is correctly described by our great Epic Poet as being 'fast by the Oracle of God.' Ὀφειλῆται, 'sinners.' A Chaldee idiom, by which debts and sins, and debtors and sinners, are interchanged. So in the Book of Enoch (Fabr. p. 80.) we have ὀφειλῆτης μεγάλης ἀμαρτίας.

5. οὐχί] 'by no means.' A stronger negation than οὐκ.

6. This Parable was intended to enlarge on the idea in the preceding discourse, and enforce the foregoing warning, by announcing the impending destruction which would attend the long-continued abuse of God's mercy; though at the same time we may consider it, with Mr. Greswell, as a kind of prediction, and the first of a series of predictions relating to a common subject, the punishment of the unbelieving Jews, and the destruction of Jerusalem.

7. τρία ἔτη.] Namely, from the earliest time of bearing. Καταργεῖ, for ἀργὸν ποιεῖ, 'makes it unproductive, exhausts the soil;' as in Ezra iv. 21. Thus ἀργὸν often occurs in the Classical writers of unproductive land. The καὶ here is so far from being redundant, that it is almost cuphatic, importing that the tree not only bore no fruit itself, but even hindered the growth of it in others.

8. ἄφες αὐτήν.] 'let it stand.' Ἀς ἀφίναί is here opposed to ἐκκόπτειν, so is it to φθαίρειν by Philo, p. 581. And similarly we have εἶναι opposed to ἐκκόπτειν in Plato, p. 174. Σκάπτειν περὶ does not, I believe, occur in the Classical writers; but περισκάπτειν, with an Accus. of thing, occurs in Æschyl. in his Fragments (where we have περισκ. τοὺς ἀμπελῶνας), and in Philo and the Geoponica, v. 35.

—κόπρια.] This, instead of the Vulg. copriam, is found in a great number of MSS. and early Editions, and is adopted by Matthæi, Griesbach, Vater, Tittman, and Scholz.

9. κὰν μὲν ποιήσῃ καρπὸν.] The Aprosopesis here has great force and beauty, which would be not a little impaired by supplying the words wanting; the suppression of them intimating a presentiment that the thing in question will not take place; as at Exod. xxxii. 32.

11. πνεῦμα ἔχουσα δσθ.] The recent Commentators mostly regard πν. δσθ. as a periphrasis for δσθίνεαι, and denoting simply a disease. But the passages of the Classical writers which they adduce are of a different nature. The words of our Lord at ver. 16, ἣν ἔδωκεν ὁ Σατανᾶς show that πνεῦμα is very significant; and, considering the very frequent use of πνεῦμα in the sense δαιμόνιον, it cannot be doubted but that the sense is (as the ancient and most modern Commentators suppose), 'having a demon which inflicts infirmity and disease.' So Acts xvi. 16, πνεῦμα Πύθωνος, where see Note. It was, indeed, an opinion of the Jews (and indeed of the Gentiles), that diseases, especially the severely acute and tediously chronic ones, were inflicted by demons. But the peculiarity of the present expression, and the words of our Lord himself, oblige us to suppose a real demoniacal influence.

—καὶ ἦν συγκ.] 'she was bowed together.' This is not simply an active in a passive sense; for the word may be taken in a neutral sense for σύνκυφος εἶναι; from which the transition to a passive one is easy. Wetstein here compares Themist. Or. 7. p. 90, δαί συγκυφῶς, δαί συνεφής, ἐφελκόμενος τὰς ὀφρύν. So also 2 Kings iv. 35, συγκύψας.

The Commentators remark that this disease was the one called κύφωσις, which is seated in the whole of the spine, and extends to the loins; so that the patient is necessarily bowed together, from utter weakness of the parts: and that therefore the disease might very well be called αδσθίνεα. This, however, will by no means prove that the disorder was not produced and continued by demoniacal influence.

12. δσολ(λυσαι.) Both the Hebrew and Greek writers used to compare disorders to chains and ropes, by which men are, as it were, held bound.

15. οὐ λύνει, &c.] Christ refutes their evil by a reference to their own practice: for that it was considered allowable to attend to the necessary care of animals on the Sabbath, is clear from many passages of the Rabbinical writers, cited by Schoetg. Nay, even Pagan superstition permitted various employments of husbandry even on the solemn festivals; see Virg. Georg. i. 262, &c.

23. εἰ ὀλίγοι οἱ σωζόμενοι.] It has been a matter of dispute both as to what is the exact import of this inquiry, and the spirit which dictated it. Some understand σωζ. of temporal deliverance, namely, being preserved from the approaching destruction of the Jewish state. But that were to suppose a kind of enigma, little suitable to a simple inquiry. More probable is the opinion of many eminent interpreters, from Hammond to Kuinoel, that σωζ. is to be understood of preservation from the general unbelief of Christ and his religion; of which sense they adduce examples from the New Testament and Ignatius' epistles to Polycarp. Those however are only farther proofs of the sense of σωζισθαι being 'put into the way of salvation.' It is far more natural to understand the word (with most Expositors, ancient and modern) of salvation—properly so called: q. d. Are there few who will attain salvation? A sense which seems required by the terms of our Lord's reply. Whether the question were a captious one or not (though the latter is the more probable opinion), certain it is (as appears from Lightf. and Schoetg.) that the point was a disputed one in the Jewish schools; some maintaining universal salvation, others limiting it to a few elect, see 2 Ead. viii. 1. 3. Now, to a question of such minor importance as this (for it rather concerns us, as Grotius observes, to know what sort of persons will be saved, than how few) our Lord (agreeably to his custom of never replying to questions of mere curiosity) was pleased to return no answer; but makes his words an answer to the question which ought rather to have been asked—namely, 'how salvation is to be attained.' Thus at John xiv. 22, when Judas asks him how, or why, it is that he should reveal himself to them, and not to the world, our Lord returns an answer, not to the question which was asked, but to the one which should have been asked, answering ἵνα τις ἀγαπά μὲ, &c.

24. ἀγωνίζεσθε εἰσελθεῖν δ., &c.] Ἀγωνίζεσθε is a very significant term, founded on an agonistic allusion; the sense being, 'strain every nerve to force your way in.' This use of εἰ for πότερον in direct address, as here, is rare, while in indirect address it is not infrequent. The best mode of viewing the idiom is to consider it as a blending of the oratio directa with the indirecta.

— πύλης.] A few ancient MSS. and Origen have θύρας, which is edited by Griesbach and Lachman; but wrongly: for it is far more probable that πύλης was altered by the Alexandrian Critics to the more exact term θύρας, than that πύλης should have been introduced from the parallel passage of Matthew.

25. ἀφ' οὗ.] Sub. χρόνου, 'from the time,' 'when once.' It seems most agreeable to the context to connect this verse (as did the Syr. and Pers. Translators, and also Beza and Pisc.) with the preceding rather than the following; according to which we may best suppose the apodosis to be at τότε, ver. 26. Ἐγερθῇ is not (as some imagine) redundant, but is a part of the imagery of the story, and signifies, 'has risen from his seat'; namely to go and see that the doors are barred up. Ἀποκλ. is used as at Gen. xix. 10, τὴν θύραν τοῦ οἴκου ἀπέκλεισαν. and Thucyd. v. 80, ἀπέκλεισε τὰς πύλας. [See Pa. xxxii. 6. Ia. iv. 6. Matt. xxv. 10.]

26. ἐνώπιόν σου] 'in thy presence and company.' This mode of address is a form of rousing any one's recollection of a person; as denoting familiar intercourse aforesaid.

27. οὐκ οἶδα ὅ. π. 4.] This seems to be a popular mode of expressing, that we desire to have nothing to do with the person, as Matt. vii. 23. xxv. 12. So Lucian Pisc. 50. i. 617, makes Aristotle, when brought back to life, say of one who pretends to be a true follower of him, and is not such, ἀγνοῶ ὅστις ἐστίν.

—ἐργάται τῆς ἀδικίας.] The wicked, says Bp. Sanderson, Serm. ad Aulam, p. 216, are so termed in Scripture because they do hoc agere, make it their work, business, or trade. Schleus. compares Xen. Mem. ii. 1. 27, καλῶν καὶ συμ- νῶν ἐργάτης. To which I would add 2 Macc. iii. 6, οἱ ἐργάται τῆς ἀδικίας. Menand. Hist. i. 145. Α. χαλεπῶν ἔργων καὶ δυοσίων ἐργάται.

29. [Comp. Is. ii. 2, 3. Mal. i. 11.]

32. τῇ ἀλώπεκι ταύτῃ.] Not said by way of reproach (as in Aristoph. Thes. 1133, μαρὸς ἀλώ- πηξ! οἷον ἐπιτηκίζει μοι), though Herod, from his consummate dissimulation, well merited the epithet; but to show his intimate knowledge of Herod's disposition and secret policy, which was to induce Jesus to quit his territories (Weistein). For the same reason, probably, that the Gada- renes, Matt. viii. 34, desire Jesus to depart from their coasts.

—ἐκβάλλω δαιμόνια, &c.] The course of reasoning is this: 'I am employed innocently, and even highly meritoriously, nor shall I long weary him with my presence, but soon take my departure; why, then, should he seek my life?' Σήμερον καὶ αὔριον is a sort of proverbial form, for any short period of time, as in Hos. vi. 2, and a kindred passage of Arrian Epict. iv. 10, cited by Weistein. On the import of τελειοῦμαι the Commentators are not agreed. Some recent ones take it to mean, 'I shall be sacrificed;' but of this sense they adduce no valid proof. It is bet- ter, with the ancient and most modern Interpreters, to explain it, 'I shall be brought to the end of my course,' namely, by death. So Phil. iii. 12, οὐχ ὅτι ἤδη τετελείωμαι. Almost all Commem- tators consider the word as an Attic contract form for τελειώσομαι, and that as put for τελειωθή- σομαι. But Bornem., with reason, objects that the penult of this verb is long; and notices simi- lar errors in the forms of other verbs in the Classics. Here certainly the Present seems re- quired by the correspondent verbs foregoing, ἐ- βάλλω and ἐπιτελῶ; though the sense is, 'I am being brought to my end;' which involves a notion of what is scarcely future, as being very shortly to take place.

33. πλὴν—πορεύεσθαι.] q. d. 'However, I must for this short time go on in my usual course or ministry;' for πορεύεσθαι (like the Heb. ἵת) denotes habitual action, or regular business. There is, in fact, not an ellipsis, but an apostrophe, to be supplied from what went before; q. d. '[I shall, I say, finish this course in spite of Herod, and shall not perish in Galilee,] for it cannot be,' &c.; which words contain one of the most cutting reproaches imaginable. Of course, οὐκ ἐνδέχεται must be understood with the usual limitation in such sort of acute dicta; i. e. 'it can scarcely be;' for John the Baptist, and some few others, had been put to death out of Jerusalem.

34. Ἱερουσαλήμ, &c.] On the full force of this pathetic apostrophe, see Notes on Matt. xxiii. 37, 38.

—νοστήσα] for νοστήα in the parallel passage of Matthew; denoting the nest with the young; as in Deut. xxxii. 11. Render, brood. [Comp. 2 Esd. ii. 30.]

it may be thought introduced from the passage of Matthew, because it is indispensably necessary to the sense; and ὑμῖν would thus be worse than useless. [Comp. Levit. xxi. 31. 2 Esd. i. 33.]
— ὁ ἔξῃ for ἔξει; on which see Robinson's Lex. in ἔξει C.

XIV. 1. φαγεῖν ἄρτον.] A phrase formed from the Hebrew אכל לחם (used in Gen. xliii. 25 in this sense. So the Sept. renders by ἀριστῆν); which, though it properly signifies no more than 'to take food,' yet often denotes 'to feast, to make good cheer,' as when the meal is one to which guests are invited; when it may be supposed that the provision is better than that of an ordinary domestic meal. Indeed, it appears from what Lightfoot, Wetstein, and others, have copiously adduced from the Rabbinical writers, that it was usual with the Jews to provide better cheer on the Sabbath than on other days, and used to make feasts especially on that day.

By τῶν ἀρχ. τῶν Φαρ. is meant (as Grotius, Hammond, Whitty, Pearce, and Campbell, have shown) 'one of the rulers [of a synagogue], who was a Pharisee,' τῶν Φαρ. being for ἐκ τῶν Φαρ., or in opposition. Comp. John iii. 1. For that such rulers were not all Pharisees, appears from John vii. 48.

2. ἐμπροσθεν αὐτοῦ] 'in his view,' having probably so placed himself, though he did not dare to ask for aid, it being the Sabbath day.

3. ἀποκριθεὶς] 'addressing himself to.'

4. τίος ὑμῶν—καὶ οὐκ, &c.] Bornemann rightly renders, 'Quisquam vestrum asinus aut bo in puteum incidit, et quis non statim eum eruat?'

— ἔξει.] Many good MSS. and Versions, and some Fathers and early Editions, have υἱός, which is adopted by Wetstein, Matthæi, and Scholz; but without sufficient reason; for the canon, of preferring the more difficult reading, does not apply in cases where that would involve any considerable harshness, and violate the usage of the language, or where the words are very similar, as is the case here. In these sort of sayings an ass or an ox are put for any domestic animal, as being in the most common use.

— ἀνασπάσει.] Render, 'will draw him up,' by means of ropes.

7. παραβολήν.] Meaning, 'an important moral precept' (see Note on Matt. xiii. 3), or rather a series of moral comparisons, including also a parable.

— ἐπέχων.] Supply here (as at Acts iii. 5) τὸν νοῦν, or τὴν διάνοιαν, which is found expressed in Plato, p. 926; unless, indeed, it be better to suppose no ellipsis at all, as in 1 Tim. iv. 16, ἐπαις σεαυτῷ. Thus ἐπέχων will simply denote observing, &c.

8. τὴν πρωτοκλισίαν] 'the principal seat,' namely, in the middle place on the couch, which formed the top of the triclinium, or the one on the right of it.

9. δὲς τόπον] 'give thy place,' or seat. This phrase (formed on the Latin locum dare) and the following one προσανέβηθι ἀνένταρον were customary phrases of table etiquette with the ancients in general.

— ἄρξῃ.] Not begin, but proceed. An idiom found also in the Classical writers, especially Homer; ex. gr. Il. a. 571, ἤρχ' ἀγορεύειν.

10. ἀνάπessαι.] The MSS. here fluctuate between ἀνάπessον (the common reading), ἀνάπessαι, edited by Matthæi, and ἀνάπessαι, edited by Griesbach and Vater. Of these I have chosen the last, because internal evidence is much in its favour over ἀνάπαισι. As to ἀνάπαισον, it seems to be a mere error of the scribes.

— προσανάβηθι.] The προς is for πρόσω (further in, onwards) for προςίτι.

11. πᾶς ὁ ὑψῶν—ὑψωθήσεται.] Probably an adage, since similar sentiments occur in the Rabbinical writers.

12. μὴ φῶναι τοὺς φίλους, &c.] This sense of φωνεῖν, to invite, is very rare, and is founded on that more frequent one, by which the word denotes to hail or summon any one to us. The best Commentators are of opinion that the negative particle is here to be taken with limitation, and rendered non tam, quam potius. An idiom, indeed, occurring in various passages of the Old and New Test.; but very rarely where, as here, the two particles are employed in two different sentences. Accordingly it is better to reject the limitation. The intent of what is here said is plainly to inculcate, that charity is a duty far more obligatory than hospitality. See Archbishop Newcome.

14. ὅτι οὐκ ἔχουσιν ἀνταποδοῦναι, &c.] The sense here will be much cleared by referring the γὰρ τοῦ μακάριος ἔσῃ, and considering ὅτι οὐκ ἔχουσιν—σοι as a parenthetical clause, which, in rendering, may be introduced further on, thus: 'And happy shalt thou be; for though they cannot make a return to thee, a return will be made thee,' &c.

— ἀναστάσει τῶν δικ.] So ἀνάστ. τῆς ζωῆς in John v. 29. The Pharisees believed in a resurrection of the just, but imagined that there would be two resurrections; one to take place at the coming of the Messiah (who would thus establish an earthly kingdom, to which the Pharisee here evidently alludes by 'the kingdom of God'); the other the final resurrection, to be followed by a state of retribution.

18. ἀπὸ μίας.] Some supply ἑρας; others

φωνῆς, which is expressed in Joseph. ii. 509, and Diod. Sic. 515. D. But the true ellipsis seems to be γνώμης, 'from one and the same principle.' Παραιτεῖσθαι here signifies to excuse themselves. So Plutarch cited in Steph. Thes. in v. 1673. D., ἰδοὺ δὲ νυκτὸς ἀπὸ Κ. εἰς δαίπνον καλεῖσθαι· παραιτούμενος δὲ ἀγεσθαι τῆς χειρὸς ἐκ' αὐτοῦ, μὴ βουλόμενος. Ἐχέ με παρητηρίσει is a Latinism, formed on the phrase excusatum me habeo rogo, which occurs in Martial, ii. 80.

— ἀγρὸν ἠγόρασα.] Since it can hardly be supposed that a man would buy land without having seen it; or that, having once bought it, the going to see it should be a matter of such urgency; most recent Commentators take the sense of ἠγόρασα to be, 'I intend to buy.' But that is surely a most unwarrantable straining of the sense. There is, indeed, no reason to deviate from the accustomed force of the tense, if we render, 'I have just bought; and take ἀνδράκην ἔχω, with the limitation peculiar to all such popular modes of expression (so ἀνδράκαιον at v. 23), merely to imply on the part of the speaker, not absolute necessity, but strong inclination,—well expressed by our common version, 'I must needs.' And though the viewing of land once bought might seem of little consequence, yet it should be considered that property of any kind never possesses such attractions, as when first it comes into any one's possession, by purchase or otherwise; when men's curiosity naturally pries into any advantage, real or fancied. The very same reasoning will apply to the next words ἑτέγη βόων ἠγόρασα πάντα. For the purchase, though, in a certain sense, made, was not really completed till the proving; the oxen being, we may suppose, bought on warrant, and subject to future trial and approbation. That such was not unusual both among Jews and Gentiles is plain from the passages adduced by Schoetzg. and Weststein from the Rabbinical writers and the writers on Civil Law.

20. γυναῖκα ἔγημα, καὶ, &c.] This was the most specious of the excuses; for, by the laws and customs of most nations, any omission in the duties, and still more the etiquettes of life, was thought excusable in newly-married persons. Hence even soldiers, in that case, had usually a furlough of a year. And here, I would observe, Commentators have not been well employed in animadverting, as they have done, on the weakness of the excuses offered. So far from that, the first two reasons are very plausible; and the last very strong. And why? They seem to have been purposely made as strong as such reasons ordinarily are, in order to show that no reasons of any kind will be admitted as valid by the heavenly Inviter; who enjoins us first (i. e. above all) to seek His kingdom and righteousness, and allows of no plea for neglecting that duty; requiring us to 'take up and bear our cross,' and forsake all that stands in the way of our acceptance of his gracious invitation, — whether the claims of parental, filial, or conjugal duties, or any similar bond of affection (see ver. 26); otherwise we cannot be his disciples, and ²⁰ shall not taste of his supper.

The principles, indeed, which ran through these various excuses was a contempt of the feast, by a decided preference to other avocations. And consequently, in one or other of its Proteus forms, stamped them all with the mark of falsehood.

21. ῥύμας] 'lanes.' A signification only found in the later writers. Τὸς πτωχοὺς—τυφλοὺς, i. e. the most wretched and miserable objects.

22. φραγμοὺς.] This is usually taken to mean places fenced off: a sense, however, little suitable here. From the term being associated with ἀδελφός, it is plain that some kind of road is meant;

and as φραγμός signifies what is called a dead fence (i. e. one made with figs), so the sense here must be, 'a fenced path,' or foot road, such as would be necessary across vineyards, orchards, &c. Hence we may render, 'the high-ways and bye-paths.'

— ἀνάγκασον.] All the best Commentators are agreed, that this can only denote the moral compulsion of earnest persuasion, as in a multitude of passages which they have adduced as examples.

24. [Comp. Matt. xxii. 8. xxi. 43.]

25. This and the following verses are by the Commentators supposed to record what occurred on some other occasion. There is, however, I apprehend, a connection between the two; and the address in question was, we may suppose, made soon after the foregoing; probably occurring as Christ was commencing his journey towards Jerusalem, and the multitude crowding around him at his departure. Our Lord then took occasion to give the moral of the Parable recently put forth; containing its application to persons of all kinds, and of every age, to whom the offer of salvation should be made.

— συνεπορεύοντο δέ.] This should be rendered not, 'and there went,' but 'now there were going with him [to speed him on his way].' So the Vulg. well renders, 'Ibant autem,' and the Pesch. Syr., 'et quum irent.'

26. μισεῖ] i. e. comparatively, namely, minus amat, as appears from Matt. vi. 24. x. 37. [Comp. Deut. xii. 6. xxxiii. 9. Rev. xii. 11.]

27. [Comp. supra ix. 23. Matt. xvi. 24. Mark viii. 34.]

fore we enter on the Christian life, to seriously weigh the difficulty of the duties required of us, the sacrifices to be made, and the temptations to be resisted; so that we may not afterwards be moved by them to abandon our Christian course.

— πύργου.] Doddridge supposes this to be such a tower as was built in the vineyards of the East for the temporary accommodation of those who guarded the produce. But the costliness implied in calculating its expense indicates a mansion; such, it seems, as was called πύργος, by a similar figure to the Latin turris, as denoting a turreted house; and, by implication, a considerable edifice. We may here understand a country house in a vineyard; in which sense turris occurs in Livy, xxxiii. 48, where Duker gives other examples. And from Arundel's Travels in Asia Minor, vol. ii. 335, we learn that πύργος even yet designates a country house.

— καθίσας.] This is used graphicè, and is merely ad ornatum; meaning, 'sitting down to consider.' So Virg. Æn. x. 159, Magnus sedet Æn., secumque volutat Eventus belli. Ψηφίζειν signifies, 1. to count by dropping pebbles; a primitive mode of calculation, still preserved among barbarous nations; 2. as here, to calculate, reckon. So Anthol. Gr. III. p. 49, ψηφίζων δ' ἀνέκειτο πόσον δώσει διαγεσθῆαι λητροῖς μισθόν, καὶ τί νοσῶν δαπανᾷ.

— τὰ πρὸς ἀπ.] Several MSS. have τὰ εἰς, and some εἰς without the τὰ, which is cancelled by Griesbach and Scholz; rightly, if the construction be what Bornemann affirms, εἰ ἔχει τὴν δαπάνην εἰς ἀπ. [Comp. Prov. xxiv. 27.]

31. συμβαλεῖν.] The construction συμβαλεῖν εἰς πόλεμον, ἢ μάχην τινί, is frequent in the Classical writers.

32. ἐρωτᾷ τὰ πρὸς εἰρ.] By τὰ πρὸς εἰρήνην is meant what tends to peace; i. e. proposals for peace, conditions of peace. So Wetstein appositely cites τὰ πρὸς τὰς διαλύσεις from Polyb.

33. ἀποτάσσεται.] 'renounces, forsakes.' The word signifies, 1. to range into parts; 2. (in the middle voice) to take part with one, which implies a renouncing the other; 3. to abandon of any thing, as here and in Josephus, 8. Ἐσθὴρ δὲ ἐκίτατο τὸν Θεόμωτον καὶ τοῖς ἡσίοις ἀποταξάμεναι ἡμέραις.

34. The connection here is obscurely put. It is, with most probability, as follows: 'Ye see, then, the necessity of the cost and hazard of becoming a Christian; for if ye engage inconsiderately, ye apostatize altogether, or become, like salt, utterly worthless, mere professors of the word, and not doers.' [Comp. Mat.

In order the better to understand follows, we may suppose that some little elapsed between what is recorded in Chapter, and that which is narrated: sent; during which the Publicans, and sinners of the place and neighbourhood of Jesus' miracles, and the great precept teaching; and accordingly, partly from and partly from better motives, had gathered to hear him. Whereupon Jesus attended to the better disposed of them some of them even sat at meat. This the indignation of the Pharisees, who into murmurings. To prevent the latter whose conduct, in discouraging the people resorting to him, our Lord thought precluded his own conduct, not, indeed, of Matt. ix. 10. 13 (where he intimates communication with them as a religious patients, not as a compassion), but in by inference, to be drawn from the God in encouraging and readily receiving sinners (see ver. 20, and compare ver. 11) If God received sinners, ought not we

Our Lord, then, proceeds to illustrate dealings of God with contrite sinners in Parables; which, by placing the matter points of view, might make it more understood. Of these the two first are new and their scope is to represent the power of the souls of his people to Christ, and c the deep interest taken in their conversion by God and his holy angels. The third is meant to set forth the nature of true repentance, and show the gracious reception which the truly penitent sinner will experience from his merciful Father.

2. προσδέχεται καὶ συνισθίει· 'is receiving and coming with.' Προσδέχεται implies admission to any one's company, and συνισθίει, to his intimacy. See 1 Cor. v. 11. Gal. ii. 12. Pa. ci. 5.

4. ἐπὶ. This Preposition joined with verbs of motion, indicates purpose of action. Κύριε compares Diog. Laert. i. 10. 2, περιφθαίς—ἐπὶ τὸ πρόβατον.

5. ἐπιτίθεται—ὤμων.] It may have been, as some say, a custom with the Jewish shepherds to carry their sheep on their shoulders. But this passage will not prove it; for a lost sheep far from home must by shepherds of all countries be carried, since a single sheep cannot be driven.

7. ἢ for μάλλον ἢ, as in the best writers, though in the Scriptural ones this use originated from Hebrew. 'Ἐπὶ, 'on account of.' By μετανοία is here meant, not that sorrow for sin which is continually required even of the best persons, but that turning from sin and reformation of life, which is indispensably necessary to true conversion. That there should be greater joy in this instance is well accounted for by Dr. Jortin, Serm. lxxv. 'Regular obedience,' says he, 'is more pleasing to the angels; but here greater joy is experienced; something more like human affection and gratification, though not so much acute happiness.' See note on John viii. 56, ἡγαλλιάσατο. The declaration in question may be supposed to convey (as Mr. Greswell shows) an oblique but pointed censure of the censurers themselves;

since δικαίους cannot mean simply the righteous, nor οἵτινες οὐ χρεῖαν ἔχουσι μετανοίας those who need no repentance; but the expressions are to be taken with a certain turn of meaning, called forth by the occasion, and connected with irony. Thus by δικαίους are to be understood 'those who think themselves such,' are such in their own conceit; in short, the self-righteous. As examples of which mode of expression it may suffice to refer to Mark ii. 17. Luke v. 32, οὐκ ἤλθον καλεῖσαι δικαίους, ἀλλ' ἁμαρτωλοὺς αἰς μετάνοιαν. Luke x. 21, σοφῶν καὶ συνετῶν.

8. τίς γυνή.] With this Parable commentators compare a very similar one in the Rabbinical writings; and Wetstein cites from Theophr. Char. 10, τῆς γυναικὸς ἀποβαλοῦσης τρίχαλκον, οἷος μεταφέρειν τὰ σκυῖν, καὶ τὰς κλῖνας, καὶ τὰς κιβωτοὺς, καὶ διφᾶν τὰ καλύμματα.

—ἅπται λύχνον.] This would be necessary; since (as we find from the remains of Herculaneum and Pompeii) the houses of the lower classes, in ancient times, either had no windows, or only what we rather liken to the loop-holes of our barns.

12. τὸ ἐπιβάλλον μέρος.] Supply μοι from the preceding, 'the portion which falleth to me'; namely, after fair and equitable partition. The Jewish law did not, any more than the Roman, permit to a father the arbitrary disposal of his whole property. It was entailed on the children, after his death, in equal portions; except that the first-born had a double share. Such distribution, however, was sometimes made by a parent to his children during his lifetime, with a reservation of what was necessary to the support of himself and his wife, if alive.

12. τὸν βίον] i. o. by metonymy, means of living, substance.

13. συναγαγὼν ἅπαντα.] Meaning, 'having converted the whole into money.' There is, however, no ellipsis of εἰς ἀργύριον; but only that circumstance is implied in συναγ., which seems to have been a form of expression used in common life. The word, however, is sometimes expressed, as in Plutarch, p. 772, κληρονομία—εἰς ἀργύριον συναγαγών.

— διεσκόρπισε] 'dissipated.' A metaphor taken from winnowing. So Dan. xi. 24, Sept. ὑπαρξιν αὐτοῖς διασκορπιεῖ.

— ἀσώτως] i. e. τρόπῳ ἀσώτου. Meaning, one who cannot be saved, a prodigal, a dissolute person, one of whom Alexis in Athenæus says, 'the goddess of salvation herself could not save.'

15. ἐκολλήθη] i. e. 'engaged himself to.' The verb has properly a passive sense, but is always used in a middle or reciprocal one. Βόσκειν χοίρους. An employment by all the ancient nations (even where there existed no religious prejudices, as in the case of the Jews) considered as among the vilest. How degrading, then, to a Jew!

16. καὶ ἐπεθύμει γεμίσαι—αὐτῷ.] Campbell strenuously maintains that ἐπεθύμει cannot denote desire ungratified, since 'the young man,' says he, 'had surely the power, and would scarcely scruple to satisfy his hunger on the husks.' This latter remark, however, though true in itself, will only hold good against supplying what some have done, κερατίων ἐδίδου αὐτῷ, 'no one man gave him of the husks.' A most improbable as well as unauthorized view; for surely none could justly give him of those but the master himself. As to what Campbell urges, that ἐπεθ. 'cannot signify desire ungratified,' it certainly does signify it. The prodigal desired to satisfy his hunger with the food of men, if he could; but of that he could buy very little, and no man gave him aught. And as to the swine's food, on this he could not, it may be supposed, satisfy his hunger with so small a quantity as his stomach would bear. To take ἐπιθυμῶν, as Campbell does, for ἐγάπων, 'to be fain,' i. e. content, is to assign a sense established on no certain proof, either in the Scriptural or Classical writers. Indeed, there is a difference worthy of remark between I was fain, and I would fain. The former signifies 'I was glad,' (suin coming from the Ang. Sax. seogen, glad), in which is implied a sort of πεναντάκη, or compulsion for fear of worse; the latter (in which suin is an adverb) signifies, 'I would gladly do, or have done, a thing,' if permitted. And though the former of these senses would be suitable, both here and at Luke xvi. 21, yet, considering how deficient it is in authority, and how liable, as we have seen, to another objection, it cannot with propriety be adopted.

In short, the present may best be regarded as a popular mode of speaking, expressive of extreme distress; as much as to say, that he would have been glad to have lived as the swine did, whose food, however coarse, was plentifully supplied. Where the food his wages would procure was very scanty, and no man gave him [aught], namely to eat (suppl. τί φαγεῖν), i. e. no such food as is fit for man.

By κερατ. is meant the fruit of the arbutus siliquosa, or carob-tree, common in the Southern and Eastern countries, and still used for feeding swine, nay, occasionally eaten by the poorer class of people, as were the silique among the Romans.

17. εἰς ἑαυτὸν ἐλθὼν.] A formula denoting properly, recovery from suining or from insanity; but also used of recovery from any delusion or error of mind. So Diod. Sic. xiii. 25, τῶν λογισμοῖς εἰς ἑαυτοὺς ἐρχόμενοι. Arrian Epict. iii. 1, ὅταν εἰς σεαυτὸν ἐλθῇ. Lacert. in. 204, donec discussis redeant erroribus ad se.

— μίσθιοι.] This is properly an adjective with the ellipsis of ἀνθρώποι; and it is so used in Josephus, Bell. iii. 6. 2, ὁ μίσθιος δόλος. It is, however, in use, a substantive, for μίσθιοι.

18. εἰς τὸν οὐρανὸν] for εἰς τὸν Θεόν. This is placed first, since men's sins are chiefly against God, even when also against their fellow-men. Inasmuch that David, Ps. li. 4, while conscious of having deeply injured men, yet says, 'Against THEE only have I sinned'; or, as it ought to have been rendered, especially or particularly. For it is the best evidence of the genuineness of a man's repentance, when it is accompanied with the strong feeling of the heinousness of his offence as regards God. 'Ἐνώπιόν σου,' 'in respect of thee'; namely, by wasting his substance, and thus occasioning him great unhappiness and loss of grace.

best MSS. and Versions, is with reason cancelled by almost all Editors. The Asyndeton is intensive.

20. καὶ ἀναστὰς ἦλθε, &c.] Thus immediately putting his good resolution into practice.

—εἶδεν.] This implies, together with seeing, also recognition. Ἐπίπεσεν ἐπὶ τὸν τράχ. The haste of the affectionate parent to rush into the embraces of his son is in fine contrast with the tardiness and hesitation, which would naturally be felt by the son, as conscious of deep blame, and without hope of full forgiveness.

21. πέτερ, &c.] The penitent prodigal, we see, not about the confession he had meditated, notwithstanding he had the embrace of forgiveness; yet he does not finish his speech, being, we may suppose, interrupted in uttering the last words αἰσῶμαι—σου by the address of his father.

22. ἐξενέγκατε—εἰς τοὺς πόδας.] It is worthy of remark, that all the articles called for are such as were never allowed to servants, nay, are such as implied not only freedom, but dignity; as the best robe, and a ring; on the use of which latter, as a mark of distinction, see Greswell.

—πρώτην.] This use of the word is rarely found, except in the Scriptural writers. So Ezra xiv. 22, μετὰ τῶν πρώτων ἡδυσμάτων. The most opposite example from other writers is one in Athen. l. v. p. 197, Ταῦται δ' ἀμφίτατοι ἀλαργεῖ ἐπίστρωτοι τῇς πρώτης ἱρίας. By the ring is meant, doubtless, a gold ring, always in the East a mark of opulence. Shoes are added, since servants went unshod. So we read in Plautus, Casin. 'Si effexis hoc, soleas tibi dabo, et Phaulum in digito Aureum.'

23. τὸν μόσχον τὸν σιτ.] Such as, we may suppose, most opulent rustic families would be usually provided with, for any extraordinary call of their hospitality, as poultry is with us, see Gen. xviii. 7. Moreover, veal was by the ancients reckoned a delicacy. So Hor. Ep. l. iii. 36. butcher in redditum votiva juventa. Θύσατε,

'butcher,' see Note on Matt. xxii. 4. So we read in Hom. Od. ξ. 414, Ἄζεθ' ὧν τὸν ἀριστον, ἵνα ξείνῳ τιμεύσω.

—φαγόντες εὐφρανθῶμεν.] Render, 'let us eat and make merry,' (not 'be merry,') as the expression is rightly translated at ver. 29 and 32. The same idiom occurs also in our common Version at Judg. ix. 27. Jer. xxx. 19. Rev. xi. 10, χαροῦσι—καὶ εὐφρανθήσονται. And so the word should be rendered at Eccles. viii. 15.

24. νεκρὸς ἦν, καὶ ἀνέζησεν.] Render (here and ver. 32), 'was dead, and has come to life again.' In each passage the expressions νεκρ. ἦν and ἀνέζ. may be taken, in a popular sense, for 'was regarded as one dead, lost to his family.' But to this (too feeble of itself) the air of the context requires us to at least superadd the moral sense of the terms, as used of spiritual death, by unrepented and unforfeited sin, and a spiritual coming to life again by repentance and reformation. A sense frequent in Scripture (see Rom. iv. 19. Eph. ii. 1. v. 14. 1 Tim. v. 6. 1 John iii. 14. Rev. iii. 1), and not unexampled in other ancient writers. Thus the Pythagorean Philosophers used to speak of such of their disciples as abandoned the master's precepts as dead, and their state a living death; nay, erected cenotaphs to their memories. So Lysias the Pythagorean (cited by Kypke) says to such a person, εἰ μὴ οὖν μεταβάλοις, χαρίσσομαι· εἰ δὲ μὴ, τίθνακάς μοι.

25. ἤκουσε συμφωνίας καὶ χορῶν.] According to a very ancient and Oriental custom, of having concerts of music, vocal and instrumental, at entertainments; see Hom. Od. p. 358.

27. ὑγιαίνοντα.] For the Classical σῶν καὶ ὑγιῆ, found in Herodot. iii. 124, and Thucyd. iii. 34. Yet the moral sense, inculcated at ver. 24, may be united with the physical one. So Plutarch, cited by Kypke, ἵνα μὴ τοῦ ὑγιαίνοντος καὶ ταταγμένου (orderly) βίου καταφρονησῶσι.

ἤθελεν εἰσελθεῖν. Ὁ οὖν πατήρ αὐτοῦ ἐξελθὼν παρεκάλει αὐτόν. Ὁ δὲ ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπε τῷ πατρί· Ἰδοὺ, τοσαῦτα 2 ἔτη δουλεύω σοι, καὶ οὐδέποτε ἐντολήν σου παρήλθον· καὶ ἐμοὶ οὐδέποτε ἔδωκας ἔριφον, ἵνα μετὰ τῶν φίλων μου εὐφρανθῶ. Ὅτε δὲ ὁ υἱός σου οὗτος, ὁ καταφαγὼν σου τὸν βίον μετὰ 3 πορνῶν, ἦλθεν, ἔθυσας αὐτῷ τὸν μόσχον τὸν σιτευτόν. Ὁ δὲ εἶπεν αὐτῷ· Τέκνον, σὺ πάντοτε μετ' ἐμοῦ εἶ, καὶ 3 πάντα τὰ ἐμὰ σὰ ἐστίν. Ἐὐφρανθήναι δὲ καὶ χαρῆναι ἔδει· 3 ὅτι ὁ ἀδελφός σου οὗτος νεκρὸς ἦν, καὶ ἀνέζησε· καὶ ἀπολω- λώς ἦν, καὶ εὐρέθη.

XVI. ἘΛΕΓΕ δὲ καὶ πρὸς τοὺς μαθητὰς αὐτοῦ· Ἄν- 1 θρωπός τις ἦν πλούσιος, ὃς εἶχεν οἰκονόμον· καὶ οὗτος δι- εβλήθη αὐτῷ ὡς διασκορπίζων τὰ ὑπάρχοντα αὐτοῦ. Καὶ 2 φωνήσας αὐτόν εἶπεν αὐτῷ· Τί τοῦτο ἀκούω περὶ σοῦ; ἀπόδος τὸν λόγον τῆς οἰκονομίας σου· οὐ γὰρ δυνήσῃ ἐπὶ οἰκονομεῖν. Εἶπε δὲ ἐν ἑαυτῷ ὁ οἰκονόμος· Τί ποιήσω, ὅτι 3 ὁ κύριός μου ἀφαιρεῖται τὴν οἰκονομίαν ἀπ' ἐμοῦ; σκάπτει οὐκ ἰσχύω, ἐπαιτεῖν αἰσχύνομαι. Ἐγνων τί ποιήσω· ἵνα, 4 ὅταν μετασταθῶ τῆς οἰκονομίας, δέξωνταί με εἰς τοὺς οἴκους

29. δουλεύω.] The present tense here denotes continuity, i. e. 'I have been and am serving thee.'

30. ὁ καταφαγὼν σου τὸν βίον.] A metaphor to denote prodigality, common in the Greek writers from Homer downwards.

31. πάντα τὰ ἐμὰ σὰ ἐστίν.] Render, 'all things that are mine are thine' (Comp. John xvii. 10, τὰ ἐμὰ πάντα σὰ ἐστίν), namely, as my heir, κύριος πάντων, for his brother had forfeited all title to inheritance. Such a person the Romans called Herus minor.

32. ὁ ἀδελφός σου] 'that brother of thine,' in allusion to the foregoing ὁ υἱός σου οὗτος at ver. 30. This is said, and not ὁ υἱός μου, in order, as Abp. Newcome observes, to suggest the endearing relation of brother.

XVI. 1. Ἄλεγε δὲ καὶ, &c.] Render, 'Moreover, he spake also to his disciples as follows.' As the preceding parable had been addressed especially to the Pharisees and Scribes (in vindication of his conduct, and in illustration of the dealings of God with sinful man), so this was addressed to the disciples at large, including, doubtless, some of the lately converted publicans and rich men; for whom, indeed, it should seem, this parable was especially intended; as meant to set forth the danger of the love of money, and the impossibility of 'serving God and Mammon'; also to show the right use of wealth, and how it ought to be so employed, that being 'rich in this world,' they might also 'be rich in good works,' that they might lay hold on eternal life (1 Tim. vi. 18, 19).

— οἰκονόμος.] The οἰκονόμος was a domestic, generally a freedman (and, in the time of our Lord, always of free condition), who acted as general manager of the affairs of a family, to whom all the property and the expenditure was committed in trust, and all the household subject.

Thus the office will not exactly answer to that of the Roman dispensator, still less to that of the villicus, but was more analogous to that of the Greek ἐπίτροπος, and comprehended all the duties of our land-steward, house-steward, and bailiff.

— διεβλήθη] 'was accused.' This use of the word, to denote a true and not a calumnious charge, is almost confined to the Sept. and the later Greek writers.

— διασκορπίζων.] Render, 'as dissipating (or squandering) his property.'

2. τί] for διατί, how! importing expatiation and displeasure, at such breach of trust as Gen. xxxix. 4. Τὸν λόγον, 'the account,' which you are bound to give. So Plato, Phaed. 8, ἐμὴν δὲ τοῖς δικασταῖς βούλομαι τὸν λόγον ἀποδοῦναι. On this sense of λόγος see Notes on Matt. xviii. 33. Thus δυνήσῃ is not redundant, but signifies must, i. e. unless thou givest satisfactory account.

3. ἀφαιρεῖται] 'is taking away.'

— σκάπτειν.] Meaning, to work as a day labourer; of which occupation digging, as being the most laborious and servile, is put, as a par for the whole. Indeed the expression itself is almost proverbial. So Phocyl. εἰ δὲ τις δὲ δίδασκε τέχνην, σκάπτειτο δικέλλη, and Aristophan. Av. 1432, τί γὰρ πάθω, σκάπτειν γὰρ οὐκ ἐπίσταμαι.

4. ἔγνων.] Kuinoel and others explain, I understand or see, 'a thought occurs to me.' This sense, however, is destitute of authority, and too much limits the meaning; which seems to include this and the common version 'I am (or have) resolved;' implying that he had been anxiously debating with himself what course to take.

— μετασταθῶ.] Μεθίστημι is often used of removal from office. With the expression δέξω

αὐτῶν. Καὶ προσκαλεσάμενος ἓνα ἕκαστον τῶν χρεωφειλετῶν τοῦ κυρίου ἑαυτοῦ, ἔλεγε τῷ πρώτῳ· Πόσον ὀφείλεις τῷ κυρίῳ μου; ὁ δὲ εἶπεν· Ἐκατὸν βάτους ἐλαίου. καὶ εἶπεν αὐτῷ· Δέξαι σου τὸ γράμμα, καὶ καθίσας ταχέως γράψον πενήκοντα. Ἐπειτα ἑτέρῳ εἶπε· Σὺ δὲ πόσον ὀφείλεις; ὁ δὲ εἶπεν· Ἐκατὸν κόρους σίτου. καὶ λέγει αὐτῷ· Δέξαι σου τὸ γράμμα καὶ γράψον ὀγδοήκοντα. ^a Καὶ ἐπύνησεν ὁ κύριος τὸν οἰκονόμον τῆς ἀδικίας, ὅτι φρονίμως ἐποίησεν. ὅτι οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου φρονιμώτεροι ὑπὲρ τοὺς υἱοὺς τοῦ φωτός εἰς τὴν γενεάν τὴν ἑαυτῶν εἰσι. ^b Καγὼ ὑμῖν λέγω· ποιήσατε ἑαυτοῖς φίλους ἐκ τοῦ μαμωνᾶ τῆς ἀδικίας, ἵνα

as to those οἴκους αὐτῶν we may compare Matt. xiii. 26, eis οἰκίαν διδάσθαι. Here, in that passage, it is to be understood not only of hospitable entertainment, but also (from the context) of that kind attention and support, to such eminent benefactors are justly entitled as those whom they have served: what we express by having a claim upon any one. The word ἔλεγε, as Kuinoel directs, he taken impressively; but on account of the αὐτῶν following, it is better to supply ἀνθρώποι, from the subject matter; since there seems to be a reference to steward persons in the mind of the steward; namely, his master's debtors.

^a ἔλεγε τῷ πρώτῳ.] Two cases are specified, as a sample of what was said to all.

^b δέξαι σου τὸ γράμμα, &c.] There has been a little debate as to the sense of γράμμα, &c. The almost invariable opinion of Commentators, ancient and modern, is that it signifies a bond, or engagement; of which sense four examples are adduced by Kypke from Josephus and Libanius. And Grotius has proved that γράμμα, like the acta libera, had the signification both of synopsis or chirographus, and of cautio. These acta, he shows, were kept in the hands of the steward. According to the explanation given by Dr. Mackn. the γράμμα denotes a contract (probably on lease) for rent. The common interpretation, however, may be, and, I think, ought to be united with this, in order to express the true sense. These γράμματα were, it should seem, not bonds for the payment of a certain rent, and not contracts. And Grotius has shown that γράμματα in this sense was synonymous with πρόβλημα and συνθήκαι. Those who took land on lease, we may suppose, required, previously to the lease, to sign an engagement, binding them to pay as rent a certain portion of the produce to the proprietor. This was, no doubt, countersigned by the proprietor, or his steward, accompanied by an acceptance of the rent (thus ratifying the contract), of which paper a copy, also signed by the steward, was given to the occupier for his security. Thus the γράμμα being both a bond and a contract, a permanent and binding alteration of that contract would be permanently beneficial to the χρεωφειλέταις, and consequently for them a lasting obligation.

^c ὁ κύριος i. e. 'the master of the steward.' ^d ἐπύνησεν 'commended him,' not for his prudence, but (besides his prudence in securing his own subsistence) for the dexterity with which he had contrived it. So in Ter. Heaut. iii. 2. 26, Chremes thus justifies his praise of a knavish servant: In loco ego verò laudo. Τὸν οἶκον τῆς ἀδικίας is put, by Hebraism, for τὸν οἶκον τοῦ ἀδίκου, 'the fraudulent steward.' So verse 9, μαμωνᾶ τῆς ἀδικίας for τοῦ μαμ. ἀδίκου.

— ὅτι οἱ υἱοί, &c.] These are evidently the words, not of the master, but of Christ, suggesting an important admonition. The force of the expressions υἱοὶ τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου and υἱοὶ τοῦ φωτός is fully discussed by Bp. Sanderson in a Sermon on this text, and by Mr. Greswell. The words εἰς τὴν γενεάν admit of various explanations, and accordingly have been diversely interpreted. Many take εἰς τὴν γ. for ἐν τῇ γενεᾷ; assigning various metaphorical senses to γενεᾷ. But in the case of a difficult and disputed expression like the present, it is best to keep as close as possible to the obvious construction, and the natural and usual sense of terms. Now to discern the force of εἰς τὴν γενεάν, we must consider its purpose, which, as Bp. Sanderson and Mr. Greswell point out, is that of limitation or qualification. 'The children of this world' (observes Mr. Greswell) 'are not affirmed to be superior to the children of light in the possession of the faculty of worldly prudence, the providently adapting means to an end (for such is the force of the expression φρον.), but in the use of it, and that with a view to a special purpose, namely, unto or for their own generation.'

9. Having (as in Luke xviii. 6) taken occasion, from an example of wrong action, to excite them to right, Christ now proceeds to urge on them the weighty consideration which follows.

— ποιήσατε ἑαυτοῖς φίλους, &c.] Of which words there is no little diversity of interpretation. The expression μαμωνᾶ τῆς ἀδ. is evidently put for μαμωνᾶ ἀδίκου, by a frequent Hebraism. Yet the force of the epithet is by no means so obvious. Some take it to denote riches acquired by injustice. Such a sense, however, cannot be admitted here, since it would involve a doctrine unworthy of the Gospel. I would rather with others suppose, that the epithet has reference to the means by which riches are too often acquired, see Matt. xxv. 24. Yet this is a mode of explanation somewhat precarious. Hence it is best to take ἀδικ. as being directly opposed to ἀληθινῶς at ver. 11, in the sense false, inconsistent, unstable; of which sense many examples are adduced by Commentators from the Sept., the Classical writers, and the New Testament.

- c Intra 19. 17. ὅταν ἐκλίπητε, δέξωνται ὑμᾶς εἰς τὰς αἰωνίους σκηνάς. 'Ὁ πιστός ἐν ἐλαχίστῳ, καὶ ἐν πολλῷ πιστός ἐστι· καὶ ὁ ἐν ἐλαχίστῳ ἄδικος, καὶ ἐν πολλῷ ἄδικός ἐστιν. Εἰ οὖν ἐν τῷ
- MT. 6. ἀδίκῳ μαμωνᾷ πιστοὶ οὐκ ἐγένεσθε, τὸ ἀληθινὸν τίς ὑμῖν πιστεύσει; καὶ εἰ ἐν τῷ ἀλλοτρίῳ πιστοὶ οὐκ ἐγένεσθε, τὸ

- d Matt. 23. 18. ἤκουον δὲ ταῦτα πάντα καὶ οἱ Φαρισαῖοι, φιλάργυροι ὑπάρχοντες, καὶ ἐξεμυκτήριζον αὐτόν. Καὶ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Ὑμεῖς ἐστε οἱ δικαιοῦντες ἑαυτοὺς ἐνώπιον τῶν ἀνθρώπων· ὁ δὲ Θεὸς γινώσκει τὰς καρδίας ὑμῶν. ὅτι τὸ ἐν ἀνθρώποις

That such must at any rate be the sense here, is manifest from the antithesis between ἀδικ. and ἀληθ. 'Since' (as Mr. Greswell observes) 'the same subject is spoken of in each of these instances, it follows that the unjust mammon must simply be the false mammon, as the true mammon must simply be the just and righteous mammon.'

At ἐκλίπητε there is an ellipsis of τὸν βίον, which is generally expressed in the Classical writers, though in the Sept. always omitted. With respect to the persons meant in δέξωνται, many Commentators, ancient and modern, understand the angels appointed to receive departed spirits. A view countenanced by Matt. xxiv. 31, supra vi. 38, and especially xii. 20, τὴν ψυχὴν σου ἀπαιτοῦσιν ἀπὸ σοῦ. Yet there the ἀπαιτοῦσι may be taken as an impersonal; as indeed almost all recent Commentators take δέξωνται in the present passage; q. d. 'that ye may be received.' In αἰωνίους σκηνάς (with which compare 2 Esdr. ii. 11, δώσω αὐτοῖς αἰωνίως σκηνάς) there is meant to be an opposition, namely, of solid and lasting houses ('not made with hands'), to the temporary and frail tents of this world. A term which (as Bp. Jebb, Sacr. Litt. 250, well observes) 'forcibly calls up the recollection, that here we have no abiding habitation, and which may serve to impress the conviction, that in heaven God imparts his own eternity to things which in themselves might naturally be accounted void of duration, as 'the cottage of a night.'

10—12. The connexion is, 'Be faithful stewards of wealth. Take care also that ye be not enslaved by it. (Abp. Newcome.)

— ὁ πιστός ἐν ἐλαχίστῳ, &c.] An adagial saying, to be understood only of what generally happens, and adverting to the principle on which masters act, who, after proving the fidelity of servants in small matters, at length confide more important business to their care.

Our Lord, however, proceeds to give it an application as respects the comparative importance of the riches of this world and those of heaven; q. d. 'As he who is faithful in small matters, &c., so he who has misapplied the riches committed to his stewardship, &c. [Comp. xxv. 21, infra xix. 27.]

11. Now follows the application or moral. Tis. Meaning, by implication, no one, q. d. God will not, &c. Τὸ ἀληθινόν, 'the true riches,' (i. the favour of God and admission to the possion of eternal bliss) so called in opposition to the rich of the world, which are but a vain show, a promise what they never perform: see Hor. Ep. ii. 2. 170. Comp. Liban. Or. p. 814, οὐκ ἐγὼ θὸς τῶν ὡς ἀληθῶς κτημάτων.

12. εἰ ἐν τῷ ἀλλοτρίῳ—δώσει.] Here 'have only another mode of expressing the same thing viewed in another light; q. d. If you be embezzled or wasted what another gave you trust, how can he be expected to give you any in perpetuity? A similar sentiment, Dr. O. observes, occurs, but inverted, in the Antbol. G ἔγω δ' ὡς οὐκ ἐστι, κακῶς κεχρημένος ἐσθ τοῖς ἰδίοις, εἶναι πιστὸν ἐν ἀλλοτρίῳ.

By τὸ ἀλλότριον are meant the goods of this life only; so called because they are, strictly quod est, not our own, as being transitory and perish able, but only committed to us as stewards; τὸ ὑμέτερον the riches of an eternal inheritance in heaven, called our own, because the possession thereof is already secured to us on certain conditions, and will be wholly our own.

13. See Note on Matt. vi. 24.

14. The foregoing discourse was addressed, indeed, to the disciples, but the ground of it was the covetousness of the Pharisees, who were within hearing.

— ἐξεμυκτήριζον α.] 'sneered at him.' Με τηρίζειν (from μυκτήρ, the nose) properly signify ing to turn up the nose, is, by a metaphor common to most languages, used to designate derision. So Horace has 'nasos suspendere adunca.' That avarice made them ridicule the doctrine that they were only stewards of wealth, and ought to dis bute thereof to those that need.

15. δικαιοῦντες ἑαυτούς.] Literally, 'making yourselves appear just,' arrogating to yourselves virtue and sanctity not really yours. The δικαίωσις is used, like the Hiphil conjugation in Hebrew, for to 'make [one seem] just.'

— βδελύγμα for βδελυκτός; abstract is concrete. A sentiment corresponding to the supra xi. 39. With which and the present compare Matt. xxiii. 23. 27. Ia. i. 13. Amos v. 21

16—18. The connexion between these verses and the preceding is but faint; inasmuch as many eminent Expositors think there is none

- 16 ὑψηλόν, βδελύγμα ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ [ἐστίν]. Ὁ νόμος καὶ οἱ προφῆται ἕως Ἰωάννου ἀπὸ τότε ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ εὐαγγελίζεται, καὶ πᾶς εἰς αὐτὴν βιάζεται. Εὐκώτερον δέ ἐστι τὸν οὐρανὸν καὶ τὴν γῆν παρελθεῖν, ἢ τοῦ νόμου μίαν κεραίαν πεσεῖν. Πᾶς ὁ ἀπολύων τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ καὶ γαμῶν ἑτέραν μοιχεύει· καὶ πᾶς ὁ ἀπολύμενός ἀπὸ ἀνδρός γαμῶν μοιχεύει. But surely if there be no connexion between this and the preceding, as the connective link between v. 19, seq. and vv. 14, 15, it would suppose the sacred writer to have introduced this declaration of our Lord entirely out of place, nay so as to be worse than useless. Let us, however, see how the case stands. The verses in question are indeed introduced in a different connexion at Matt. xi. 12, 14. v. 18. 32; but the words might be, and doubtless were, spoken on two different occasions, and with some difference of intent. Here the purpose seems to have been to stigmatize the hypocrisy of the Pharisees, by showing their grievous failure in the discharge of the moral and relative duties of man to man, even according to the standard of the Law of Moses. It is also intimated that the Law, so far from being abrogated by the Gospel, is rather fulfilled and perfected by it; as, for example (v. 18), in its more rigid enforcement of the seventh commandment.

It also seems to have been our Lord's intent (v. 17, 18) to draw a tacit contrast between themselves and those whom they so abominated, the Publicans and harlots; so as to intimate the acceptance of the latter, and the rejection of the former; q. d. That the Pharisees, notwithstanding their pretensions to peculiar sanctity, had really sunk far below even the comparatively low standard of righteousness established by the Law, and were utterly indisposed to enter the kingdom of God; whereas those who made no pretensions to this righteousness, the ignorant multitude (πάντες), were now with contrite hearts pressing forward to enter (βιάζομενοι αἱ) the kingdom of heaven, through the door of the Gospel, making good the converse of the proposition at ver. 15, and showing that persons may be held in abomination among men (so as to be what the Apostle calls 'the offscouring of all things,' 1 Cor. iv. 13), and yet be accepted, nay be very precious in the sight of God.

17. The Gospel, though it supersedes the Law, yet fulfils it (Newcome). [Comp. Ps. cii. 26. Is. xl. 2 Pet. iii. 7.]

18. The Gospel improves the precepts of the Law. (Newcome.)

19. Here our Lord returns to the subject with which he commenced his discourse, namely, the use of riches. The δὲ has a transitive sense.

— Ἄνθρωπος δὲ τις, &c.] It has been disputed, whether the following narration be a real history, or merely a story, or something composed of both, i. e. founded on fact, but adorned with colouring and imagery, in which the abuse of riches is forcibly contrasted with the struggles of poverty. This compound, however, would involve some incongruity. The first mentioned view is adopted by Mr. Greswell; while the generality of Commentators, both ancient and modern, are agreed in considering it as a parable; since all the circumstances are parabolical, and a story very similar to it is found in the Babylonian Gemara.

The design of our Lord in this parable was to impress on their minds, by example, the foregoing precepts, as presented in another historical picture, like that with which he introduced the subject. In this he not only gives the substance of what had been previously said by him on the use of riches, but withal a most impressive warning as to the highly penal consequences of its abuse. In short, the design of our Lord (as Dr. Campbell observes) is 'to admonish us not that a monster of wickedness (such as many Commentators unwarrantably and injudiciously here suppose) shall be severely punished in the other world; but that the man who, though not chargeable with doing much ill, does little or no good, and lives, though not perhaps an intemperate, a sensual life; who, careless about the condition of others, exists only for the gratification of himself, the indulgence of his own appetites, and his own vanity, shall not escape punishment. It is to show the danger of living in the neglect of duties, though not chargeable with the commission of crimes; and particularly the danger of considering the gifts of Providence as our own property, and not as a trust from our Creator, to be employed in his service, and for which we are accountable to him.'

— πορφύραν] 'purple clothing.' The use of purple vestments was originally confined to kings, but had gradually extended itself to the noble and rich.

— εὐφραινόμενος καθ' ἡμέραν λαμπ.] Render, 'enjoying himself sumptuously (i. e. in expensive luxury) day by day,' see supra xii. 19. xv. 23, and Notes. Here, however, the expression may have reference to more than food, &c., and (as Greswell observes) extend to every pleasure, satisfaction, and convenience, of dress, gaiety, &c., which wealth can supply, to minister to the daily enjoyment, amusement, and self-satisfaction of a rich voluptuary; in short, whatever is comprehended in the description of St. John, 1 Ep. ii. 16, ἡ ἐπιθυμία τῆς σαρκός, καὶ ἡ ἐπιθυμία τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν, καὶ ἡ ἀλαζονία τοῦ βίου.

20. πτωχός.] Render, not 'a beggar,' but 'a poor destitute person,' as the usus loquendi and the contrast require.

— ἰβὶ βλητὸς] jacobai, 'was laid,' not 'had been laid,' as many render; for that would imply, what is most improbable, that Lazarus was only laid

Λάζαρος, ὅς ἐβέβλητο πρὸς τὸν πυλῶνα αὐτοῦ ἡλκωμένος, καὶ ἐπιθυμῶν χορτασθῆναι ἀπὸ τῶν ψιχίων τῶν πιπτόντων 21 ἀπὸ τῆς τραπέζης τοῦ πλουσίου· ἀλλὰ καὶ οἱ κύνες ἐρχόμενοι ἀπέλειχον τὰ ἔλκη αὐτοῦ. Ἐγένετο δὲ ἀποθαιεῖν 22 τὸν πτωχόν, καὶ ἀπενεχθῆναι αὐτὸν ὑπὸ τῶν ἀγγέλων εἰς τὸν κόλπον [τοῦ] Ἀβραάμ. Ἀπέθανε δὲ καὶ ὁ πλούσιος, there once; whereas there is little doubt that he was frequently laid there; for a rich man's portal was (see Hom. Od. ρ. 220, 236, and II. κ. 25) the constant resort of the destitute poor. The Pluperfect is here used for the Imperfect, to denote something customary and frequent.

— ἡλκωμένος] 'full of sores,' as persons of this destitute condition often are (partly from the cutaneous disorders produced by meagre diet and bad living). So a Rabbinical writer (cited by Wets.), 'Rogabatur a mendico quodam ulceroso.' 'Ἐλκος is a word derived from ἔλκω, to drain; because in ulcers the edge or lip of the sore seems to be drained up.

21. ἐπιθυμῶν χορτ., &c.] It has been not a little debated whether ἐπιθυμῶν signifies desiring (i. e. 'who desired'), or, 'who was glad or fain.' The former interpretation has been generally adopted by Commentators, ancient and modern; the latter, by Elsner, Parkhurst, Campbell, and others; who assign various reasons, but such as are by no means sufficient. For ἀγαπᾶν, though used in this sense by the Classical writers, is never found in the Scriptural ones; and ἐπιθυμᾶν no where occurs in this sense in the Classical, nor, I believe, in the Scriptural writers; for as to Luke xv. 10, see the Note there. Our translators have, I think, done right in assigning the sense 'he would fain' in that passage; and have, as rightly, retained the ordinary signification in the present. Here it is simply desire, or wish that is denoted. The desire of the poor man, in being laid there, was to be fed with the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table. And his placing himself there was a sort of begging by action. That his desire to be thus fed was (what some have imagined) not granted, is not only by no means implied in the term itself, but it is also, as Campbell shows, inconsistent with the circumstances of the narrative.

— τῶν ψιχίων, &c.] Meaning, not the crumbs which fell from, &c., but 'the scraps which were sent from the rich man's table.' Ψιχίον is a diminut. from ψιξ, a bit. Πίπτω is here used in a figurative sense, of of-fall (offal), as scraps and fragments. And the ἀπό has reference to their being sent away as refuse. By this same metaphor Pythagoras enjoined τὰ πίπτοντα ἀπὸ τῆς τραπέζης μὴ ἀναιρῆσθαι, i. e. not to gather up the scraps or leavings, but let them alone for the poor. This whole context is well illustrated by a passage of Hom. Od. ρ. 220, Πτωχὸν ἀνιρὸν, δαιτῶν ἀπολυμαντήρα, 'Ὅς πολλῇσι φλίσσι παραστάς φλίσσεται ὤμων, Αἰτίζων ἀκόλου. The second line illustrates the custom above adverted to of mendicants taking their station at a rich man's portal; and the expression denoting continuance there, though homely, is strong and graphic. The first and third lines are illustrated by a kindred passage at the Hymn to Ceres, 115, Αἰτίζων ἀκόλου τε καὶ ἐκβολὰ λύματα δαιτός.

— ἀλλὰ καὶ οἱ κύνες, &c.] Render, 'nay even the dogs used to come and lick his sores. A circumstance intended to contrast the compassion and sympathy of brutes with the insensibility of the rich man; and to represent the helpless and miserable condition of the poor man, (with his sores neither bound up nor mollified with ointment), and consequently the, in some degree, uncharitable neglect of Dives. For though, from the circumstance afterwards introduced of his asking for Lazarus to administer relief to him in his torments, it should seem that he regarded himself, in some measure, as a benefactor to him, in having relieved him with the scraps from his table; yet he was undoubtedly guilty of the neglect, here intimated, of omitting to make himself acquainted with the miserable condition of Lazarus, so as to effectually relieve his sufferings and restore him to health and strength.

22. ἀπενεχθῆναι αὐτὸν ὑπὸ τῶν ἀγγ., &c.] Αὐτόν, i. e. his soul. The older Commentators understand these words literally; while the more recent ones take them as a figurative mode of expression, to signify, under imagery accommodated to the opinion of the Jews, the simple idea, that 'Lazarus was removed to a state of supreme felicity in heaven.' The Jews, as it appears from Wetstein and Schoettg., held that the souls of the just were conveyed to the mansion of bliss by angels. So Targum on Cant. iv. 12, 'None but the just can enter Paradise, whither their souls are conveyed by angels.' The same opinion also extended to the Greeks and Romans, who ascribed to Hermes, or Mercurius, the office of ἀγγελος πομπαῖος as he is called in Soph. Aj. 843. So Hor. Od. i. 10. 17, Tu pius latinæ animas reponis sedibus. Equally certain is it, that in speaking of this removal to the seats of bliss the Jews expressed it either by being conveyed to Paradise, or, figuratively, by being carried away into Abraham's bosom. So Joseph. de Macch. § 13, οὗτω γὰρ θανόντας ἡμᾶς Ἀβραὰμ καὶ Ἰσαὰκ καὶ Ἰακώβ ὑποδέχονται εἰς τοὺς κόλπους αὐτῶν. Kilduschin, fol. 72. 1, 'Adā habet sedet in sinu Abrahæ.' This, then, was a mode of expression to signify the nearest and dearest connexion.

Now, were we merely concerned with the circumstance of his being carried by the angels to the place of eternal bliss, the literal interpretation above mentioned might be admitted, 'considering' (as Doddridge remarks) 'how suitable such an office would be to their benevolent nature, and to the circumstances of a departed spirit.' But viewing the other circumstances connected with it, as his being carried into Abraham's bosom (alluding to the Oriental custom of reclining at table, by which the head of a person sitting next him who was at the top of the triclinium was brought almost into his lap, see Note on John vi. 11. xiii. 23), it should seem that the latter view is the more correct.

It is, however, to be borne in mind that no responsibility on our Lord's part is involved in this case, as in that of the dæmoniacs; for it is admitted by the best Divines that in parabolical narratives, provided the doctrines inculcated be strictly true, the terms in which they are expressed may be adapted to the prevailing opinions of those to whom they are addressed. See Grotius, Doddridge, and Macknight.

23. ἐν τῷ ἄδῃ.] It is commonly supposed that the word here signifies Hell, the place of torment. And so Professor Stuart, in his Exegetical Essays on words denoting future punishment, assigns this sense; though he admits that this is the only passage in which the word bears that import. Others, however, as Wetstein, Rosenmüller, Campbell, Kuinoel, and Mr. Greswell, Parab., take it in the usual signification, to denote the place of departed souls, Sheol, or Hades (see Acts ii. 27, and Note on Matt. xi. 23), which the Jews, as well as the Greeks, supposed to be divided into two parts, Paradisæ and Gehenna, contiguous to each other, but separated by an impassable chasm; (Theor. Carm. ii. 13, 23, sedesque discretus parus.) so narrow, however, that there was a prospect of one from the other; nay, such that their respective inmates could converse with each other. Thus both the rich man and Lazarus would be equally in Hades, though in different parts.

This latter view seems preferable, because it is better to avoid supposing any such unusual signification as the above; and the ordinary one is far more agreeable to what precedes. Indeed, if ἐν βασάνοις be meant, as Kuinoel thinks, to qualify ἐν τῷ ἄδῃ (meaning, 'in the place of torment'), that would of itself decidedly prove that ἄδης must be taken in the usual sense; otherwise, according to the signification Hell, no such qualification could have been necessary. Ἐν βασάνοις may be rendered, 'under torture,' namely, such as was suited to the τάρταρος or prison of Hades, called Tartarus (where spirits are reserved for judgment, see 2 Pet. ii. 4), but, properly speaking, not Gehenna, the lake of fire, the second death; see Rev. xx. 14. On this subject see more in Campbell's Dissertation on Hades, vi. P. II.

This parabolical representation is, indeed, accommodated to Jewish ideas, and the invisible state is described by images derived from the same. But it is going too far to say, with Dr. Martin (in D'Oyly and Mant), that 'we are only to infer from hence the doctrine of a future state of rewards and punishments.' It must surely be concluded from hence that there is an intermediate state before the general resurrection; since that is far too prominent a feature of the representation to be numbered with circumstances merely ornamental. On which subject see Mr. Greswell.

24. ὀδυνῶμαι] 'am tortured,' 'suffer anguish.' Φλογὶ may, as Mr. Greswell shows, be regarded as a figurative expression to represent the acutest suffering of which an immaterial nature is susceptible, by a material image of misery the most dire.

25. ἀπέλαβες.] The ἀπό has much force, the sense being, 'thou hast received out,' or 'in full and completely;' as supra vi. 24, the rich are, by a similar argument, told, ἀπέχετε τὴν παράκλησιν ὑμῶν. See also Matt. vi. 2. 5. 16, ἀπὸ τὸν μισθὸν αὐτῶν.

— σὺ.] This, not found in several MSS., Versions, and Fathers, is cancelled by Griesbach, Tittman, and Scholz; but without sufficient reason; for besides that the antithesis requires the σὺ, and the insufficiency of the evidence for cancelling it (that of Versions being, in a case like this, but slender), we can account for its omission in two ways; for its insertion, in one only, and that not a very probable one.

— ὅδε.] Very many MSS., Versions, Fathers, and early Editions have ὅδε, which is edited by Matthæi and Scholz. But though this may seem agreeable to a well-known canon (of preferring the more difficult reading), yet that does not apply to words exceedingly similar and often confounded; in which case MS. authority is small. Propriety must, then, decide; and that here requires ὅδε.

26. χάσμα μέγα ἐστήρικται] 'a great chasm is fixedly placed.' 'The world,' says Wetstein, 'is especially used of a space extending from an upper to a lower situation, especially fissures from earthquakes.' And he introduces numerous passages from the Greek writers illustrative of the opinions of the Greeks; ex. gr. Lucian calls the deep and dark descent to the infernal regions χάσμα. Hesiod, Theog. 740, makes mention of a χάσμα in Tartarus; and Theophrastus ap. Plut. vol. ii. p. 545, sees in the infernal regions χάσμα μέγα καὶ κύττω διήκον. Hence it denotes an insuperable barrier.

— ἐνθῆν.] This (for the common reading ἐντεῦθεν) is found in many MSS. and the Ed.

Princ., and has been rightly adopted by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, and Scholz, as being agreeable to later Grecian. The word, indeed, is found in Hom. Il. xiii. 13, Thucyd. vii. 81, and Xenophon; and had probably always prevailed in the common dialect; though, in the more refined diction of books, ἐνταῦθεν was early substituted.

— διαπερώσιν] 'pass across' or over.

27. οὖν.] Render, 'then,' denoting a consequence of what has preceded; q. d. Then if that be impossible, &c.

28. διαμαρτύρηται.] Render, 'warn,' or, 'seriously admonish, by bearing witness of these truths.'

29. Μωϋσεία καὶ τοὺς προφῆτας.] Meaning the sacred books of the Jews in general (as infra xxiv. 27), including the Hagiography; all revealing, more or less clearly, the doctrine of a future life, and a state of rewards and punishments, and admonishing men to lead a life agreeable to the precepts therein contained.

30. οὐχί.] 'not so,' i. e. 'by no means;' 'they will not attend to them.'

— ἂν τις ἀπὸ νεκρῶν, &c.] Render, 'if one should go to them from the dead, they would repent;' q. d. Him they would surely listen to, since from him at least they would expect to hear the truth, because he could have no motive to deceive. So Artemid. Oneir. ii. 74, lays it down as an incontestable truth; τῶν ἀξιοπιστῶτων εἰσὶν οἱ νεκροὶ, ἐπεὶ πάντας ἀληθεύουσι.

31. εἰ Μωϋσείας, &c.] q. d. 'Occasions of repentance and newness of life are not wanting to them.' If, therefore, they will not embrace these, not even miracles could move their perverse and stubborn wills. And no wonder; for, as Mr. Greswell justly observes, if men violate their sense of duty under a sufficient degree of light, they will not be restrained from violating it under any degree of light; see John xii. 10, 11. See Doddridge and Campbell, and also the Discourses of Bp. Atterbury, vol. ii. Sermon 2; Bp. Sherlock, vol. ii. Sermon 15; and Dr. South, vol. i.

XVII. In this Chapter are recorded detached heads of discourses, as it should be of our Lord, delivered on various occasions most of them further enlarged on, or not stated by Luke, but more particularly on in Matthew's Gospel, and the other portions indicated in the margin.

1. ἀνένδεκτόν ἐστι] for οὐκ ἐνδέχεται occurs supra xiii. 33, and denotes what must happen from the condition of man; on Matt. xviii. 7. The τοῦ inserted ἐλθεῖν, from many MSS., Fathers, & Editions, by Matthæi, Griesbach, & Scholz, is probably genuine, being quite to the usage of St. Luke. And thus render literally, 'it is impossible for off to come.'

2. λυσιτελεῖ.] Supply μάλλον, as iii. 6, λυσιτελεῖς ἀποθανεῖν ἢ ζῆν. This expression is equivalent to κρείσσον ἐστι.

3. προσέχετε ἑαυτοῖς.] This may be either to what precedes, or to what follows; former view seems preferable, since this form of warning (like that elsewhere, δὲ ἀκούειν ἀκούετω) is most suitable to what just preceded. The δὲ, too, a little after seems to mark the transition to a new rather shows that the words belong to the former. I mean not to say that the form might not introduce an injunction; for times does, yet never with a δε after πρὸς which would here be so unsuitable that we find from the MSS., cancelled by some Critics (who joined the formula with the following), or changed to γὰρ. For the reason as the moderns would take the most harshly. It is strange they should see the force of the ἀνένδεκτον. The E might otherwise, indeed, have written οὐκ αὐτοῖς, as at Acts ix. 28.

On what follows comp. Levit. xix. 17. xvi. 9. Ecclus. xix. 13.

found in very many MSS., Versions, and Fathers, is cancelled by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Titman, Vater, and Scholz. Yet the evidence for it is so strong, that it is more probable the words were omitted by some overnice Critic, to remove what seemed an inelegant repetition, than that it should have been brought in to complete the sense. Such sort of tautology as this strengthens the sense, and is found in the best writers. The Editors have chiefly been induced to cancel the words, as thinking that the existence of two readings, ἐπὶ σέ and πρὸς σέ, showed that both were from the margin. But to that, as well as most other Critical canons, there are exceptions. And one is, where a phrase or clause is such as the Critics, from over-fastidiousness, would be likely to stumble at and alter. For, in such a case, there may be several ways by which the alleged imperfection might be removed, which may all be resorted to by the Critics. And yet that will not prove that the readings are all alike not genuine. Certainly, the existence of the words in the Pesch. Syr. Version attests their high antiquity. [Comp. Matt. xviii. 21.]

5. πρόσθες ἡμῖν πίστιν] lit., 'add the faith to us.' The exact sense here will depend upon the connection. The question is whether we are to consider this as standing with the preceding, or as an independent and detached narrative, like very many in this Gospel. Adopting the former view, we may suppose the increase of faith to have been entered for the purpose of comprehending the nature and extent of the duty of forgiveness enjoined in the preceding verse, or as if faith in the Divine mercy and truth was the only principle on which it could proceed; see Whitby and Scott. This, however, is so harsh, that it is better to suppose, with the most eminent Expositors, from Calvin to Kuinoel, that there is no connexion with the preceding, but rather with what is recorded at Matt. xvii. 19, 20, a connexion well laid down by Kuinoel.

6. συκαμίνῳ] i. e. the ficus sycomorus of Linnaeus; a tree found in Egypt and Palestine, and so called as resembling the fig-tree (συκῆ) in its fruit, and the wildberry (μωρία) in its leaf.

— ἐκριζώθητι καὶ φυτ. ἐν τῇ θαλάσσῃ.] A sort of proverbial mode of expressing a physical impossibility, and consequently not to be effected without a miracle. So Petronius, 134, cited by Wetstein, 'His ergo callens artibus Idæo frutices in gurgite sistam.'

7, 8. 'After having, in the preceding discourses, inculcated the necessity of good works, Christ now, by this example, intends to check that vaunting spirit which is so apt to accompany them, and teaches,' &c. (Euthym.)

8. τί] for ὅ τι, 'something whereon I may sup.'

— φάγεσαι καὶ πίεσαι.] These are second persons sing. Fut. Mid. for φάγῃ and πίῃ, according to the early usage (which, it seems, continued in the common dialect to a late period), whereby φάγομαι and πίομαι were used for φαγούμαι and πιοῦμαι, see Matthias, Gr. Gr. § 197. 1, and Buttm. Gr. Gr. p. 244. 'Ἄλλ' οὐχὶ ἐρεῖ is to be taken for καὶ ἔ. The doctrine contained in vv. 7, 10 is plainly this, that the rewards held out to Christians' obedience are not of merit, but purely of grace. On which see Dr. South's Sermon on Job xxii. 20, and Bp. Bull's Harm. p. 19.

9. αὐτῷ.] This, not found in nearly all the best MSS., and several Fathers and early Editions, is, with reason, cancelled by almost every Editor from Bengel to Scholz.

— οὐ δοκῶ.] In this phrase (as in the similar one οὐ φημι) the οὐ, though it is placed first, is meant to be taken last, and when thus used it has a strongly negative force, such as is suitable to indignation or sarcasm, and exactly corresponding to this is the phrase non puto in Latin. The force of the phrase, however, lies in the δοκῶ as well as the οὐ. So it is sometimes found without the οὐ, as Eurip. Hel. 917, δοκῶ μὲν, αἶ, verily.

10. δούλοι ἀχρεῖοι] i. e. we have done God no benefit, and consequently merit nothing; namely, for the reason subjoined, ὅτι ὃ ὠφείλομεν ποιῆσαι, πεποιθήκαμεν. (Supply μόνον.) And as Seneca says (Contr. ii. 13), 'non est beneficium, sed officium, facere quod debes.' The saying is not to be confined to the disciples, but extended to Christians in general.

11. διήρχετο διὰ μέσου Σ.] On the exact force of this expression Commentators are in doubt, since Samaria and Galilee appear to be mentioned in a manner the reverse of their geographical position. But it should rather seem that no notice is here meant to be taken of that position. And it is, I think, rightly supposed by Grotius, De Dieu, Wetstein, Campbell, and others, that our Lord did not proceed by the direct way (namely, through Samaria) to Jerusalem; but that, upon coming to the confines of Samaria and Galilee, he diverged to the East; so as to have Samaria on the right, and Galilee on the left. Thus he seems to have passed the Jordan at Scythopolis (where there was a bridge), and to have descended along the left bank, on the Persian side, until he again crossed the river, when he came opposite to Jericho. The reason which induced him to take this circuitous route, was probably to avoid any molestation from the Samaritans, and at the same time to impart to a greater number of Jews the benefits of his Gospel.

12. εἰσερχομένου αὐτοῦ] 'as he was entering,' i. e. about to enter. Πόρρωθεν. No doubt within the distance, whatever it was, (for on that the Rabbins are not agreed,) at which lepers were obliged to stand apart from others.

14. πορευθέντες ἐπιδείξατε τ. l.] This gracious direction contained (like the 'Go in peace') an implied assurance that they should be healed, with an equally implied condition that they had faith.

Τοῖς ἱερεῦσι is either to be taken in a collective sense; or rather, we may suppose the priests of both Jews and Samaritans, as each person belonged to one or the other nation. The reason for sending them to the priests was, that there might thus be a public attestation of the miracle, and that they might again be received into society. See Note on Matt. viii. 4.

18. ἀλλογενής.] Such the Samaritans were esteemed by the Jews; and Josephus calls them ἄλλοιθναῖς. That they were not heathens, was certain; but the Jews took advantage of some approach to idolatry, in the worship on Mount Gerizim, to regard them as in some measure Gentiles.

20. ἡ βασιλεία] 'the reign of God,' the Dispensation under the Messiah.

— μετὰ παρατηρήσεως.] The sense of this expression will depend upon the force assigned to παρατ. The word is rare; though four examples are adduced from the later writers, in which it means observation or attention. In, however, that signification is little suitable here, some recent Commentators render it splendour, pomp, parade; which, however, is rather an interpretation than a version. The term may better be taken to denote, by metonymy, what attracts observation, i. e. any thing whereby it may be observed, or its progress traced by observation. A sense very agreeable to the nature of the signification; but the reason just afterwards given for the assertion would seem to show that the meaning is (as Mr. Greswell explains) 'for being observed;' q. d. that what men expected should have nothing to distinguish it externally, or put it out to view when come.

21. ἰδοὺ ὡδε.] 'Lo it (i. e. the kingdom of God) is here or there.' The sense ἐντὸς οὗτοῦ will depend upon that assigned to παρατ. in the preceding sentence. If the first of the interpretations above stated be adopted, it will denote what is internal and unseen, as compared to what is distinguished by external characteristics—in of the heart and soul, and, in short, spiritual, as opposed to temporal. A sense, indeed, perfectly agreeable to what is elsewhere said in Scripture (see Rom. xiv. 17.), but little suitable to the present context, which requires us to take the words in the natural sense, for in the midst of;

29. ἔβριξε.] Supply Θεός, which is expressed in Gen. xix. 24. Πῦρ denotes lightning; and such is the proper signification of Θεῖον, i. e. divine fire. Thus places struck with lightning were said to be Θεῖα, and were separated from human use. Since, however, in such places there are (to use the words of Lucret. vi. 219.) 'inusta vapore Signa notæque, graves halantes sulphuris auras'; and since lightning has a sulphureous smell, hence the word is often used for sulphur, as here and in Apoc. xiv. 10. xix. 20. Therefore by πῦρ καὶ Θεῖον is meant a sulphureous fire, such as proceeds from lightning.

32. μνημ. τῆς γυν. Λῶτ.] See Gen. xix. 26.
 Whatever may be the view taken of the occurrence in question—whether Lot's wife was litte-rally turned to a pillar of salt, or, as many recent Commentators say, figuratively so, by being suffocated, and the corpse indurated by the malignigious vapour—the warning is equally forcible against the sin of disregarding these awful predictions, and moreover against a love of the world, or other carnal dispositions.

33. ὅς ἐστιν, &c.] Comp. supra ix. 24. Mark viii. 35. John xii. 25. and Matt. x. 39, where see Note. Here the application is somewhat different, referring to what precedes. This sense of ζωογονεῖν (namely, to preserve alive) is never found in the Classical writers; but it is not unfrequent in the Sept., and occurs also at Acts
 vii. 19.

36. This verse, not found in a great number of the best MSS., some Versions, and several early Editions, is cancelled by almost all recent Editors, as an interpolation from the passage of Matthew. But as it is found in not a few MSS., and almost every Version of antiquity and credit, it should rather seem to be genuine, and only omitted accidentally, propter homoeoteleuton.

37. ποῦ, Κύριε] scil. ταῦτα ἵσταται ὁ γενήσεται; i. e. 'where shall these calamitous events take place?' Or, the ποῦ, Κύριε, may simply be regarded as a form of craving information on both the matters which perplexed them. The answer returned was not direct, but only expressive of a general truth, probably proverbial (comp. Job xxxix. 30.); q. d. that where wickedness and impenitence are prevalent, shall these things take place; since instruments of destruction will never be wanting when the work of destruction is to be accomplished. Our Lord, indeed, we may suppose, was not, in all that he then said, understood at the time; but he was afterwards: and therefore these declarations partake of the nature of a prophecy—to be understood completely only by the event, and when fulfilled.

XVIII. The best Expositors are, with reason, agreed that the first eight verses of this Chapter, on the subject of perseverance in prayer, in the hope of success, form a continuation of the discourse in the last Chapter; as is clear from the resumption at v. 8. of the topic which formed the subject of Ch. xvii. 22. fin., the coming of the Son of Man. The purpose of the parable was, that the disciples might be excited to constant prayer, with an implicit reliance on the Divine aid, inasmuch as prayer, patience, and perseverance would be their best support under the trials and tribulations, which must precede the first advent of the Son of Man at the destruction of Jerusalem.

1. πρὸς τὸ δεῖν] i. e. 'respecting its being needful,' &c. See supra ix. 18. and Note. Of this sense of πρὸς (denoting scope) with verbs of speaking and writing, an example is adduced by Kypke from Plutarch. Πάντοτε signifies constantly, perseveringly. Ἐκκακεῖν signifies properly to abandon any thing from cowardice, sloth, or despondency (a military metaphor, on which see Note on 2 Cor. iv. 1.), but is here used of that intermission of regular duties, which arises from weariness or despondency.

2. τὸν Θεὸν—ἐντρέπόμενος.] A proverbial form, expressive of the most unblushing wickedness; of which examples are given by Elmer and Wetstein.

3. τις is absent from very many MSS., and cancelled by all the Critical Editors.

—ἐκδικήσων.] Render, 'Do me justice upon.'
 4. ἐπὶ χρόνον] scil. τινά; as Acts xxvii. 6.—εἰ καὶ, &c.] As the Indicative, not the Subjunctive, follows, there is implied the reality and actual existence of what is assumed (as in 2 Cor. iv. 16. xii. 11, 15. Phil. ii. 17. Col. i. 1. Heb. vi. 9.); q. d. 'Even though I do not see God, and do not regard man.'

5. εἰς τέλος.] An Hellenistic phrase (familiar on the Heb. תָּלֵם) instead of the Classical εἰς τέλος, and denoting perpetually, constantly. εἰς is used in a kindred passage of Herodot. ii. 119. ἡ δὲ γυνή—φοιτοῦσα ἐπὶ τὰς Σόρας βασιλῆος, κλαίῃσιν καὶ ἠδυνάσκουσιν ταῦτα διὰ δὲ τωυτό, τὸν Δαρεῖον ἵππῃσι ἐλπίσαι μιν.

Ὑποπιάζειν is properly a metonymic term. It signifies, 1. to bruise any one under the eye; 2. to bruise generally; 3. to stain any one by dining in his ears, and, figuratively, to weary any one. No certain example of this sense has been adduced from the Classical writers, but it is frequent in the correspondent Latin term obscure.

7. Ἀφὸρ ὁ Θεὸς must be supplied ὁ Θεὸς κριτὴς, as opposed to the κριτὴς τῆς ἀδικίας. Ποιῆσαι τὴν ἐκδίκησιν is for ἐκδικῆσαι. Τὸν ἐκλεκτῶν, i. e. his approved servants.

τῶν ἐκλεκτῶν αὐτοῦ τῶν βουόντων πρὸς αὐτὸν ἡμέρας καὶ νυκτός, καὶ μακροθυμῶν ἐπ' αὐτοῖς; ἔλεγω ὑμῖν ὅτι ποιήσει τὴν ἐκδίκησιν αὐτῶν ἐν τάχει. Πλὴν ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἔλθων ἄρα εὐρήσει τὴν πίστιν ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς;

Εἶπε δὲ καὶ πρὸς τινὰς τοὺς πεποιθότας ἐφ' ἑαυτοῖς ὅτι εἰσὶ δίκαιοι, καὶ ἐξουθενούντας τοὺς λοιποὺς, τὴν παραβολὴν ταύτην· Ἀνθρώποι δύο ἀνέβησαν εἰς τὸ ἱερόν προσεύξασθαι· ὁ εἰς Φαρισαῖος, καὶ ὁ ἕτερος τελώνης. ὁ Φαρισαῖος, σταθεῖς, πρὸς ἑαυτὸν ταῦτα προσηύχετο· Ὁ Θεός, εὐχαριστῶ have allusion to the almost universal apostacy from Christianity in the world, which (as we learn from the sure word of Scripture) will precede the final advent.

9. From the necessity of constant prayer, &c., our Lord now turns to the kindred duty of humility, placing before his hearers in the following parable (to use the words of Mr. Greswell) 'a fine moral example, levelled against three capital errors in practical religion, in each of man's threefold relations, to himself, his Maker, and his fellow-creatures: the want of sobriety of judgment in his estimation of himself,—an ignorance or dissimulation of his true moral position in respect to God,—and an equal injustice and uncharitableness in his estimate of others, whose situation in all moral respects is the same with his own.'

—πρὸς τινὰς τοὺς πεπ.]. Πρὸς here, as at v. 1, signifies concerning, or with reference to; a sense also occurring supra xii. 41. infra xix. 9, and sometimes in the Classical writers. Τὸν πεπειθ. ἐφ' ἑ., 'who were persuaded of themselves.' Comp. supra xvi. 15. Ἐξουθ. τοὺς λοιποὺς. Render, 'set at nought the rest [of men]'; fully expressed at v. 11.

10. ὁ εἰς Φαρισαῖος—τελώνης.]. These two persons may (as Mr. Greswell suggests) be considered, not as individuals, but as representatives of the two classes in question, Pharisees and Publicans. In the same point of view may the prayers of each be considered as a specimen of the prayers used by each class respectively.

11. πρὸς ἑαυτὸν.]. There has been some doubt whether this should be connected with σταθεῖς, in the sense apart, i. e. by himself; or with προσηύχετο. The latter mode may be considered preferable; the former proceeding on a confusion of πρὸς ἑαυτὸν with καθ' ἑαυτὸν. Πρὸς ἑαυτὸν can only denote 'apud se,' 'with himself,' and is not unfrequently joined with verbs of speaking or thinking; of which examples are adduced by the Commentators, both from the New Test. and the later Classical writers. Wetstein renders it secum tacitus; comparing the Horatian 'labra movet metuens audiri.' The illustration is better than the version; for it is not mental prayer that is here meant, but avert prayer, when the words are pronounced by the lips, but not so as to be heard by a by-stander. Comp. Aristen. Ep. i. 6. πρὸς ἑαυτὸν ἐφην. Σταθεῖς, considerens, (with which Valcknaer compares ιστάθην ἀφθογγος from Æschylus and Callimachus) has reference to the posture of prayer among the Jews, which was standing; inasmuch that it was not permitted to any but sovereigns to pray in any other posture.

—ὁ Θεός.]. Render, 'O God.'

11. ἀρπαγεις, ἄδικοι.] "Αρπαξ denotes one who injures another by force; ἄδικος, one who over-reaches him by fraud, or under a semblance of justice.

12. διὰ τοῦ σαββ.] Namely, on the second and fifth days of the week, as appears from Epiphanius and the Rabbins, cited by Wetstein. On the former, because Moses ascended Mount Sinai on those days; and on the latter, because he then descended on account of the worship paid to the golden calf. By these are to be understood, not public, but private and voluntary fasts. On ἀποδεκ. see Note at Matt. xxiii. 23.

— ὅσα κτῶμαι.] 'quæ mihi acquiro.'

13. μακρόθεν ἐστὼς.] Namely, in the court of the Gentiles, if he was a Gentile; or, if a Jew, placed far apart from the Pharisees.

— οὐκ ἤθελεν, &c.] 'could not bring himself to,' &c. See Robinson's Lexicon. Schoettgen and Wolf here notice it as a maxim of the Rabbins, that 'he who prays should cast down his eyes, but raise his heart to God;' contrary to the custom of the Greeks and Romans, which was to lift up the eyes and hands in prayer. Yet in this picture of real contrition and genuine humility we must suppose every thing unstudied. [See Jer. xxxi. 19.]

— ὁ Θεός, ἰλάσθητι, &c.] Render, 'O God, be merciful,' &c.; for ὁ Θεός is a Votive. So the Persic Translator rightly renders, 'O Deus.'

— ἰλάσθητι.] Render, 'be propitiated, or propitious to me.' The significancy and propriety of which expression is shown at large by Mr. Greswell, vol. iv. p. 317. sqq.

— μοι τῷ ἄμ.] Wetstein and others think that the Article here is emphatical, and used κατ' ἔφορον. But its force is better indicated by Bp. Middleton thus: 'Whenever an attributive noun is placed in opposition with a personal pronoun, such attributive has the Article prefixed. Thus in Luke vi. 24. ὑμῖν τοῖς πλουσίοις. xi. 46. ὑμῖν τοῖς νομίκοις. We have the same form of speech also in Herodot. ix. p. 342. μὲν τὴν ἰκτίων. Plut. Conv. vii. Sap. p. 95. ἐμὲ τὸν δύστηνον. See also Soph. Elect. 282. Eurip. Ion, 348. Aristoph. Av. 5. Acham. 1154. Eccles. 619. Of the usage in question the ground is sufficiently obvious. The Article here, as elsewhere, marks the assumption of its predicate; and the strict meaning of the publican's prayer is, "Have mercy on me, who am confessedly a sinner;" or, "seeing that I am a sinner, have mercy on me."

14. κατέβη εἰς τὸν οἶκον αὐτοῦ.] Said with reference to the lower situation of the city with respect to the Temple. So ver. 10. ἀνέβησαν. But in fact the expression is nearly equivalent to 'went back,' ἀπαχώρει, as in 'ἐξυπατάτερος ἀν' ὅσους εἶναι ὁ δεδικαιωμένος is meant 'consider consequently accepted and approved' iii. 20, where see Note, and Bp. I p. 23. Schoettgen notices it as saying among the Jews, that τὸ offered up sacrifices depart from justi.

— ἡ ἐκεῖνος.] Supply μᾶλλον, 26. δεδικαίωται Θάμαρ ἢ ἔγώ. may suppose that, as the Hebrews simple negation by a comparative sense is, that the Publican went but not the Pharisee.

For ἡ most of the MSS. and early Editions have ἡ γάρ, which Mill, and adopted by almost every Wetstein to Scholz. But though cult is usually to be considered reading, yet that principle does manifest violations of the propriety. And notwithstanding what those use of γάρ cannot be defended; pears from the vain attempts made For to render it sane, or nimium it as having reference to a clause inadmissible. And as ἡ γάρ derived from another reading (namely some MSS. and St. Basil), we may γάρ to be an error of the scribes in their originals. Whether, indeed true reading, I doubt. It seems very early correction of Luke's g gance of style would require ἡ γάρ. It may be added, too, that Version of credit represents ἡ γάρ. How παρ might be confused (especially by those who did not construction) is obvious from the between π and ς, and α and ε. ever, that of those who wrote γὰρ their originals παρ' ἐκεῖνον, with several very ancient MSS. and Version; and that παρ' had arisen. Then ἐκεῖνος would easily be altered. Thus it appears that the original from which arose ἡ γάρ, and ἡ one of the most certain of Criticism among several readings of a word from which all the rest might be dated, is to be preferred. Moreover than ἡ γάρ, is the true reading, is the former occurring in a simil supra xv. 7. sine var. lect.

This section is introduced here in a connection than it is in the Gospels and Mark. There it is brought forth as the narration of the inquiry made by us as to the lawfulness of divorce; and because it took place immediately Luke introduces it here, as intending things according to their subjects; and connection here is very suitable. On the Chapter see the Notes on the ages of Matthew and Mark. ἀπὸ τῶν 'the children,' i. e. their children. g. Matt. xviii. 3. 1 Cor. xiv. 20.

— ἀφῃκῆται πάντα.] MSS. A. and B. have ἀφῃκῆται τὰ ἴδια, and D. τὰ ἴδια ἀφῃκῆ. The former of which, Bornemann thinks, is the true reading: 1. because of the weight of testimony in its favour; 2. from the expression being 'aquisitior'; 3. because the common reading might have been formed after the model of Matt. xix. 27. Mark x. 28. Luke v. 11; whereas the other has nothing similar to it in Scripture. But the learned Critic is, I apprehend, quite wrong. The external testimony for the common reading is almost as strong as can be expected for any reading. All the MSS. (300 in number) except three, have it. And the internal evidence is, when properly considered, strongly in favour of the common reading. It is surely far more likely that in MSS. so notorious for being dressed up by Alexandrian Critics, a reading somewhat plain and homely should have been altered into one εὐαριστίοις Græcismi, than that a somewhat elegant reading should have been altered, all but universally, into a plain one. And as to what Bornemann urges, as gravissimum argumentum, that the common reading might be formed from other passages, while the new one has nothing like it in the Gospels,—it is hardly possible to imagine any argument more futile.

30. πολλαπλάσιον.] Render, 'many times more.' The word occurs in Pol. xxv. 4, 4, and Test. Patr. But the form πολλαπλάσιος is far more usual.

31. παραλαβὼν τ. δ.] Mark adds πάλιν, which must here be understood, in order to comprehend that sense; the term having reference to that feeling of awe (see Mark x. 32.) which had filled the disciples since the late awful transactions (the Transfiguration, &c.) had produced a temporary withdrawal from their Master's society. This could only be removed by our Lord himself, who kindly vouchsafed to again take them into his companionship; for that is what is implied in παραλαβὼν, and not 'into his confidence;' that being denoted by the κατ' ἰδίαν added by Matthew.

34. οὐδὲν τούτων συνῆκαν.] They understood the words, but not the things themselves, or how they could be reconciled with the prophecies. In fact, their prejudices, and their unwillingness to believe the things in question, obscured their understandings.

XIX. 1. διήρχετο] 'was passing through' (cf. Campbell and Wakefield, supported by the authority of the Syriac Version, and confirmed by a remark of Mr. Tate, in a letter to me; whereas he adds, that 'Luke, in the use of the tense, is remarkably, perhaps uniformly, correct. Thus, for instance, whenever he uses the expression ἐπορεύθη, we may be sure that something took place in the meanwhile, and on the way, which would not have been so if ἐπορεύθη had been used.' On this force of the Aor. see Win. Gr. Gr. § 32. 2. a. 1.

— ὀνόματι καλ. Ζακ.] Some ancient MSS. and Versions are without καλ., which Mill and other Critics think ought to be cancelled; but wrongly. There is little doubt that the omission arises merely from certain Critics who considered καλ. as unnecessary and better away; not aware that such vestiges of the wordiness of early philology are found in the best Greek MSS. Thus, for instance, Soph. Phil. 605, ἀνὰρ ἀρχιτεμάχῃ τοῦ Ἑλίου, and Ennius in his Med. quod nunc nominatur nomine Argo.

Isaens. Synop. That Zacchæus was a Jew, and not, as some have imagined, a Gentile, is pretty plain from v. 9, and from his name, which is Hebrew. The occurrence of οὗτος after αὐτός may seem harsh; but examples from the Classical writers are adduced by Bornemann. It will, indeed, appear less so, if we consider the words καὶ οὗτος ἦν πλούσιος as in some measure a parenthetical clause. Render, 'and the man was rich.'

3. ἰδεῖν—τίς ἐστί] lit. 'to see what sort of a person Jesus is,' for ἰδεῖν τίς ἐστίν ὁ Ἰ. On which idiom see Matth. Gr. Gr. § 295. 3. Τίς is ὁ ὅστις or ποῖος. The use of ἀπὸ before τοῦ ὄχλου is Hellenistic, and formed on the Heb. מִן הָעָם .

4. προδραμὼν ἔμπροσθεν.] Similar pleonasm is adduced by Commentators from the Classical writers. Yet it may be doubted whether there is here, strictly speaking, a pleonasm at all. There is almost always an intensity of sense. Render, 'running forwards and getting before.'

—συκομῶριαν.] The name of a tree, so called in Sp-mulberry as having the leaves of the mulberry, and the fruit of a fig, though indigestible. It is found in Egypt and the level parts of Syria.

This mode of viewing any object was not uncommon, inasmuch that it gave rise to a proverbial expression. Thus Libanius: οὐδὲ κοινοῦ τῶν παρατάξιων—οὐτὰς ὡς στρατηγός, ὅτι ὡς στρατιώτης· ἀλλ' οὐδὲ ἀπὸ δένδρου οὐδὲ ἐν φέλλῳ τὴν θείαν ἡγέγκα ἀν.

—κατέβη.] Supply δεοῦ, and indeed διὰ, which, though it be found in the common text, is in very many MSS., yet has no place in most of the ancient MSS., and is cancelled by almost every recent Editor. This ellipsis, however, as well as the similar one at v. 19, is so harsh, that Bornemann thinks there can be little doubt but that the true reading there is ποίε and here κάβη.

5. εἶδεν αὐτόν, &c.] The best Commentators with reason agreed in referring our Lord's knowledge of the name and circumstances of persons to his Divine omniscience.

—ἁμαρτωλῷ] i. e. who by his occupation just be presumed to be such; and who, indeed, seems, from the subsequent transaction, to have been rapacious and unjust.

—καταλύσαι.] See Note on Luke ix. 12.

8. σταθείς.] Render, adstant, or subsistens, or quum constitisset.

—εἰ τινὸς τι ἐσυκοφ.] 'whatsoever I may have wronged any one of by false information.' A sense of εἰ τις occurring also at Phil. iv. 8, 2 Thess. iii. 10, and al. On the word ἐσυκ. see Note supra iii. 14.

—ἀποδίδωμι.] This may be taken, according to Grotius, Wetstein, Campbell, and Whitby, as Present for Future, to denote purpose. But it is better to suppose (with Euthymius, Theophylact, and Vater) that the sense is, 'I do (hereby) give and restore;' agreeably to which Christ says, 'This day is salvation come unto thee and thy family,' &c. Comp. John iv. 53. Acts x. 2, and the Note on Matt. xxviii. 19.

9. εἶπε δὲ πρὸς α.] The πρὸς is by the best Commentators, from Grotius downwards, rendered concerning. But though that signification does occur, yet never, I think, after the phrase εἶπε δὲ. And although Zacchæus is just after spoken of in the third person, yet we have only to suppose that the latter clause was addressed to the by-standers, and the former to Zacchæus, whose declaration required some reply. I have pointed accordingly. At any rate we may suppose that our Lord's answer was so worded, as that, though directed to Zacchæus, it might also apply to the by-standers; who, indeed, seem alluded to in the reproach implied in the words καθότι, &c. q. d. 'inasmuch as he too, who through his sins was unworthy of being called a son of Abraham, has now, by penitence and faith in me, been restored to his birth-right with God, nay, reckoned a true Israelite (see Rom. ii. 28) and a genuine son of the father of the faithful, Rom. iii. 11.

Αὐτός is taken by Valcknaer and Bornemann in a sense found in the Classical writers, by which it designates the master of the family in contradistinction to the other members of it. But the above idiom, it must be observed, was confined to the earlier Atticism, and is in its character little suitable to the simplicity of Scriptural phraseology. Nay, as appears from the examples adduced by the Critics referred to by Valcknaer, τῷ οἴκῳ τούτῳ ἐγένετο· καθύτι καὶ αὐτὸς υἱὸς Ἀβραάμ ἐστίν. ἦλθε γὰρ ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ζητῆσαι καὶ σῶσαι τὸ ἀπολωλός.

it was almost confined to the months of shares, and the dregs of the people.

By οἶκος is meant the family, including the master of it, by whose example and precepts all its members would be brought into the way of salvation (see Acts x. 2).

11. προσθεὶς εἶπε.] Meaning, by Hebraism, 'he went on to speak.' At δοκεῖν repeat τὸ a little before, and render, 'were supposing.' (Comp. Acts i. 6.)

Our Lord's words just before declared his Messiahship, and the Apostles, no doubt, supposed them to imply his speedy entrance upon his reign and assumption of the character of liberator of the Jewish nation. This erroneous opinion Jesus corrects in the following parable, on which the Notes at Matt. xxv. 14, seqq. may with advantage be consulted, since the two parables are very similar, though not the same, and, in some respects, different in design.

12. εὐγενής.] So said with reference to Christ's dignity, as born Son of Man, see Matt. ii. 2. [Comp. Mark xiii. 34.]

— λαβεῖν ἐαυτῷ βασ.] i. e. to receive institution to a kingdom, procure for himself royalty, as was the case with Archelaus, whom it is supposed our Lord had here in view; see Josephus, Ant. xvii. 11. Bell. ii. 6.

— καὶ ὑποστρέψαι.] 'and [then] to return.' So Josephus, Ant. xviii. 6. 10, ἡξίου συγχώρησιν αὐτῷ γινώσθαι πλείυσαντι τὴν τε ἀρχὴν καταστήσασθαι, καὶ ἐπανίναι. [Comp. Acts i. 11.]

13. δέκα δούλους &c.] 'ten of his servants,' a round number. Πραγματεύσασθε. The word signifies literally, 'to be engaged in business,' but here it is used as a deponent, in the sense 'to do business with [by investment in trade].'

15. ἵνα γνῷ τίς τί, &c.] Literally, 'that he might know who had gained what,' i. e. who had gained, and what he had gained. (Robinson's Lexicon.) Here, however, I would read τις τίς, taking the word, not as a pron. interrogative (he quis), but indefinite.

16. προσεργάσατο.] In this use there is the same metaphor as that by which we say to make money, viz. by investment in trade. Money so employed was said to be ἐνεργεῖν; while what was allowed to lie dormant was said to be ἀργεῖν.

17. ἴσθι ἐξουσίαν ἔχων.] Equivalent to ἴσθι σε ἔχειν, 'scias te habere,' 'know that thou hast,' &c.; for, according to a certain idiom (on which see Matthiam. Gr. Gr. § 559), peculiar to verbs of knowing, &c., is added a Nom. of the participle for an Infinitive preceded by a personal. So Æschyl. Ag. 1660, ἴσθι δάσκειν. Soph. El. 298, ἴσθι τίς σου. Aj. 1174, ἴσθι τιμωρῆσθαι. It is not, however, in the present passage and those above quoted, a mere circumlocution, but conveys a stronger sense than the verb would.

— ἐπάνω.] This sense of the word, as denoting authority over, is rare in the classical writers, and almost confined to the later ones. We have here an allusion to the ancient Oriental custom of assigning the government and revenues of a certain number of cities to a meritorious officer as the reward of his services. On which see my Note on Thucyd. i. 138. Transl. [Comp. supra xvi. 10.]

20. σουδαρίῳ.] The word is of Latin origin, ἄνθρωπος αὐστηρὸς εἶ· αἶρης ὁ οὐκ ἔθηκας, καὶ θερίζεις 22 ὁ οὐκ ἔσπειρας. Λέγει δὲ αὐτῷ· Ἐκ τοῦ στόματός σου κρινῶ σε, πονηρὲ δούλε· Ἥιδεις ὅτι ἐγὼ ἄνθρωπος αὐστηρὸς 23 εἰμι, αἶρων ὁ οὐκ ἔθηκα, καὶ θερίζων ὁ οὐκ ἔσπειρα· καὶ διατὶ οὐκ ἔδωκας τὸ ἀργύριόν μου ἐπὶ [τὴν] τράπεζαν, 24 καὶ ἐγὼ ἐλθὼν σὺν τόκῳ ἂν ἔπραξα αὐτό; Καὶ τοῖς παρωτώσιν εἶπεν· Ἀρατε ἀπ' αὐτοῦ τὴν μνᾶν, καὶ δότε τῷ 25 τὰς δέκα μνᾶς ἔχοντι· (Καὶ εἶπον αὐτῷ· Κύριε, ἔχει δέκα 26 μνᾶς.) λέγω γὰρ ὑμῖν, ὅτι παντὶ τῷ ἔχοντι δοθήσεται· ἀπὸ 27 δὲ τοῦ μὴ ἔχοντος, καὶ ὁ ἔχει ἀρθήσεται ἀπ' αὐτοῦ. Πλὴν τοὺς ἐχθροὺς μου ἐκείνους, τοὺς μὴ θελήσαντάς με βασιλεῦσαι ἐπ' αὐτούς, ἀγάγετε ὧδε καὶ κατασφάζετε ἐμπροσθέν μου.

and denotes such a cloth as was, among the ancients, generally used as a kerchief, but sometimes as a napkin. And from the Rabbinical writers it appears that such cloths were sometimes used to wrap money in and lay it by.

21. αὐστηρὸς.] The word signifies, 1. (as applied to feeling) dry, harsh; 2. (as applied to the taste) sour and crabbed. In a metaphorical sense it signifies severe and cynical; or, in another view, hard and gripping, which is the sense here and at 2 Macc. xiv. 30. Dio Chrys. Orat. 12. p.
 337, ἀστέρα αὐστηρόν. So Hor. Ep. i. 7. 31, Durus—nimis attentusque videris Easē mihi.

—αἶρης ὁ οὐκ ἔθηκας.] This is exegetical of the preceding; and, like that in Matt. xxv. 24, seems to have been a proverbial mode of expression, to denote a grasping disposition. It is based on that sense of αἶρω whereby it denotes, not simply to raise from the ground, but (like the Eng. to lift, to lift, and our old English to lift) to lift properly (in the Middle voice only) to lift up and off; but was also used figuratively of appropriating any thing lost without enquiring of the owner. Hence it well designates that grasping spirit which exacts from others what it does not give to others, as in the case of a slave-master, who requires that personal service of his slave which he does not give him the power to render. In the application it well represents the usage of the murmuring sinner against God, demanding more of man than he has given him power to perform; see Rom. ix. 19, 20.

22. [Comp. Matt. xii. 37. Job xv. 6. 2 Sam.

—ἰδεις ὅτι ἐγὼ, &c.] This (as Mr. Greswell surmises) "is an exquisite specimen of irony and flattery at the same time. It meets and exposes the plea on the proper principle of the argumen-tum ad absurdum, and the argumentum ad homi-nem, both; admitting apparently the truth of his misdeeds, yet showing that even on his own assumptions they led to a conclusion condemning of himself."

24. τράπεζα.] The word denotes, 1. a table;
 2. a money-table or counter, on which the moneychangers did their business. But as those counters were, no doubt, provided with tills for the deposit of money, so τράπεζα came to mean, 3. a place where the investment of money; just as our bank, derived from banca, originally only denoted a shop.

Many MSS. and Editions have not the Article, which is cancelled by Matthæi. But there is no proof that the phrase had become so common, that the Article, which is properly requisite, could be dispensed with.

—ἔπραξα.] This sense of πράσσω for exigere is found also in the Classical writers, but generally in the middle voice. Yet Thucyd. i. 99, has ἀκριβῶς ἔπρασσον.

Mr. Greswell has shown at large that the accessions which should have been made to the trust, under such circumstances, would be as liable to be claimed by the original owner, as the trust itself; and the mere non-use of his trust, according to his intentions, would be as much a violation of his rights, and as contrary to his wish, as its positive abuse in any conceivable way.

26. Commentators are not agreed whether these are the words of our Lord, or of the King.
 According to the former view they may be supposed to be a parenthetical admonition to the disciples. This, however, would be very harsh, and make what is introduced in the next verse still more so. The latter interpretation is, therefore, preferable, especially as being required by the parallel passage of Matthew.

There is a greater difficulty connected with ver.
 25; which, though it be diminished, is not removed, by placing the words in a parenthesis;
 nor does any one of the various modes of handling them seem satisfactory. I would suggest that the difficulty may be obviated by supposing that the insertion was interposed to express, by the by, the comparatively unimportant fact, that while the king was pronouncing the words ἀρατε ἀπ' αὐτοῦ τὴν μνᾶν, καὶ δότε τῷ τὰς δέκα μνᾶς ἔχοντι, the by-standers made the brief demur couched in κύριε, ἔχει δέκα μνᾶς; and that the abruptness discernible in what is subjoined, is meant to represent graphically the mode with which he dealt with the demurrer; namely, by passing it over unnoticed, smothering, as it were, the objection by inculcating the great maxim of morals (also occurring at Matt. viii. 12. Mark iv.
 25, supra viii. 18), on which his determination was founded, and which would form its sufficient justification. The rule of the distribution being, that he who had most of its proper reward already, should receive the greatest share of the residuum and extra reward also.

27. ἀγάγετε ὧδε καὶ κατασφ.] A custom derived from the barbarous ages; but, as appears from the Classical citations in Wetstein, long retained among the most civilized nations of antiquity. It has always been in use in the East, see 1 Sam. xv. 33; that having ever been the seat of peculiar atrocity in the punishment of criminals, and the treatment of captured enemies.

28. [Comp. Mark x. 32. John xi. 55. 57. xii. 1.]

33. οἱ κύριοι αὐτοῦ.] Meaning, those who had a power over it by having the care of it; namely, the servants of the owner.

35. [Comp. John xii. 14. 2 Kings ix. 13.]

38. [Comp. Ps. cxviii. 26. supra ii. 14.]

40. οἱ λίθοι κεκράζονται.] Said to be a proverbial and hyperbolical form of expression, to denote that it is a moral impossibility for a thing to be otherwise than it is. Here, however, it is meant, that if those should be checked, God would even, miraculously, animate the very stones to celebrate his triumph. Of the examples adduced of this mode of expression the most apposite are the following: Hab. ii. 11, 'The stone shall cry out of the wall, and the beam shall answer it' (meaning, that even if men should be silent, the very stones would exclaim): Pindar ap. Suid. in ν. ἀπαρρήξαι says, Οὐκ, εἰ σιωπήσαιμεν, οἱ λίθοι τάχα Φωνὰν ἀπαρρήξουσι, τῶν πεπραγμένων. I would add, Ἐκκλησί. Agam. 36, οἶκος δ' αὐτὸς, εἰ φθογγὴν λίθου, Σαφίστατ' ἀν' ἰδέσκειν. Josephus, Bell. i. 10. 2, περὶ τῆς εὐνοίας—οὐκ ἔφη δεῖν αὐτῷ καταγίνειν γὰρ τὸ σῶμα (his body), σιωπῶντων, scil. αὐτοῦ, 'if he should be silent.'

41. [Comp. Jer. ix. 1. xiii. 17.]

42. εἰ ἔγνω.] On the force of this mode of expression a difference of opinion exists. Some take εἰ for εἴθε, 'would that thou hadst considered!' a use occasionally found in the Scriptural and Classical writers. Others, more properly, suppose an ellipsis, per apostrophen, of εἰ δὲ ἔγνῃ, or such like; such apostrophes being frequent in language dictated by grief or strong emotion. Render, 'if thou hadst but known.' The pathos is here increased by the high emphasis in καὶ σὺ, q. d. even thou, the metropolis of the country to which I was especially sent. Καὶ γὰρ καὶ is rendered, 'et quidem.'

— ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ σου ταύτῃ.] Meaning, the present time, though so late, the emphasis τῇ ἐπισκοπῇ intended to lead them to repentance. Wetstein appositely cites Polyb. xvii. 16, βασιλεῖς, φαύγουσιν οἱ πολέμοι· μὴ παρῆναι τὸν καιρὸν οὐ μένουσιν ἡμᾶς οἱ βάρβαροι· σὴ νῦν ἡμεῖς ἡμεῖς, σὸς δὲ καιρὸς. Seneca Med. 1017. Non — τὸν δὲ ἐκρύβη, &c.] Meaning, 'But now when inexcusable ignorance) thou rejectest the proffered thee; and therefore perish thou must.' 43. ἤξουσιν ἡμέραι, &c.] 'for days will come unto thee,' ἐπὶ σοί, as it is said, Gen. xlii.

ἢ τίς ἐστίν ὁ δούς σοι ταῦτα πάντα. Here is a manifest prediction, and, in some sense, description (with which comp. Is. xxix. 4 Jer. vi. 3. 6) of the siege of Jerusalem; as it appears by referring to Josephus, Bell. v. 6. 3 ix. 1. 11. 1. 5, which passages illustrate the words—the χάρακα περιβ.

— χάρακα] 'a bank or rampart.' So called from the χάρακας, or strong poles, which were run down to preserve the asper, or mound of earth, in due form; see Thucyd. ii. 75. 2. So we see in Polyb. v. 2. 5, χάρακα τῇ παρεμβολῇ περιβαλον. The next term περικυκλώσουσι means the effectual blockade of the city by the building of a wall, which could not be burnt as a χάραξ had been.

καὶ ἐδαφιοῦσί σε καὶ τὰ τέκνα σου ἐν σοί.] In best Commentators are agreed that there is no ἀπώλειαν, of demolishing the buildings, and driving the inhabitants, especially the children, from the stones. Both these senses of ἰδαφ. are in use, and both here seem to be intended. The present passage, comp. 1 Kings ix. 7, 8. 2 Es. 12. Matt. xxiv. 1, 2. Mark xlii. 2.

— τὸν καιρὸν τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς σου.] Some difference of opinion exists as to the import of ἐπισκοπή, which, as being a word of middle signification, admits both of a good and a bad sense. The latter is assigned by some; but the former (meaning the day or time mentioned at ver. 42) seems the more apposite, comp. supra i. 68. 78. In this sense the word occurs in Job x. 12. So also 2 Cor. vi. 2, καιρὸς ἀντιπρόσδρακτος, ἡμέρα σωτηρίας.

48. ὁ λαός.] Called in the passage of Mark, ὁ δῆλος.

— ἐξεκρέματο αὐτοῦ ἀκ.] 'hung on his words,' i. e. heard him with deep interest. Of this sense of ἐκρεμάσθαι and the Latin pendere, examples are adduced by the Commentators, of which the most apposite are Eunapius in Ædicio, ἐκκρέματο τῶν λόγων; Themist., Τριβωνίου ἐκκρέμαντο; Virg. Æn. iv. 79, pendetque iterum narrantis ab ore.

XX. 3. εἰπάτε μοι· Τὸ β., &c.] i. e. 'tell me this: Was the baptism of, &c. and (as is implied) I will answer your question; or, as Matthew and Mark express it, I will tell you by what authority I do these things.'

21. 11. ἀνθρώπων, πᾶς ὁ λαὸς καταλιθάσει ἡμᾶς· πεπεισμένος γάρ
 27 ἔστιν Ἰωάννην προφήτην εἶναι. Καὶ ἀπεκρίθησαν μὴ εἶδέναι· 33 πόθεν. Καὶ ὁ Ἰησοῦς εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Οὐδὲ ἐγὼ λέγω ὑμῖν· ἐν ποίᾳ ἐξουσίᾳ ταῦτα ποιῶ.
 Ἦρξατο δὲ πρὸς τὸν λαὸν λέγειν τὴν παραβολὴν ταύτην· 9
 Ἀνθρωπὸς [τις] ἐφύτευεν ἀμπελῶνα, καὶ ἐξέδοτο αὐτὸν
 12. γεωργοῖς· καὶ ἀπεδήμησε χρόνους ἱκανοὺς. Καὶ ἐν καιρῷ 10
 34 2 ἀπέστειλε πρὸς τοὺς γεωργοὺς δούλον, ἵνα ἀπὸ τοῦ καρποῦ
 35 3 τοῦ ἀμπελῶνος δώσιν αὐτῷ. Οἱ δὲ γεωργοὶ δείραντες αὐτὸν 36 4 ἐξαπέστειλαν κενόν. Καὶ προσέθετο πέμψαι ἕτερον δούλον· 11
 οἱ δὲ κάκεινον, δείραντες καὶ ἀτιμάσαντες, ἐξαπέστειλαν 5 κενόν. Καὶ προσέθετο πέμψαι τρίτον· οἱ δὲ καὶ τοῦτον 12 τραυματίσαντες ἐξέβαλον. Εἶπε δὲ ὁ κύριος τοῦ ἀμπελῶνος· 13
 37 6 Τί ποιήσω; πέμψω τὸν υἱόν μου τὸν ἀγαπητόν· ἵσως 38 7 τοῦτον ἰδόντες ἐντραπήσονται. Ἰδόντες δὲ αὐτὸν οἱ γεωργοὶ, 14 διελογίζοντο πρὸς ἑαυτοὺς, λέγοντες· Οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ κληρο-39 8 νομία. Καὶ ἐκβαλόντες αὐτὸν ἔξω τοῦ ἀμπελῶνος ἀπέ- 15
 40 9 κτειναν. Τί οὖν ποιήσει αὐτοῖς ὁ κύριος τοῦ ἀμπελῶνος;
 41 ἐλεύσεται καὶ ἀπολέσει τοὺς γεωργοὺς τούτους, καὶ δώσει 16
 τὸν ἀμπελῶνα ἄλλοις. Ἀκουσαντες δὲ εἶπον· Μὴ γένοιτο!
 42 10 Ὁ δὲ ἐμβλέψας αὐτοῖς εἶπε· Τί οὖν ἐστὶ τὸ γεγραμμένον 17
 τοῦτο· Λίθον ὃν ἀπεδοκίμασαν οἱ οἰκοδομοῦντες, 44 οὗτος ἐγενήθη εἰς κεφαλὴν γωνίας; Πᾶς ὁ πσιὼν 18
 ἐπ' ἐκείνον τὸν λίθον συνθλασθήσεται· ἐφ' ὃν δ' ἂν πίσῃ, 45 12 λικμήσει αὐτόν. Καὶ ἐζήτησαν οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς καὶ οἱ γραμ- 19 46 ματεῖς ἐπιβαλεῖν ἐπ' αὐτόν τὰς χεῖρας ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ ᾠρᾷ, καὶ ἐφοβήθησαν τὸν λαόν· ἔγνωσαν γὰρ ὅτι πρὸς αὐτοὺς τὴν παραβολὴν ταύτην εἶπε.

6. καταλιθάσει ἡμᾶς.] The Priests had themselves accustomed the people to that violence. When they could not legally convict their enemies, they invited the populace to stone them, by what was called the judicium zeli; see John x. 31. Acts xiv. 19. (Grotius.) Stoning was indeed enjoined in the Law of Moses as the punishment of idolatry, blasphemy, and other heinous offences; and its execution was committed to the people at large. Yet it appears from Exod. viii. 26, that such sort of irregular and tumultuary vengeance was in use before the Law. Nor was this confined to the Jews; for we find allusion to it in Hom. II. γ. 26, and Thucyd. v. 60. See also Josephus, Ant. xvi. 7. 5.

9. [Comp. Is. v. 1. Jer. ii. 21. xii. 10.]
 11. προσέθετο πέμψαι] for πάλιν ἐπέμψαι at Mark xii. 4. This expression (as also that at xix. 11, προσθεὶς εἶπε) is an Hellenistic idiom formed on the Hebrew, and found in Gen. viii. 21. xviii. 29. Render, 'he proceeded to say.'

13. ἴσως.] To the usual sense perhaps it is objected by Pearce, Campbell, and Schleiermacher, that this can have no place here, since the truth of truth could be under no doubt. Hence they would render it certainly, adducing examples of that sense from the Sept. and the Classical writers, and referring to several Notes of Critica. But the difficulty started is perhaps imaginary; for the term occurs in a parable, and thus may be supposed to be used per anthropopatheism, and to keep up the verisimilitude of the story. If this be not admitted, the ἴσως may (as fortasse in Latin) be taken for ojmai.

14. [Comp. Pa. ii. 1. 8. Gen. xxxvii. 18. Mat. xxvi. 3. John xi. 53. Heb. i. 2.]

17. [See Pa. cxviii. 22. Is. viii. 14. xxviii. 16. 1 Pet. ii. 4. 7.] On the syntax see Note on Luke i. 73.

18. See Dan. ii. 34, 35. Is. viii. 14, 15. Zech. xii. 3.

19. ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ ᾠρᾷ] 'at that very time.' The words are very significant, having reference to the attempts made to take him just after by the same persons. [Comp. supra xix. 47. Mark xi. 18.]

Καὶ παρατηρήσαντες, ἀπέστειλαν ἐγκαθέτους, ὑποκρι-νομένους ἑαυτοὺς δικαίους εἶναι· ἵνα ἐπιλάβωνται αὐτοῦ

 23 ἔξεστιν ἡμῖν Καίσαρι φόρον δοῦναι, ἢ οὐ; Κατανοήσας δὲ αὐτῶν τὴν πανουργίαν, εἶπε πρὸς αὐτούς· Τί με πειράζετε; ἐπιδείξατέ μοι δηνάριον. Τίνος ἔχει εἰκόνα καὶ ἐπιγραφήν;
 ἀποκριθέντες δὲ εἶπον· Καίσαρος. Ὁ δὲ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς·

 Προσελθόντες δὲ τινες τῶν Σαδδουκαίων—οἱ ἀντιλέ-γοντες ἀνάστασιν μὴ εἶναι—ἐπηρώτησαν αὐτὸν, λέγοντες· Διδάσκαλε, Μωϋσῆς ἔγραψεν ἡμῖν· εἴαν τίνος ἀδελφός ἀπο-θάνῃ ἔχων γυναῖκα, καὶ οὗτος ἄτεκνος ἀποθάνῃ, ἵνα λάβῃ ὁ ἀδελφός αὐτοῦ τὴν γυναῖκα, καὶ ἐξαναστήσῃ σπέρμα τῷ ἀδελφῷ αὐτοῦ. Ἑπτὰ οὖν ἀδελφοὶ ἦσαν· καὶ ὁ πρῶτος, λαβὼν γυναῖκα, ἀπέθανεν ἄτεκνος· καὶ ἔλαβεν ὁ δεύτερος τὴν γυναῖκα, καὶ οὗτος ἀπέθανεν ἄτεκνος· καὶ ὁ τρίτος ἔλαβεν αὐτὴν, ὡσαύτως δὲ καὶ οἱ ἑπτὰ· [καὶ] οὐ κατέλιπον τέκνα, καὶ ἀπέθανον· ὕστερον δὲ πάντων ἀπέθανε καὶ ἡ γυνή.
 Ἐν τῇ οὖν ἀναστάσει, τίνος αὐτῶν γίνεται γυνή; οἱ γὰρ ἑπτὰ ἔσχον αὐτὴν γυναῖκα. Καὶ ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπεν αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου γαμοῦσι καὶ ἐκγαμί-

20. παρατηρήσαντες.] Commentators here miss an ellipsis of αὐτόν, expressed at xiv. 1. In ellipsis, however, is not a little harsh; and should prefer καιρὸν, opportunity, as in Thucyd. ii. 7, μέλιστα δὲ ἐτήρουσεν ἀνέμῳ καταφύσει. Aristot. Rhet. lib. ii. ἐξαγγελτικοὶ δὲ τὴν φηκμήνοι, διὰ τὸ παρατηρεῖν, οἱ τε πάλαιοι. Sasanna, v. 12, καὶ παρατηροῦσαν τὸ παρατηρεῖν) φιλοτίμως καθ' ἡμέραν ὁρᾷ τὴν.

—ἐγκαθέτους.] Ἐγκαθέτος properly denotes one who is stationed in a lurking-place, to catch another's motions, either for attacking him otherwise; and, in a metaphorical sense, one who is a spy, whether of words or actions.

—δικαίους] i. e. men of probity and integrity, were only actuated by motives of conscience, and the desire of being taught in the questions they had to propound.

—ἐπιλάβωνται] i. e. 'might lay hold of and seize'; synonymous with παγιδεύειν and ἔλαβεν in the passages of Matthew and Mark; so arripere in Latin.

[λαμβάνεις πρόσωπον.] A phrase frequent in Sept., formed on the Heb. לפני פנים, and signifying 'to show partiality to any one.' In the passages of Matthew and Mark we have βλάπτεις εἰς πρόσωπον.

23. κατανοήσας τὴν πανουργίαν.] Two MSS. have ἐπιγνοὺς τὴν πανουργίαν; evidently from emendation. But though the first expression is the more elegant, the second is not the less proper. So Xenoph. Anab. vii. 5. 11, ὁ δὲ γινούσας τοῦ ἡ. τὴν πανουργίαν.

27. οἱ ἀντιλέγοντες ἀνάστ. μὴ εἶναι.] On this idiom, by which verbs containing denial add μὴ to the Infinitive, see Matthias, Gr. Gr. § 533, Obs. 4. [Comp. Acts xxiii. 6. 8.]

28. [See Deut. xxv. 5.]

31. καὶ οὐ κατέλιπον—ἀπέθανον.] Many MSS. and some Editions have not the καὶ before οὐ, which is cancelled by almost all the recent Editors; rashly, I think; for it seems to have been thrown out by the early Critics to avoid the too frequent repetition of the word. Perhaps, too, they stumbled at the Προέχοντος, and endeavoured to soften it; forgetting that (as Bornemann observes) the primary sentiment is, rightly, placed before the secondary, as at ver. 28, and John xv. 6.

 41 XXI. ἈΝΑΒΛΕΨΑΣ δὲ εἶδε τοὺς βάλλοντας τὰ δῶρα 1

35. οἱ καταξιώθιντες—τυχεῖν.] Compare Æschyl. Prom. 247, Σηητοὺς δ' ἐν οἴκῳ προθέμενος, τούτου τυχεῖν οὐκ-ἡξιώθη αὐτός: where ἀξιώω is for καταξιώω, as in Pind. Nem. x. 73.

36. οὔτε γὰρ ἀποθανεῖν, &c.] I would compare Artemid. iii. 13, ἀθάνατοι οἱ ἀποθανόντες, ἐπεὶ μηκέτι τεθνήσκοντες. By this our Lord meant to impugn the Pharisaical notion of a metempsychosis; see 1 John iii. 2.

For οὔτε propriety requires οὐδέ, which is indeed found in some of the ancient MSS.; for another οὔτε after two just preceding would be not a little harsh. And I know not a single instance of οὔτε occurring thrice. Xenoph. Mem. iv. 3. 14, seems, indeed, to present one; but I doubt not that the true reading there is, ὁρᾶται δ' οὐτ' ἐκίων, οὐδέ (ne quidem) κατασκήψας, οὐτά ἄκίων. And so here οὐδέ may be read. The same error was committed by the scribes at 1 Cor. iii. 2, where the common reading is ἀλλ' οὔτε ἐτι νῦν δύνασθε. But there the best MSS. and several Fathers have οὐδέ, which has been received by the later Editors, including Scholz.

—ἰσάγγελοι.] Commentators are agreed that since ἰσάγγελος is formed after the model of ἰσόθεος, it should be rendered, not equal to the angels, but like unto the angels, namely, in respect of immortality and the nature of their bodies; as in Matt. xxii. 30, ὡς ἄγγελοι. The word is very rare; but one example has been adduced from

 δαίμονας καὶ ἰσαγγέλους*. The angels are called sons of God, on account of their participation in the Divine felicity and glory, as by υἱοὶ τῆς ἀναστάσεως are denoted those who are partakers in the resurrection. On which sense of υἱός see Notes on Matt. viii. 12. xi. 19.

37. [See Exod. iii. 6. Acts vii. 32. Heb. i. 16.]

40. οὐκίτι δὲ ἐτόλμων, &c.] These words, as appears from the passage of Matthew, ought rather to have been brought in after ver. 44.

41. πῶς λέγουσι, &c.] scil. οἱ γραμματεῖς.

43. [See Ps. cx. 1. Acts ii. 34. 1 Cor. xv. 22. Heb. i. 13. x. 13.]

46. [See supra xi. 43.]

47. [Comp. 2 Tim. iii. 6. Tit. i. 11.]

XXI. 1—4. Compare the more detailed account in Mark. The comma which I have placed after γαζοφ. is, if not required by the parallel passage, at least permitted by it; and it is, I think, demanded by propriety of language; for I would not, with Bornemann, suppose an ἐλλειψισ an ellipsis: since, however, that idiom may be justified by examples, it is here inadmissible; as leading to a sense quite unsuitable. Πλουσιον is, indeed, in apposition with τοὺς βάλλοντας, and should be rendered 'nempe divites.' This is confirmed by the antithetical words καὶ τινες χρεὼς πανυχρᾶν, where πανυχρᾶν is of the same form

 λητῆν ἀπολογηθῆναι. ἐγὼ γὰρ δώσω ὑμῖν στόμα καὶ λορε, being formed from πάνης, as that is a μῦθος.

[ἀναθήμασι.] This is not found in any of parallel passages. The word denotes 'any thing set apart,' and especially any thing consecrated to God, and was the name given to those offerings hung up in the heathen temples, as out of gratitude for past benefits, or in hope of future favours, such as chaplets, vases, rich furniture, or furniture; a custom which, as appears in several passages of the Maccabees and others, had been adopted into the Temple at Jerusalem. That these ἀναθήματα were very numerous and rich, we find from 2 Macc. v. 16. 18. 3 Macc. iii. 17.

- εἶπε] scil. ὁ Χριστός, expressed in the passage of Matthew and Mark.

[ταῦτα.] Supply κατὰ, 'as for these things.' Compare, with Bornemann, an accusative absolute through the parallel passages of Matthew and Mark, and strongly countenance the opinion of Rinck, that it is to be cancelled, on the authority of all MSS. and Versions, and a mark of interpolation placed after θεωρεῖτε.

[ἐλεύσονται ἡμέραι, &c.] See supra xix. 44. Matt. ix. 7, 8. Mic. iii. 12. Weiststein appositely says Hom. II. 8. 164, ἔσονται ἡμέραι, ὅταν ἰδῶν [ἴδω].

[ἀκαταστασίας.] Ἀκαταστασία denotes that unsettled state which arises from sedition and faction, wherein the laws cease to have any force, and things are carried on by force and violence. The word is found only in the later Greek writers and in the Sept.

— μὴ πτοηθῆ.] Equivalent to μὴ φοβεῖσθαι in the passages of Matthew and Mark. Bornemann compares a passage of Plutarch, Moral. π. 451, where πτοῖαι and φόβοι are conjoined.

10. φόβητρά] literally, 'objects of terror, terrific prodigies.' These verbals in τρον have all an active force, signifying what causes, or is productive of; as φόβητρον, μίσητρον, Σίατρον, Ιατρον, Λόετρον, Φίρετρον, Σύρετρον, Σέλητρον.

12. πάντων.] This, for the vulg. πάντων, is received from many MSS. by almost all Editors. On the present passage compare John xvi. 2. Rev. ii. 10. Acts iv. 3. v. 18. xii. 4.

13. εἰς μαρτύριον.] Supply αὐτοῖς (which is expressed in the parallel passage of Mark); the sense being, that they shall not be able to say at the judgment, 'We never heard of these things.' See Phil. i. 19. Job xiii. 5.

14. Σίστε οὖν εἰς τὰς καρδ. ὑμ.] i.e. 'Make it a firmly fixed and heart-felt principle,' &c. (Comp. Matt. x. 19. Supra xii. 12.)

15. στόμα καὶ σοφία.] Meaning the faculty of speaking wisely and eloquently.
